

But leaving these hints for future consideration, we find ourselves involved in a labyrinth of theological mysteries; according to modern sectaries, religion seems to have deserted the souls of men and women, and taken up its abode in Ecclesiastical Mysteries. To evolve, or disentangle and straighten out these knots of their divinity, has engaged the best minds of reformed catholicism for ages, and called forth many cart-loads of reformed divinity; writer after writer has puzzled his brains, and brought forth gas only; for the whole anti-christian scheme of salvation by proxy is a myth, an oriental speculation of the Brahmins. If any of our readers are yet in doubts, may we ask them to procure the "Bhagvat-Geeta," or the "Dialogues of Kreesna and Arjoon," translated by the English clerk, Charles Wilkins, of the East India commission; in that sacred volume he will find the whole of the mysteries pertaining to the secular godhead, and many more strange ideas, in conjunction with the triune divinity and incarnation. Also, the corroborative testimony of the Governor General, Warren Hastings, as to the truth of the translation, and the identity of Hindoo mythology and Catholicism. Truth has no place in this matchless chaos of absurdities: still, men are preaching.

The disciples of Luther and Calvin, and a host of others, after a collegiate education, study their speculative theology, or Brahminism, under some of their renowned Drs. of divinity, and being duly ordained, according to creed, go forth to teach, and spread paganism through the land; and the poor heathen, as we call them, have to be tortured with this miserable, speculative, rejuvenated sectarian paganism!

How long, before rational men and women will learn, that Salvation is a growth of righteousness in the human soul? and that this growth in the divine nature, is to continue to the endless ages of eternity? The Saviour never taught any other mode of salvation; he said nothing about salvation by proxy; nothing of "paying the debt in our law, room and stead;" but redemption from a sinful nature was to supervene by a life of self-denial and the cross; a daily dying to the propensities of a carnal animal nature, by following the Captain of our salvation in the regeneration.

In his parable he said, "I am the vine, ye are the branches, my Father is the husbandman;" thus to grow up in God, and become one with him, in the Divine nature, was the design and intent of the Saviour's mission.

This buying and selling salvation on hypothetical capital, seems too much like speculation, or gambling in matters of eternal interest.

O the folly of a deluded sectarian world! "The blind leading the blind;" and all in the ditch of ignorance, folly, and superstition:—Paganism reigning triumphant in a supposed Christian land; and fanaticism spending millions of money, and much precious time, and many valuable lives; and all for what? Simply to convert the Oriental Nations to their own Religion, of more than four thousand years' prevalence; aged and grey-headed, long before its advent on the shores of Europe.

But there is still hope; the Saviour's Light is again burning and shining, and the nations are turning to its bright illuminations!

Paganism is destined to have an end, and the true God and his Gospel will be known; the gospel will spread to the uttermost parts of the earth; and the heavenly Father and Mother will be honored and glorified by the redemption of their prodigal children; all in their appointed time.

Guardian Angels.

The Shakers do not claim that it is their special Mission to take care of Orphans, although it is said that their conditions in life, and especially those of the Sisterhood, are well adapted to the charge of those little sufferers of earth.

O were our eyes unsealed,
Glad secrets to descry,
What shining hosts would be revealed,
Divinely hovering nigh.

Bright Angels clothed with love,
True Ministers of grace,
In hovering circles gently move,
To guide the erring race.

Their gentle wings expand
In truth it may be said;
The lowliest saint, is rainbow spanned,
The child is Angel led.

And woman also shows
She can be Angel too;
The gentle mind reflects on those,
Our dim eyes may not view.

The garland that she weaves,
Would grace the Savior's brow;
'Tis fragrant as the perfumed leaves,
That by life's river grow.

In dungeons, she is day;
In sickness, solace mild;
To the maimed, a staff; to the blind, a ray;
She soothes the lonely child.

And never doth she send
More golden rays abroad,
Than when she shines the Orphan's friend,
And leads the child to God.

Items of Interest.

"THE DEBATEABLE LAND," by R. D. Owen, is a most remarkable work on Spiritualism. Those who are interested in the progress of Spiritualism will not fail of its perusal. The address to the Clergy is a valuable exhortation to thinking humanity. But let no one read who will not understand, or who fears being persuaded. Carleton, New York, is the publisher.

A MAN proves himself fit to go higher, who shows that he is faithful where he is. A man that will not do well in his present place because he longs to be higher, is fit neither to be where he is, nor yet above it.

"LIFE of Victoria C. Woodhull" has been sent us; were it not from the pen of a nature's nobleman—Theodore Tilton—we would incline to the belief that its subject was a myth of the 19th century. Price 10 cents.

AS LONG as men continue to worship an exclusively masculine God, they will never practically acknowledge the equality of woman. Let women teach their children to pray MOTHER GOD, and there will soon be a change in the current of public opinion. Go to the fountain head, if you would purify the stream. The world has inherited its theology from the times when women were considered as the servants or slaves of men—when animal force was predominant, and men's highest conception of God was that of a being capable of executing justice, by force. The higher element of LOVE they had not realized as a moving power in the Godhead, and

hence had not recognized this feminine element in their worship. How long will enlightened women continue virtually to acknowledge their inferiority, by continuing to ignore the representation of their sex in the Godhead? Is this the Nineteenth century, and are the people awake? Who are the heathens to-day?—Moonly Voice.

AMONG our exchanges, we have found none more radical on the vital questions of to-day; none more willing to stand by and build up unpopular, but living truths; none that are willing to do more good to others than is done to it, than the neatly printed and ably edited "CRUCIBLE" of Baltimore, Md.

ONE of the happy "signs of the times" may be eagerly observed by every true reformer, in an article on "Husbands and Wives" in "The Herald of Health" for Feb.

COMMUNISM.—Christian communism declares, "All that is mine is thine." Infidel communism, on the contrary, "All that is thine is mine."—World's Crisis.

Christians who wish to retain the spirituality of their religion, should be very careful how they mingle with the world. He who is pleased with the company of ungodly men, no matter how witty or learned, is either himself one with them, or is drinking into their spirit.—World's Crisis.

Once virtue stood before knowledge, in the estimation of the Apostle, for he exhorted to add knowledge thereto. If he lived now, he would, doubtless, advise to add to knowledge virtue. E. MIRICK.

Bound copies of the first volume of THE SHAKER, may be obtained by application to the Resident Editor. Price, Two Dollars; extra binding, Three Dollars; unbound, 75 cents.

ITEM for meat eaters: An old ox, having done valuable service in one of the Shaker families, was fatted, and brought to the shambles. Walking up to the ring without resistance, he stood, and as if conscious of his past efforts and the impending blow, actually shed tears, until stunned by the butcher! We vouch for this.

ON page 20, present number, top of third column may be observed, a sentence—"Ye generation of vipers"—very commonly attributed to Jesus. Our reading of this in Matt. 3, 7, makes John the Baptist author of this harsh saying. "Search the Scriptures."

THE Phrenological Annual is out. Among other matters, we find a purported portrait of Ann Lee, together with our letter to S. R. Wells. Very few Shakers coincide with the Spirit Artist; but it is very interesting to observe what artists attempt, and phrenologists determine from such attempts.

THE SHAKER.

"I WILL SHAKE ALL NATIONS, AND THE DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS SHALL COME; AND I WILL FILL THIS HOUSE WITH GLORY, SAITH THE LORD."

Published Monthly, by, and under the direction of the Mt. Lebanon Bishopric.

SHAKERS, ALBANY, N. Y., JANUARY, 1871.

No. 1.

Salutatory.

To the Public:—Knowing it to be duty, to do all the good we can to our fellow travelers on the journey of life, withholding the knowledge of no good thing—impressed with the conviction, that there lies within our power the possibility of doing more good than heretofore; and being urged continually, by friends of reform, to communicate to the world of mind our ideas of life and happiness as viewed from the Shaker platform, are the reasons for our taking the bold step of appearing before you, as solicitors of your attention to the columns of THE SHAKER.

Claiming no distinction on the grounds of erudition, but, bowing beneath the rebuke of learned criticisms, we mean to tell you from our humble position, where, in our understanding, lies "the pearl of great price,"—Christ, or the kingdom of heaven on earth; thus explaining the peculiar testimony and life of the people, called Shakers. The policy of THE SHAKER will be, to treat of a more excellent way of life, than is the ordinary practice of the multitudes. It will be devoted to the cause of religious truths; devoid of speculative theories of a theological nature. It will aim to illustrate life, in accordance with God's pleasure; and in conformity with the operation of that "quickening spirit," that resurrects souls above the plane of earthly selfishness, where the spirit of mine is cast out, and the Pentecostal system of community of goods is in full exercise. It will be the aim of THE SHAKER to keep before the public mind the necessary distinction between life on the earthly plane, however proper, and the heavenly, or angelic life, however humble. It will not fail to contend that the celibacy of the Angel plane, is a necessary component of eternal life, and practiced with propriety on the earth, by those who love to think of its reality in the heavens; while admitting the propriety of marriage and procreation by those who have not risen sufficiently in love with the Christ life. It will advocate peace; deprecating, and expressing disbelief in the necessity of wars, whether of households or of nations—Christians never did, never can fight.

THE SHAKER will ever meet correspondents, in its various communications upon "Does Christianity admit of private property?" with a negative answer, from the most advanced reasons of a spiritual life. Its freedom from the arena of political parties will conserve the righteous idea of those whose name it bears. It will sketch, biographically, the founders and early communicants of the Society; and illustrate life, as it is enjoyed by the Society at present. The poetical sentiments of society will find an exponent in THE SHAKER; while "Answers to Correspondents" will receive due attention. It will advocate temperance in all things; and urge reformation and resurrection from the earthly, sensual life, to a life "eternal in the heavens." Friends of reform—lovers of wisdom—servants of God—aid us; bless our efforts to do good. Extend the cause of Christ to the notice of your neighbors; and let us all seek to walk "the way," learn "the truth" and live "the life"—being imitators of the beautiful Jesus—Christ. *

Who are the Shakers?

Historically and derivatively considered, the Shakers have their rise from the French prophets, a class of Divinely inspired dissenters from the Catholic and Protestant church of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, as the legitimate fruit of the Reformation. They were religious revivalists of a very remarkable character, called fanatics, and are to be prominently numbered among the few witnesses of the true Christ church during the gloomy reign of Antichrist.

In future pages of our paper a more full history of them may be properly given. Their testimony, in substance, was "The end of the world" in all followers of Christ; and they were the harbingers to declare the near approach of the kingdom of God; the establishment of new heavens and a new earth; the kingdom of the Messiah; the marriage of the Lamb; the first resurrection from the dead; the planting of the New Jerusalem. About 1706, some of these spiritual new lights and prophets went from France to England. About 1747, a small number of these witnesses, in the neighborhood of Manchester, England, were led, by Divine, spirit influence, to form themselves into a society for mutual support, physically and spiritually, under the ministration of James and Jane Wardly; and the first pioneers of the Shaker Church were distinguished members of this Society, among whom Ann Lee became the acknowledged, divinely inspired leader, and a spiritual mother, and the Eldress of this infant Church. The name of this Church, "SHAKERS," was given them in derision, by the world, as descriptive of the religious exercises of body by which the members of this Church were affected during the seasons of their devotion to God, as the fruit of that spiritual baptism, under the influence of which they were bearing a testimony of God's truth, which was shaking the foundations of Antichrist's kingdom. So that the title, "SHAKERS," though given in derision and persecution, was appropriate, and as providentially applied as was the title, "KING OF THE JEWS," given to Jesus by the persecuting Jews.

Ann Lee became the acknowledged Eldress of the Shaker Church in the year 1770, while in England, so that it now has survived a century. A more extended history of the Shakers' rise and progress to the present day, may, perhaps, appropriately form the subject of future notices in our periodical.

WHAT ARE THE SHAKERS?

As national citizens, they are observers of the counsel of Paul, and recognize civil magistrates as powers of God, for the government of worldly citizens; hence, Shakers are law-observing and law-abiding.

As politicians they are nondescripts, and, in fact, not to be found; they are, truly, non-essentials!

As socialists, or, relative to society arrangements, they are Christian Communists; the property of a Community is common to all, and each, of the members forming that Community, but not common to all the communities belonging to the household of faith in the same town, county, State, or country, except in a moral, charitable and religious sense, in which sense all property dedicated to the Community is consecrated to one general end and purpose—i. e., the support of the Gospel, and to religious and charitable purposes; and, in this sense, is common to all the members of the household of faith, so that for these sacred purposes all the communities are taxed according to their several abilities. In reference to national, political economy, as applicable to the disposal of public lands, they are agrarian in principle; at least largely so.

Religiously considered, the Shakers are Revolutionists, Reformers, Comeouters, Revivalists, Newlights, Second Adventists, and Spiritualists, in meaning, strictly conformable to the instructions of Jesus Christ. They are Ascetics, but only in a limited sense; they are Christian Celibates, but not of the monastic order and character, as the sexes dwell and associate together; they are not Sectarians, but simply Christians; they are lovers, and free, but not "free lovers" in the sense of that term as applied to a class of misled, modern Spiritualists; they are not lovers as carnal men and women, but only as disciples of Jesus and John; they are free, but not to lust or love as carnal men and women, but free from the bondage of sin and a worldly life, and from the shackles of theology and priestcraft; they are Spiritualists par excellence, but only in a Christian light, that, to be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace;—believe in continuous revelations from God to man, mediately; they are Bible believers after the following manner:

1st. That it is the most important compilation of books known to man.

2d. That it contains (not the word of God), but a record of the WORD OF GOD in the Law of Moses, and in the testimony of Jesus and the primitive Christians. The WORD OF GOD is a living power. In the words of the apostle, "Sharp, powerful, piercing, to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, the joint and the marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of heart." The Bible record is not this power!

The Shakers accept Jesus after he was baptized with the Christ, as the first born son of God, the elder brother of a large family of sons and daughters of God, constituting the Christian Church of the New and Spiritual Creation of God; they do not believe Jesus was a God, but is our guide and life exemplar; believe him to be the Saviour of men par excellence; but only the Elder of a large class of "Saviours" that "shall come up on Mount Zion" to "judge the Mount of Esau, and the kingdom shall be the Lord's." Obadiah, 21st. This kingdom is Christ's Church of the latter day, the New Creation of God.

Shakerism.

What is the meaning of the term? We shake a carpet, as we do grain to remove something from it that is not an integral portion of the fabric. Parents and school teachers sometimes shake a child for a similar purpose, to separate a fault from its character. This nation has recently been shaken from center to circumference, in the effort to divest the Constitution of an evil that was ramifying itself into the Constitution and institutions of all the States and territories in the Union.

Thus it was said to a city, "Shake thyself from the dust, O Jerusalem;" (Is. 52: 2.) "All men of the earth shall shake at my presence;" (Ezek. 38: 20.) "I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come;" (Hag. 2: 7.)

One said, "The foundations of the earth do shake;" (ib. 2: 21.) "Yet once more, and I will shake not only the earth, but the heavens also." "The stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." "Then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then shall the kingdoms of the earth MOURN. And they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory." "And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet (preaching), and they shall gather together his ELECT from the four winds of heaven." "For wheresoever the carcass shall be, thither will the eagles be gathered together," from among the Gentiles into Community Order, as in the first appearing of the Christ Spirit to the Jews. Then was a Community formed, yet only as a kind of first-fruits; because it could not have been permanent, for two reasons:

First. The race was not yet prepared to continue to furnish enough of the Elect who should be celibates, non-resistants, spiritualists, who would cease to swear, or vote, or speculate.

Second. The Civil Governments had not yet become "the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ;" and they would not permit the practice of Christ principles—Christian Communities.

The Pentecostal Church—Community—came under the action of these two forces. By the third century they had fallen into marriage, private property, and war; and then refused to allow others to practise what they had fallen from. The Gentile State determined what the Jewish Christian Church should be on earth; thus "treading down the holy city."

In the spirit land, this—the Pentecostal Church was continued, and "increased with the increase of God," up to the time of the second appearing of Christ; and is the Bridegroom Church. It received its inspiration from the heavens still above, from the Christ Spirit, which is as the right hand of Deity to all free moral agents; and was as the Sun to spiritually enlighten the earth. But it shone upon a dark, benighted race, sunken in sensuality—Christian Pagans, or Pagan Christians.

Let it be borne in mind, that near two thousand years have intervened between the time of the First Christian Church and the day in which we live. Think of that! and consider the condition of this earth's civil governments then and now.

Rome was the ruling power over the Gentile world; and even Judea was one of the conquered nations. The Pentecostal Church was masculine in its organization and rulers; resting upon the Eastern world—the male of the earth. What then, had the race to wait for, in a second Coming of the Christ Spirits? Why, for the female of the earth—the Gentile Western world—to come up to the "Pattern showed in the Mount."

The First Christian Church, composed of the descendants of Abraham, with their permanent and ever-perfecting organization, that had been "caught up to God," in the spirit world, out of the reach of the "dragon" Pagan power, from whence it inspired the "witnesses—stars"—who, having shone upon the dark earth for a season, themselves "fell to the earth," by "marrying and giving in marriage."

Approaching the time of the Second Appearing of the Christ Spirits, the "sign" is seen of the Son of Man—Co-operative, Associative, Communistic efforts—in the most advanced nations, as England, America, France and Germany.

The foundations of the earth are being discovered, and found to be much out of course—wrong: Reproduction, Property, Wars, Theologies, Civil Governments, Organizations, and Institutions, are wanting perfection. Yet, in all the Churches, which the Spirit has raised up, throughout these two thousand years, the religious element has had a place and influence, from the Roman Catholic to the Oneida People; good has been done, and is progressing the race.

But then, all of these are still doing what the Pentecostal Church did not do, and what the Christ Spirit (coming not in atmospheric clouds, but "in the clouds of heaven"—Shaker Communities)—saves the Shakers from doing—"marrying and giving in marriage." Thus laying the foundations of new heavens and earth upon the "Rock" of sexual purity; a new and spiritual relation of the sexes, free from all the "trouble in the flesh," which comes of mixing the flesh and Spirit as in Gentile Christianity.

Do not all the "tribes of the earth mourn because of him?"—because of the testimony that thus "bruises the head" of the sensual propensities—the lusts of the flesh, taking the very life itself of the generative man and woman by celibacy and virgin purity.

Let it once become an established, Christian doctrine, that the highest Christ life is a celibate, virgin life, with its corollaries, and will there not be "great mourning in Jerusalem"—"the temple of God"—the Gentile Christian Church, in which the "man of sin" sits enthroned?

CELIBACY.—Its history is of great importance in the religion of all cultivated nations. It existed in the Therapeutes of Egypt, the Essenes among the Jews (out of which came the founder of Christianity), and among the ascetics of all other nations, and finally culminated in Christianity, as the corner stone of a new system.

Jesus, the Celibate Founder of this new system, was born of a virgin mother, thus connecting the two orders of natural reproduction and spiritual reproduction together; He was witnessed unto by John, the celibate Jewish Baptiser; and was supported by twelve men who had either never been married, or had, "for Christ's sake and his Gospel," forsaken all family relation; thus altogether founding a Church that has hitherto been, and still is, the ideal of heaven upon earth—the Pentecostal. This Celibate Jewish Church, after an existence of some 300 years, relapsed into the Monastery and Nunnery of the Constantine Gentile Church, which has ever accepted the celibate principle as the one essential of a pure, Christian life. The celibacy of its higher class of saints, and of the priesthood, no less than of its monastic orders, puts that beyond the region of debate. Of the clean animals that entered the ark, by sevens, Jerome says, the odd number denotes the celibated which will do to go with some of the proofs and confirmations of there being three individualities in Deity.

Respecting the progress of the Monastic movement, Lecky reports, that, "in the fourth century, it was no less rapid than that of Christianity itself. Egypt appears to have been the home of the celibates, being of all other nations the most advanced in civilization. Thus we read of there being seven thousand monks under St. Pachomus; five thousand under a single Abbott, in the desert of Nitria. That a certain city included twenty thousand virgins, and ten thousand monks. And that towards the end of the century, the Monastic population, in that country, nearly equaled the population of the cities." St. Jerome states, "that fifty thousand monks were sometimes assembled at the Eastern festivities in Alexandria at one time."

Even in pagan Rome, "the Flamens of Jupiter, and the Vestal Virgins, were the two most sacred orders." (Ibid.)

"And the land (Christendom) shall mourn, every family apart, and their wives apart;" or as a more correct translation, "every husband apart, and every wife apart:" for the wife is a part of the family. The husbands of the house of David (the rulers) apart, and their wives apart. The husbands of the house of Nathan apart, and their wives apart. The husbands of the house of Levi (the priesthood) apart, and their wives apart."

Their gods and their priests being gone, what have they left? This is what remains to them: "In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David (the rulers) and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem," (priesthood and all; for it is like priest, like people) "for sin, and for uncleanness."

"It shall come to pass that, in all the land, saith the Lord, two parts shall be cut off and die; but the third part shall be left therein. And I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined; and will try them as gold is tried. They shall call on my name and I will hear them. I will say it is my people; and they will say the Lord is my God."—(Zech. xiii.)

These are the Elect, whose number shall eventually be proportioned to the exigencies of the case, always regulating population in the natural order, who will be as seed to reproduce and continue the race, when all forms of evil shall find no place in the Millenium of human life upon the earth; any more than it does upon thousands of other globes which we may be scientifically permitted to hope and believe have never departed from the condition of "very good," in which they first left the hand of Omnipotent Holiness.

"The angels who gather the Elect from the four quarters of the earth," are from the Resurrection or Seventh Heaven, nigh unto Deity, surrounding the throne of the Eternal Parentage. These, in their aggregated capacity, are the Christ of God to the illimitable Universe of heavens and earths that fill immensity. For as marbles to the school-boy, so are globes in the hands of the ultimate "Almighty."

"All souls," upon whatever planet they may reside, "are mine," saith Deity.

There's lots of Christians to be had,
In this, the nineteenth, just as bad."

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Ann Lee.

Ann Lee was the daughter of John Lee, of Manchester, Eng. She was born Feb. 29, 1736. Her father was a blacksmith; and though poor, was known to be respectable in character, moral in principle, honest and punctual in his dealings, and in his business, very industrious. Her mother was noted for her piety. As was common with the children of the poor in manufacturing towns, Ann was early taught to work, but never attended any school; she thus acquired a habit of industry, but was entirely ignorant of letters. From being an employee in a cotton factory, she became a cutter of hatter's fur; and was a faithful, prudent cook in the Manchester Infirmary for some time. There was discovered in her childhood, a bright, sagacious mind, bordering on precocity; with a seriousness that never permitted her to engage in the plays of her juvenile companions; while they played, she retired, and held converse with the inhabitants of the angel-land. As she arrived at maturing womanhood—at that age which commonly engulfs all thoughts of spirituality, and calls for action in the sphere of the marital and sensual—Ann was impressed with the odiousness of sin, and the depravity of humanity, in its longings to transcend the laws of nature, given for the multiplication of the race; and so abhorrent did these snares of sin appear to her soul, that she resolved never to marry. But nature in her, prone to the earthly, demanded indulgence; and, contrary to the teachings of her earlier visions, she yielded, through the importunities of others, and was married to a blacksmith, named Stanley. By him, she was the mother of four children, all of which died early. Ann and her husband lived at her father's house; and so far as adaptability of dispositions to each other's happiness, this was in their possession, excepting those seasons when the convictions of her youth would come upon her with such crushing force as to bring her under the deepest tribulation of soul. In this age of advanced soul-light, and spiritual intelligence, we know that many are familiar with this experience. And when Ann sought relief from the bondage to sin she felt her soul was in, giving herself no rest day nor night, but prayed and cried in agony to God for deliverance, her husband sympathized with her, and partook strongly of her convictions. Husbands, take notice. While under this great distress of mind, she became acquainted with the Society of people under the direction of James and Jane Wardley; and as she found them in possession of a greater degree of divine light, with a seathing testimony against those sins she herself had been so strongly convicted of, she eagerly embraced their manner of life, in the twenty-third year of her age.

These people were spiritually directed to an oral confession of every sin they had committed; and being enlightened, more than ordinarily, as to what sin was, they took up a full cross against everything they knew to be evil; hence, they really experienced an enduring power over sin, unknown to those converts, who feel mentally relieved from the fear of the punishment of sin, but whose hearts are uncleansed and full of sinful desires—being yet under the dominion of nature depraved. Ann was one of a class of individuals, which can never be persuaded that their salvation and redemption is to be obtained for them, through the vicarious sufferings of another, good or bad. As an example of her exertions to free herself from sin, witness her testimony: "Soon after I began to travail in the way of God, I labored many nights in the works of God. Sometimes I labored all night, continually crying to God for my own redemption; other times I went to bed, and slept; but in the morning, I could not feel that sense of the work of God which I did before I slept. This brought me into great tribulation; and I cried to God, and promised him, that if he would give me the same mind that I had before I slept, I would labor all night. This I did many nights; and in the day time I put my hands to work, giving my heart to God; and when I felt weary and in need of rest, I labored for the refreshing power of God, which did relieve me, so that I felt able to go to my work again.

"Many times when about my work, I felt my soul overwhelmed with sorrow; then I used to work as long as I could keep it concealed, then run to get out of sight, lest some one should pity me with that pity which God did not. In my tribulation, my sufferings were so great, that my flesh consumed upon my bones, and a bloody sweat pressed through the pores of my skin, while I became as helpless as an infant. And when I was brought through, and born into the spiritual kingdom, I was just like an infant born into the world. It sees colors and objects, but it knows not what it sees. So it was with me, when I was born into the spiritual world; but before I was twenty-four hours old, I saw, and knew what I saw!" *

CHURCH—STATE.

What God hath put asunder, let not man join together again.

There is in the country a Sectarian movement of some extent, to put into the United States constitution the theological terms, God and Christ.

The Shakers are the only body of religious people who at this present time could not exist within, and find protection under the laws, of every civilized nation. They alone can make their community homes only in and under the protection of a non-sectarian republic, a separate church and state government.

The Shakers pray for these unhappy agitators: O, heavenly Father and Mother—God, "forgive them, for they know not what they do." And to our fellow American citizens, without exception, we do most solemnly appeal to prevent the consummation of this misconceived, mischievous project. Let well enough alone.

Who, more than the Shakers, believe in the whole of the God-head—a Duality? Yet, above all other, we would raise our voices in thunder-tones, to be heard by the souls of the revolutionary fathers, who are marching on before us in the spirit-land, against this worse than Trojan horse being introduced into our civil government.

All God-believers and Christ-proclaimers may well pause in serious contemplation of the wonderful fact in our national history, that while Pagans, Jews, Catholics, Protestants, Deists, Pantheists, Free-thinkers, Atheists, Materialists, all united in achieving our national independence, it is to the skeptical classes that we are largely indebted for the religious and civil liberty which we enjoy.

Jefferson, the inditer of the Declaration, that all men are equal by nature, irrespective of color or creed; no one having the right to coerce another in matters of mental speculation or theological belief, was but a fair type of the whole class of republican organizers, having Franklin and Thomas Paine, the Deists, as his bosom friends.

If a kind Providence thought fit, in its wisdom, to employ these skeptical powers—Horns, which had grown out of the beast, Christendom—to found a civil government on the basis of universal freedom, having an entire separation from its parallel religious organization, the Shaker Church, that ignores wars as the basis of religious persecution, would it not be the most presumptuous impiety in theological and religious people again to join together by an organic change of the national compact, things which God had thus significantly put asunder?

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

A Dialogue.

Written for, and rehearsed at an Annual Social Gathering, in Canaan Pine Grove, N. Y., by Ann, Martha, Mary J., Charlotte, Melissa, Margaret, Sarah and Catharine.

A.—Beloved Gospel Companions:

You will not be surprised if I tell you, that I expect to take solid comfort to-day; an increase of pleasure and satisfaction has attended each social feast in this pleasant grove, where our enjoyment is enhanced by an interchange of thought and feeling, and where we always meet loving friends; noble souls of the promised land; I can but exclaim with joy and gladness, it is good to be here! and I believe that many of my young companions can reciprocate the feeling.

Mary.—I can most heartily, for,
On wings of the morning all joyous and strong,
Pure love and sweet union come bounding along,
Ready and willing to aid us at least,
By seeking a part in our true social feast.

Mar.—(Comes forward with a joyful clapping of hands.)

O gladly we welcome companions like these!
That bring us the freshness of day's early breeze—
That bring us a calmness, cause joy to abound,
And cover with blessings this dear hallowed ground

M.—
Lift! lift now the curtain that veils from our sight
The glories immortal in realms of pure light!
O what is the vision our spirits behold?
Its wonders, its beauties, can never be told;
They are in the future for all who will prize
Pure love and sweet union in every guise.

S.—
Away with all sadness and lay aside care,
Rejoice in the present, of every good share— [give,
Be filled with that peace which the world cannot
And noble enjoyment in which we may live;
For Right, and not Might, is the law of our band,
In each blessed gift we unite heart and hand.

C.—Cheered by the happy sentiments you have expressed, I would ask a share in your circle of union, hoping to engage with you in an interesting and profitable conversation.

A.—You are welcome! we would not exclude from our midst any of our companions who feel interested in adding to our gift of union.

Martha.—As your invitation is universal, with pleasure I accept; I have not ascertained the topic of conversation which is to engage our attention; but will tell you what I thought this morning as the sunlight burst in full splendor over the eastern horizon, flooding the earth with its glory, and bathing the landscape in its liquid beauty; my spirit was enraptured with the sight; a thousand visions passed before my mind, visions of real things too; God's glorious works in their infinitude and perfection, presented a theme for reflection and conversation.

Mar.—Thoughts similar to these passed through my mind; the earth never appeared more beautiful, the surrounding scenery seemed wrapt in loveliness, a picture worthy of the poet's pen or the artist's pencil. I am glad that you have introduced this subject, and I know we will be pleased with your company.

S.—I wish Charlotte was here; I think that she would be interested in (the subject of) Martha's proposition.

Char.—I was only waiting for an invitation.
M.—Why! Ann gave a general one.

Char.—I wanted a special one; but as you seem somewhat animated and joyous, I readily unite with you in dilating upon the beauties of Creation—vast Creation, which speaks with voice unchangeable of the goodness and Omniscience of the Almighty; just think of the formation of our beautiful earth!

M.—In speaking of the formation of the earth, I feel somewhat interested, as I have commenced reading the Bible, intending to finish it by course; I should like to obtain as correct an understanding of it as possible. We are informed that the heavens and the earth, and all that is contained therein, were created in six days. Martha, do you not think, that days were used figuratively, as expressive of periods of time?

Martha.—I believe it is the conclusion of scientific men that each day was a distinct and separate epoch, and the wonderful geological discoveries that have been made, prove that the earth is much older than we have record of; this assertion they substantiate from the formation of the strata of rocks, and the substances found imbedded in them; many other remarkable revelations have been and are being made in connection with the science of Geology.

Mary.—They tell us too, that great changes have taken place since the organization of the world; where rivers once flowed, vegetation now teems; and where were the verdant valleys, now the voice of waters speak. Cities have disappeared beneath the volcano's molten lava, or have been destroyed by the earthquake's mighty shock.

S.—Of volcanic eruptions and the earthquake's fearful shock, we need but read the last pages of history to find thereon portrayed, the horrors of their devastating work.

C.—“Change is marked on all things seen; we sometimes think and speak of nations, empires and institutions as enduring, and so they seem as we view them for a moment; but they rise and fall as the tidal waves of the Ocean, by medium of an invisible, immutable power which survives through all their changes.”

A.—How beautiful is earth! from its elements of growth are transformed thousands of charming objects which delight our eyes. Witness the vegetable kingdom: in the course of one year trees increase their foliage, and buds, leaves, fruits, flowers and their seeds are renewed, yielding bountiful favors to man.

Char.—One would think, that after so many ages of replenishment, its treasures would become exhausted; but they are constantly renewed from the unseen realm of nature, where powerful agencies are unceasingly, yet silently at work producing the wonderful operations wrought in the material Universe.

Mar.—Wonderful indeed are the productions of nature! Trees, plants, flowers and grasses (the most beautiful of which are the cereals), all teem with delightful existence, drawing sustenance from Mother Earth, who is faithful in the renewal of strength and life.

S.—When speaking of the grasses, Margaret mentioned the cereals; I should like to know the meaning of the word cereal.

Char.—Have you never read of the ancient Gods and Goddesses who were supposed to preside over the destinies of men?

S.—I learned something of the heathen deities in connection with Astronomy, such as Jupiter being the God of Heaven, Mars the God of war, and Neptune the God of the seas. Of the female deities there was Flora the Goddess of flowers; Vesta the Goddess of fire, Astrea the Goddess of justice; and many more; all the planets were named after their imaginary divinities—but I believe, that I never heard of Cereal.

C.—It was Ceres—she was the Goddess of grain and harvest; and is represented carrying a sickle and sheaf; through her blessing, fields of golden grain were perfected and harvested into their garners as proper food for man; hence came the word Cereal.

Mary.—Was Astronomy known to the ancients?

A.—Certainly, and was taught in Egypt, India, Chaldea and Greece long before the Christian era. The first astronomers were shepherds and herdsmen; they were led to the study, by observing the movements of the heavenly bodies, while watching their flocks in the fields. They, however, entertained the erroneous idea that the earth was flat, and that the sun, moon and stars actually revolved round it, as they appear to do every twenty-four hours.

Martha.—It was not until the beginning of the sixteenth century, that the true system or theory of Astronomy was promulgated by Copernicus, a Prussian Astronomer. This was about eighteen years after the discovery of America by Columbus.

Char.—The greatest antiquity boasted of in science is agriculture. History records, that for ages it was the only art practised by mankind. The Chinese, Chaldeans and Phœnicians, held in their highest estimation the art of husbandry. By this science we obtain all that is necessary for food and nourishment. An ancient writer remarked that agriculture was the mother of all the sciences; for while she flourished the others fared prosperously. Cicero, the great philosopher, spoke of the pleasure he derived from cultivating the land even in his old age. It was not the product alone that delighted him, but the virtue and nature of the soil itself, which, when in its softened and subdued bosom, it receives the scattered seed; it first confines what is hidden within; then, when warmed by the sunlight and its own compression, it spreads, and elicits from the verdant blade that, which, sustained by the fibres of the roots, grows up and develops the fruits of the ear.

S.—What can be more beautiful than a field of wheat ready for the harvest? See how each slender stem gracefully bears the well filled head! And as you glance across the field, it looks like a summer sea when the breezes are at play, causing the shadowy waves to pass over it. Surely with promises replete for the future is the beautiful field of wheat.

Mar.—To observe the progress of life, whether in the animal or vegetable kingdom, is highly interesting to an investigating mind. But here man, with all his science and skill, can achieve nothing; he may plant and water, but God alone giveth the increase.

M.—It is said that industry is the guardian of innocence, and what requires more of the spirit of industry than the tillage of the land? Or, what labor is in itself more innocent? It is the first of which we have any account. Adam was placed in the garden of Eden to dress and keep it. The Israelites were commanded not to delay to offer of their first ripe fruits unto the Lord. Three times in a year they were to keep a feast; first, the feast of unleavened bread; second, the feast of the harvest, the first fruits of their labors which they had sown in the field; third, the feast of ingathering, at the end of the year. Thus down through all the succeeding ages in the history of our race, we find (as Charlotte remarked) that agriculture was pre-eminent as the foundation of man's physical wants.

C.—The farmer, of all laborers, is the most independent; on the product of his toils mankind depend for subsistence; 't is his to plow, to sow, to cultivate, and reap the fruits of earth; which alone are the proper building material for the house we live in. For God said: “Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed which is upon the face of the earth, to you it shall be for meat,” even so to the lower animal creation.

Mary.—If we could only look back through the dim vista of a century, and behold the changes wrought (by diligence and exertion) on consecrated ground, among these lovely hills, we would be somewhat surprised. Over land once stony and uncultivated, the mowing machine now passes smoothly, and the plow upturns the sod of many a field, whose soil in its natural state would yield but scanty vegetable life.

A.—'T is true, our home, now pleasant and comfortable, was once almost in a wilderness state. But how has industry prospered! and now ('neath the sunshine of God's blessing) it teems with vegetable life and beauty, a peaceful and happy abode.

Martha.—All honor to the farmer! he needs no sculptured work of art to perpetuate his name; the verdant fields bespeak his praise; and the murmuring streams, which course their way through smiling meadows, shall sing sweet requiems to his memory long after he has ceased to sow and reap. And those extended lines of walls (so nicely laid), will they not stand as monuments to commemorate his life of industry?

Char.—Certainly they will.

Dr. Franklin, in summing up the evils of drunkenness, says: “Houses without windows, gardens without fences, fields without tillage, barns without roofs, children without clothing, principles, morals or manners.”

I CAN'T.—“Shame on you, the expression is bad enough on the tongue of infancy. To that of manhood or womanhood it is a disgrace. How do you know you ‘can’t’? Have you tried? Well, if you have, try once more. The task before you may be very difficult. What if it is? It is then often the more worthy of performance. Courage, then, young man, or young woman, whoever you be! Resolve to know no such word as ‘can’t.’”—College Review.

Visit to the Shaker Settlement.

"Last, but not least, comes up the remembrance of my visit to the Shaker Settlement. That is a leaf in memory to which I shall often turn. I have it all before me now. Its broad acres of rich land; the trees laden with ripe golden fruit,—everything growing in rich profusion that heart could wish for; the substantial pleasant built houses; the cheerful ways of the well-ordered families; the great broad-backed, soft-eyed cows, themselves partaking of the quiet, gentle ways of their keepers,—the rich, pure milk drawn from their udders by the pretty young Shakeresses; the young brother who passed on before us, showing us his stock (and with an air of pride pointing out his best) with his broad-brimmed hat, fat, rosy cheeks, and bright black eyes,—all these things make a bright picture that will never fade.

"As I passed from one to another and saw the calm, happy look on each, I could not but wonder of their inner lives,—what of their hopes and fears, &c., &c. * * *

"As these things crowd my mind, the tall, slender figure of Sister Sarah comes up before me. Her kind, motherly ways gave me the confidence to ask what I would. She told how, at seven years of age, her mother had brought her from the far-off hills of Vermont, and laid her an offering upon God's altar, consecrating her to His service. Fifty years have passed since then, and her testimony now is, 'I am happy.' What a lesson for the worldling! I scanned that placid face; no mark of discontent was there; no hard-drawn lines had settled round any of the features, but a peaceful, happy expression, telling of the beauty of her life. As I looked at her I wondered if, when fifty-three years of my life had passed, I should be able to bear the same testimony. And then I said to her: 'Have you never in all these long years longed for the pleasures of the world?' With an eye beaming with truthfulness and a voice full of sweetness, she said: 'Nay, sister, never.' With this testimony I was led to believe what I had never thought before, that the Shakers are a happy people. All that I saw led me to think it. It is surely no convent life with its rigid laws and penances; no dark vaults or gloomy cells; no high walls or grated windows. Strong, willing hearts are there, bearing a firm but gentle rule. A ready obedience from all, gives birth to the good order and happiness that are so plainly visible. As I passed through the cool, pleasant rooms, seeing the happy faces and hearing the cheerful voices of old and young, and seeing the well-filled larders, I thought, 'O, what a home for the hungry, what a rest for the weary!' I know it is very unromantic to talk of being hungry; but as I am of the earth, earthy, I confess I was able to do justice to the sweet Graham bread and golden butter, the fresh milk, cakes, pies and fruit that were set before us. And then there was such a delicate politeness in the offering of this lunch, almost making us feel that it was by accident, while we knew it was placed there especially for us. After feasting on these good things, we were led back to the reception room by gentle Sister Sarah. I could not but express my thankfulness for the kindness she had manifested and the pleasure I had realized, and looking into her clear, calm eyes, I longed for a place in her love and memory; and when I asked her to grant me this boon, bright tears gathered in those soft eyes, and she bent over and imprinted a fervent kiss on my face. I shall never forget the pleasure of those sweet lips; and like the child whom the great Napoleon kissed, must ever keep that spot sacred. I do not know that it was so, but I shall ever cherish the idea that when the dewy tears gathered in those soft eyes and that warm kiss was given, there went up a prayer for my eternal welfare. Be that as it may, I shall ever pray for one who was to me so kind, and I look forward to the time when I shall rest beside the River of Life and hold sweet converse with the gentle spirit of Sister Sarah.

MARY FRANCES CARR.

Duality of the Deity.

Say first of God above or man below,
What can we reason, but from what we know?"

On this first principle, we believe it is a self-evident fact that God is dual. Two great principles united constitute Deity. The fact is referred to by the Apostle Paul. "The invisible things of Him, from the foundation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and godhead." Rom. i. 20. In the things that are made, or the universe, from inanimate matter up to man, we see the manifestation of two great, fundamental principles, viz: male and female. As God is the cause, of which the universe is the effect, and as every effect is like its cause, and the effect is positively male and female, it logically follows that the cause must be male and female. Thus it is equally true whether we say that God is male and female, or that an infinite perfection of the male and female principles is God.

At the creation, God (speaking as we think to his counterpart) said, "Let us make man in our own image, after our likeness. So God created man in his own image and likeness. In the image of God created he him, male and female created he them, and blessed them, and called their name Adam." Gen. i. 26, 27. Gen. v. 2. Here we see it took both the male and female principles to constitute Adam, who was created in the likeness of God. Thus it is emphatically stated that God made man male and female in his own image, which of course must be male and female. Every stream is like its fountain, and every kind of fruit like its parent tree.

We wish to be understood, when we say that mere physical development but imperfectly shadows forth the great distinctiveness of sex, more radically and beautifully expressed in the peculiar affectional, intellectual, moral, and spiritual natures of each, exquisitely adapting the sexes to each other's association.

Could God any more impart the distinct female element to man, unless it was a concomitant part of his own being, than he could impart to man, intelligence, love or goodness, unless these principles existed in Deity? Think of a God creating man, with the noble qualities of intuition, reason and justice, himself utterly devoid of these principles. Then think of the absurdity of his creating a universe half bearing principle or female, while in his own nature, he embodies only the male principle.

Jesus Christ was the first who revealed God as a father. God as a mother, will only be fully manifested in his second appearing. Though the term father implies mother; as natural things are typical of spiritual. And Jesus hath said, "Wisdom is justified of all her children." Mat. xi. 19. Luke, vii. 35. Wisdom, in those languages, is used in the feminine gender. Therefore wisdom having children is a mother. The same being referred to many times in sacred writ we quote a part. Doth not wisdom cry, "Receive my instruction and not silver; and knowledge rather than choice gold. The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was. When he prepared the heavens I was there, when he appointed the foundations of the earth. Then I was by him, as one brought up with him; and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him?" Prov. viii. Here we have it in plain language, that wisdom as the bearing spirit is the mother of all living, co-existent with the Father, rejoicing always before him as one brought up with him. This could not consistently apply to Jesus Christ, as the son of God, as the term son signifies a created being, hence not the first cause, or God; as father, must exist prior to son, and God is not a created being, but existed from everlasting. That it does apply to the Holy Ghost, we fully believe. For in the sense we have quoted Wisdom, we think the terms synonymous.

Here we find a consistent way to look through nature up to nature's God. Can there be a more natural or consoling idea than to view God as our Heavenly Parentage, father and mother? We have had earthly mothers kind and tender to us. Shall we then reject their true type, a Heavenly Mother, and voluntarily cast ourselves on the ocean of existence, half orphan?

We think the prevalence of this semi-atheism accounts in great measure for that deplorable want of wisdom, love and truth among men. For "He that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul; and all they that hate me, love death." Prov. viii. 36. On the other hand, the awful prevalence of sin and corruption is one prominent cause why mankind reject their mother in God. "For into a malicious soul wisdom will not enter, nor dwell in a body that is subject to sin."

The legitimate tendency of incorrect views on this subject, is to disorganize the whole creation of God. And as the female principle, is not recognized in Deity, of a consequence, it is but partially recognized in humanity; so that womanhood finds the curse pronounced upon her, "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee"—Gen. iii. 16,—redoubled, by the ignorance and tyranny of man. I presume our readers are aware that some nations to-day deny her claims to immortality, whose laws make merchandize of her, a condition in which her highest prerogative is to be a slave. Shocking barbarity! But how much does civilized man improve upon this, while he denies her any rights but such as he chooses to grant? His conception of how she may subserve his interest or pleasure may be more elevated than that of the Hindoo or Mussulman, but while he claims the prerogative of ruling her absolutely, for his own pleasure or interest, is not the principle the same?

It is suggested that benevolence and love on the part of man should be sufficient to guarantee justice to woman. Though this were true, still woman has inalienable rights as natural and sacred as those accorded to man. And rights which man by law or otherwise has no right to infringe upon. We are aware that a just conception of woman's true sphere has increased with the progress of civilization, as indeed it always must. But we must not conclude from this that perfection has been attained. Never! until we wash our hands clean from the rust and barbarism of ages of error, and practically confess to the principle that the rights of nature and justice, are paramount to the long established rights of custom or power. My friends! the right of power is the tyrant that waves his iron sceptre over earth's suffering millions, consigns the destiny of thousands to the nod of one, tramples on the weak and oppressed, and robs the defenceless. The history of woman's unnatural slavery to this principle, is the history of the infamy and degradation of our race, in all ages, and among all nations.

The increasing interest in, and agitation of the subject of woman's rights, woman suffrage, &c., are convincing evidence that the waters of truth are troubled, and a living prophecy that progress will be made in this direction. But we believe that woman's true sphere can be fully comprehended only by those who recognize the fact that God is mother as well as father. The promulgation of correct views of deity must ultimately result in the proper elevation of woman, and of a consequence, the race. And thus, through the ushering in of a purer and higher social system of righteousness and peace, we look for the dawn of the Glorious Millennium. C. E. S.

Growth.

Our entrance into this world is not accompanied with minds stored with problems, mathematically solved, nor with consciences graded to the admeasurement of what is right or wrong.

We enter this sphere with innate faculties capable of progress; the unfolding of which is very gradual. As infants, we see colors, hear sounds and observe forms; but not until the faculties have been educated to distinguish the colors, classify the sounds, separate form from size, and size from weight, do they become any more beneficial to ourselves or others, than the precious ore imbedded in the extraneous shale of the earth. This must be mined; subjected to the processes of crushing, washing, smelting, etc., before the gold can be of service to any, or fitted to be moulded into the multiform uses of gold. But the gold is none the less gold, when mixed with quartz, than in its service to the most noble enterprises.

The untutored child of nature, who, knowing only those needs which at the moment press upon him, makes no provision for the future, more than the raven for its food; yet there is in him an inherent consciousness of a higher power than himself; he "sees God in storms, and hears him in the winds;" when necessitated to retire without his usual meal, it is the punishment of the Great Spirit for his wrong doing; but when there is plenty of game, food in abundance, then are the gods pleased, and the heart of the savage made glad; and here we see untrained intuition. Making the distinction between right and wrong, being an intellectual process, is perfect or imperfect, correct or incorrect, according to the degree of the mind's education into the divine light.

To humanity is granted a knowledge and power that are denied to the brutal. These are used almost without limit, for the benefit or harm of the race; not merely that portion of it cotemporary with ourselves, but affecting the posterity of ages yet to come; and we find the blessings and iniquities of ages past acting on the platform of earth to-day! Is it generally considered how much we encourage the growth, or retard the progress of the Millennium to our fellows or successors? and when the great law of compensation is enforced, how shall we stand affected? There is in man the will and power to be kind, or to do harm. In his depraved condition, he retaliates wrongs done him, and apparent wrongs to his friends; distributing animosity, not only to the actual assailants, but often to the innocent relations. The first process of elevating such degraded humanity, is to enlighten it. If a man is physically diseased, then give him physiological and hygienic instruction and treatment to meet the case. If morally wrong, let him feel the administration of justice, and taught the golden rule. If spiritually degenerated, like the gold amid the accumulated quartz, let there be a process of separation, of burning the dross, until the gold only shall remain; and this can only be done by the action of the divine elements on the individual, as operates the sun and rain in the production of "first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear." Religious life is not perfected at a bound, nor by momentary conversion. Generations will pass, and the individual of to-day will yet see a way of progression. Moses was a school-master, and taught his people of righteousness on the earthly plane. Subsequent prophets foretold a glorious and more perfect day, when the knowledge of the Lord should not only enlighten us as to things of earthly righteousness, but to encompass the whole man, "as the waters cover the sea;" and this knowledge is found illustrated in the character of Jesus—the Christ—who was the first individual who put an end to the world in himself. In him, we find the fully-developed spiritual man. In him, may be seen the elements of eternal life! In us, may be discovered "the pearl of great price,"—eternal life—covered up with much earthly quartz; and the soul's dissatisfaction will search out the gem, and then, when found, will we sell all the quartz of an earthly life, and buy the new field of life, that alone contains our redemption!

POETICAL.

Lines,

Suggested by a Visit to the Shakers, near Albany.

BY CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN.

Mysterious worshippers!
Are ye indeed the things ye seem to be.
Of earth, yet of its iron influence free
From all that stirs
Our being's pulse, and gives to fleeting life [strife?]
What well the Hun hath termed "the rapture of the

Are the gay visions gone,
Those day dreams of the mind by fate there flung,
And the fair hopes to which the soul once clung?
And battled on;
Have ye outlived them? All that must have sprung
And quickened into life when ye were young?

Does memory never roam
To ties that, grown with years, ye idly sever,
To the old haunts, that ye have left forever
Your early homes;
Your ancient creed, once faith's sustaining lever,
The loved, who erst prayed with you—now may never?

Has not ambition's pæan
Some power within your hearts to wake anew
To deeds of higher emprise—worthier you,
Ye monkish men,
Than may be reap'd from fields?—do ye not rue
The drone-like course of life ye now pursue?

The camp, the council, all
That woos the soldiers to the field of fame—
That gives the sage his meed—the hard his name,
And coronal—
Bidding a people's voice their praise proclaim;
Can ye forego the strife nor own your shame?

6.
Have ye forgot your youth
When expectations soared on pinions high,
And hope shone out in boyhood's cloudless sky,
Seeming all truth—
When all look'd fair to fancy's ardent eye,
And pleasure wore an air of sorcery?

You, too! what early blight
Has withered your fond hopes, that ye thus stand,
A group of sisters 'mong this monkish band?
Ye creatures bright!
Has sorrow scored your brows with demon hand,
And o'er your hopes pass'd treachery's burning brand?

Ye would have graced right well
The bridal scene,—the banquet or the bowers,
Where mirth and revelry usurp the hours—
Where, like a spell,
Beauty is sovereign, where man owns its powers,
And woman's tread is o'er a path of flowers.

Yet seem ye not as those Within whose bosoms memory's vigils keep,
Beneath your drooping lids no passions sleep,
And your pale brows
Bare not the tracery of emotions deep—
Ye seem too cold and passionless to weep!

Answer

To "Lines by Charlotte Cushman."

We are indeed the things we seem to be,
Of earth, and from its iron influence free;
For we are they, or halt, or lame, or dumb,
"On whom the ends of this vain world are come."
We have outlived those day-dreams of the mind—
Those flattering phantoms, which so many bind.
All man-made creeds ("your faith's sustaining lever,")
We have forsaken, and have left forever!
To plainly tell the truth, we do not rue
The sober, godly course that we pursue;
But 'tis not we, who live the drossy lives,
But those who have their husbands or their wives!
But if by drones you mean they're lazy men,
Charlotte Cushman, take it back again;
For one with half an eye, or half a mind,
Can there see industry and wealth combin'd.
Your visit must have been exceeding short,
Or else your brain is of the shallow sort.

If camps and counells—soldiers, "fields of fame,"
Or yet, a people's praise or a people's blame,
Is all that gives the sage or bard his name,
We can "forego the strife, nor own our shame."

What great temptations you hold up to view
For men of sense or reason to pursue!
The praise of mortals!—what can it avail,
When all their boasted language has to fail?

"And sorrow has not scored with demon hand,
Nor o'er our hopes pass'd Treachery's burning brand,"
But where the sorrows and where treachery are,
I think may easily be made appear.
In "bridal scenes," in "banquets and in bowers"—
Mid revelry and variegated flowers,
Is where our mother Eve first felt their powers.

The "bridal scene," you say, we'd "grace right well";
"Laug syne" there our first parents blindly fell!—
The bridal scene!—Is this your end or aim?"
And can you this pursue "nor own your shame?"
If so, weak, pithy, superficial thing,
Drink, silent drink, the sick Hymenial spring.

The bridal scene! the banquet or the bowers,
Or "woman's [bed of thorns, or] path of flowers,"
Can't all persuade our souls to turn aside
To live in filthy lust or cruel pride.

Alas! Your path of flowers will disappear,
Even now a thousand thorns are pointing near;
Ah, here you find base "treachery's burning brand,"
And sorrows score the heart, nor spare the hand.
But here "Beauty's sovereign," so say you,
A thing that in one hour may lose its hue,
It lies upon the surface of the skin—
Aye, Beauty's self was never worth a pin;
But still it suits the superficial mind—
The slight observer of the human kind;
The airy, fleet, vain, and hollow thing,
That only feeds on wily flattering.

"Man owns its powers?"—and what will man not own
To gain his end, to captivate, dethrone?
The truth is this, whatever he may feign,
You'll find your greatest loss his greatest gain;
For like the bee he will improve the hour,
And all day long he'll buzz from flow'r to flow'r,
And when he sips the sweetness all away,
For aught he cares the flowers may all decay.

But here each other's virtues we partake,
Where men and women all those ills forsake;
True virtue spreads her bright Angelic wing,
While saints and seraphs praise the Almighty King.
And when the matter's rightly understood,
You'll find we labor for each other's good;
And this, Charlotte Cushman, is our aim,
"Can you forego this strife, nor own your shame?"

Now if you would receive a modest hint,
You'd keep your name at least, from public print,
Nor have it hoisted, handled round and round,
And echoed o'er the earth from mound to mound,
As the great advocate of (O, the name!)
Now can you think of this, nor "own your shame?"
But Charlotte, learn to take a deeper view
Of what your neighbors say, or neighbors do;
And when some flattering knaves around you tread,
Just think of what a SHAKER GIRL has said. S. E.

A Concise Statement

OF THE PRINCIPLES OF THE ONLY TRUE CHURCH, ACCORDING TO THE GOSPEL OF THE PRESENT APPEARANCE OF CHRIST, AS HELD TO AND PRACTISED BY THE FOLLOWERS OF THE LIVING SAVIOUR.

1st. We believe that the first light of salvation was given or made known to the patriarchs by promise; and they that believed in the promise of Christ, and were obedient to the command of God made known unto them, were the people of God, and were accepted of Him as righteous, or perfect in their generations; according to the measure of light and truth manifested unto them; which was as water to the ancles signified by Ezekiel's vision of the holy waters (chapter 47). And altho' they could not receive regeneration or the fullness of salvation from the fleshly or fallen nature in this life; because the fullness of time was not yet come, that they should receive the baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire; for the destruction of the body of sin, and purification of the soul. but Abram being called, and chosen of God as the father of the faithful, was received into covenant relation with God by promise; that in him (and his seed which was Christ) all the families of the earth should be blessed, and these earthly blessings, which were promised to Abram, were a shadow of gospel or spiritual blessings to come: and circumcision, though it was a seal of Abram's faith, yet it was but a sign of the mortification and destruction of the flesh by the gospel in a future day. Observe, circumcision did not cleanse the man from sin; but was a sign of the baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire: which is by the power of God manifested in divers operations and gifts of the spirit, as in the days of the apostles; which does in deed destroy the body of sin, or fleshly nature, and purify the man from all sin, both soul and body. So that Abram, though in the full faith of the promise, yet as he did not receive the substance of the thing promised, his hope of eternal salvation was in Christ, by the gospel to be attained in the resurrection from the dead.

2d. The second dispensation was the law that was given of God to Israel, by the hand of Moses; which was a further manifestation of that salvation which was promised through Christ by the gospel, both in the order and ordinances which was instituted and given to Israel, as the church and people of God according to that dispensation; which was as waters to the knees, Ezekiel 47, by which they were distinguished from all the families of the earth. For, while they were strictly obedient to all the commands, ordinances, and statutes, that God gave them, they were approved of God according to the promise for life; and blessing was promised unto them in the line of obedience: cursing and death, in disobedience: for God, who is ever jealous for the honor and glory of his own great name, always dealt with them according to his word; for while they were obedient to the command of God and purged out sin from amongst them, God was with them, according to his promise. But when they disobeyed the command of God, and committed sin, and became like other people, the hand of the Lord was turned against them; and those evils came upon them which God had threatened; so we see that they that were wholly obedient to the will of God, made known in that dispensation, were accepted as just, or righteous: yet as the dispensation was short, they did not attain that salvation which was promised in the gospel; so that as it respected the new-birth, or real purification of the man from all sin, the law made nothing perfect, but was a shadow of good things to come; their only hope of eternal redemption was in the promise of Christ, by the gospel to be attained in the resurrection from the dead. Acts of the Apostles xxvi. 6, 7.

3d. The third dispensation was the gospel of Christ's first appearance, in the flesh: and that salvation which took place in consequence of his life, death, resurrection, and ascension at the right hand of the Father, being accepted in his obedience, as the first-born among many brethren, he received power and authority to administer the power of the resurrection and eternal judgment to all the children of men; so that he has become the author of eternal salvation to all that obey him; and as Christ has this power in himself, he did administer power and authority to his church at the day of pentecost, as his body: with all the gifts that he had promised them, which was the first gift of the Holy Ghost, as an indwelling comforter to abide with them forever; and by which they were baptized into Christ's death; death to all sin; and were in the hope of the resurrection from the dead, through the operation of the power of God, which wrought in them. And as they had received the substance of the promise of Christ come in the flesh, by the gift and power of the Holy Ghost, they had power to preach the gospel in Christ's name to every creature, and to administer the power of God to as many as believed, and were obedient to the gospel which they preached, and also to remit and retain sin in the name and authority of Christ on earth.

Church and State—No. 2.

In our first issue, we commenced a series of papers, being an inquiry into the foundational principles of the civil and religious governments of the United States, and of the United Societies. Extremes meet. The extreme of skepticism towards theological and religious ideas, when interblended with statutory laws and civil institutions, ultimated itself in the United States Government. This has recently been demonstrated, and ably commented upon, by the "New York Tribune," showing that the Senate pronounced it a non-sectarian and unreligious government, as follows:—

"A Ray of Light from the Past."

"The theologians who insist that our government rests upon an implied assumption or recognition of the divine authority of the Christian religion, and who wish to make that recognition palpable, by an amendment of the Constitution, will find a hard nut to crack in the following provision in the treaty of Tripoli, made under the administration of Washington, in 1796, when the fundamental principles of the government, and the ideas and purposes of its founders were yet fresh in the minds of the people.

"As the government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion; as it has in itself no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquillity of Mussulman's; and as the said States never have entered into any war or act of hostility against any Mohammedan nation; it is declared by the parties, that no pretext arising from religious opinions shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two countries."

"To this declaration, which bears the stamp of the Senate's approval, is appended the name of George Washington, who held, that his speculative faith entitled him to no privileges, as a citizen, that were not common to all others, of whatever religious belief or unbelief. The Declaration, moreover, for aught that appears, received the assent of the whole American people, as embodying an essential and fundamental principle of the Government.

"Let us not, in the very hour of our rejoicing over the downfall of the civil authority of the Church in the Roman States, countenance the attempt to remove the barriers erected by our fathers against a union of Church and State in this Republic."

And this is a principle essential to its own self-preservation.

The mental, intellectual, and spiritual freedom of the human mind in all its phases (when not incarnated in acts to the injury of the same rights in others), was what the revolutionary fathers fought for, and germinally embodied in the United States' constitution.

The opposite extremes of Spiritualists and religiously-exercised people, like the French Prophets, the Moravians, and Dunkers; together with New Lights, Breakers, and Quakers, feared God exceedingly, and were mediums of influence from the spirit land. These often spoke and acted as they were moved upon by the invisible souls of disembodied men and women seeking to work the work of God on earth.

Out of these arose Mother Ann and her little company of devoted souls; and through their labors the elements became ultimated and organized in the religious Communism of the Shakers—the United Societies

From the first there was a deep sympathy between these apparently opposite extremes—the respective founders of two systems in nowise antagonistic,—which became incorporated in a purely civil and a purely religious government. They were nearer together, and more alike, than either of them understood. Both were infidel to the popular orthodoxy of Christendom, as exhibited in the combined church and and state organizations of the civilized world. They disbelieved alike, and both were terribly in earnest.

While the skeptical powers were plighting their lives and faith and sacred honor in fighting the battles of humanity against monarchy—the church and state union—the divine right of kings—with its concomitants, the religious spiritualists were fighting, in "battles of shaking" (often to be heard a mile distant), the anti-Christian theology of a Trinity of masculine Gods; the vicarious atonement for sin through the material blood of Jesus; the resurrection of physical bodies, ages after death; the eternally-lost condition of all souls, except a few nominal Christians; the blending together of generation and regeneration, of war and peace, of selfishness and communion of saints.

While the Shakers deprecated persecution for conscience' sake, and only to be met with from the priesthood of anti-Christ, the skeptics sought, by a constitutional provision, to render it—persecution—legally impossible within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Art. 1.—"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

Art. 37, First Constitution of the State of New York.—"And whereas we are required, by the benevolent principles of rational liberty, not only to expel civil tyranny, but also to guard against that spiritual oppression and intolerance where-with the bigotry and ambition of weak and wicked priests and princes have scourged mankind; the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever hereafter be allowed within this State to all mankind."

Art. 39.—"And whereas the ministers of the gospel are, by their profession, dedicated to the service of God and the cure of souls and ought not to be diverted from the great duties of their function; therefore, no minister of the gospel, or priest of any denomination whatsoever, shall, at any time hereafter, under any pretense or description whatever, be eligible to, or capable of, holding any civil or military office or place within this State."

These enactments plainly indicate the character and design of the men who framed them; and, as burnt children dread the fire, so did those skeptics go, even over the line of equal rights to discriminate against a class of men—Gospel ministers—who, of all others, ought logically, on the assumption that Christianity is par excellence the religion, to be the safest depositaries of civil power.

It is because worldly, Gentile Christianity includes elements that are not in and of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, that its ministers are thus disfranchised, in self-defence, by the sovereign people.

William Pitt, in an essay on superstition speaks of a "certain unnatural passion which we will call religious hatred,—fixed, constant, deep-rooted, and immortal. All other passions rise and fall, die and revive again; but this of religious hatred rises and grows, every day, stronger upon the mind as we grow more religious, because we hate for God's sake, and for the sake of those poor souls, too, who have the misfortune not to believe as we do: and can we, in so good a cause, hate too much? The more thoroughly we hate, the better we are; and the more mischief we do to the bodies and estates of those infidels and heretics, the more do we show our love to God. This is religious zeal; and this has been called Divinity. But remember, the only true Divinity is Humanity."—London Journal, 1733.

Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" opens thus:—"I believe in one God, and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life. I believe the equality of man; and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and in endeavoring to make our fellow creatures happy. The world is my country, to do good is my religion," was this unbeliever's motto.

Thus was the American Government established, which was in no sense theological; but a purely civil government, belonging equally to all its citizens, whatever their beliefs or unbeliefs, from the Atheist to the Quaker. Universal suffrage for white men, and universal liberty for white people, was fully and amply secured. Thenceforth rulers were to be the people's choice and the people's servants; and not, as heretofore the people's masters. And above all in value was the perpetual right of Constitutional amendment.

Jefferson says: "At our first legislative session, after the Declaration of Independence we abolished the law of Entails and Primogeniture, and divided the lands of intestates equally among their heirs. These laws, drawn by myself, laid the axe to the root of pseudo-aristocracy." He also proposed a system of free schools, which was too far ahead of the times to be adopted. And, on that account, many forms of evil were reserved to be purged away by succeeding generations, under the power of Constitutional amendments in the good time they saw coming. Prominent among these was slavery and its primal cause, land monopoly, or unlimited landed possessions.

There was to be a new heaven, or Church, and a new earth, or civil Government, wherein should dwell righteousness. We have seen the foundations of both of these laid in the Revolutionary times, and by men and women whose minds were adapted to the work. The removal of the great curse of slavery, so adverse to the genius of the government and to the principles and desires of its real founders, could be accomplished only by a similar class of minds raised up and inspired by those original governmental founders in the spiritual world. And thus was opened the second of the seven degrees in the onward progress of our Government towards a condition of rational and perfect national righteousness. And as Lincoln was the central personage in the great national tragedy which ensued, we will introduce him on the stage and see what is the evidence, and what are the facts.

W. H. Herndon says: "One or two preliminary remarks will help us to understand why he (Lincoln) disagreed with the Christian world, in its principles as well as in its theology. In the first place, Mr. Lincoln's was a purely logical mind; and, secondly, Mr. Lincoln was purely a practical man. He had no fancy or imagination, and not much emotion. He was a realist, as opposed to an idealist. As a general rule, it is true, that a purely logical mind has not much hope, if it ever has faith, in the unseen and unknown. He was terribly, vexatiously, skeptical.

"I became acquainted with Mr. Lincoln in 1834, and I think I knew him to the day of his death. He came to Illinois in 1830, and settled in New Salem, Ill. It was here that Mr. Lincoln became acquainted with a class of men the world never saw the like of before or since. They were large men; large in body, and large in mind; hard to whip, and never to be fooled. They were a bold, daring, and reckless set of men. They were men of their own minds—believed what was demonstrable; were men of great common sense.

"With these men Mr. Lincoln was thrown; with them he lived, and with them he moved and almost had his being. They were skeptics, all—seoffers, some. These seoffers were good men; and their seoffs were protests against theology,—loud protests against the follies of Christianity. They had never heard of Theism, or the better religious thoughts of this age. They riddled all divines; and not unfrequently made them skeptics—disbelievers like themselves. They were a jovial, healthful, generous, social, true, and manly set of people.

"In 1835, he wrote a small work on

Infidelity and intended to have it published. The book was an attack upon the whole grounds of Christianity; and especially was it an attack upon the idea that Jesus was the Christ, the true and only-begotten Son of God, as the Christian world contends.

"His friend Hill, who had an eye to Lincoln's popularity, who saw in him a rising man, and wished him success, and believing that, if the book were published, it would kill Lincoln for ever, snatched it from his hand and put it into a hot stove.

"When accused of being an infidel, by his political enemies, during a canvass, he never denied the charge,—'would die first.'

"Lincoln did not believe in a special creation; his idea being, that all creation was an evolution under law. He did not believe that the Bible was a special revelation from God: did not believe in miracles, as understood by the Christian world. He believed in universal inspiration and miracles, under law. He believed that all things—both matter and mind—were governed by law, universal, absolute and eternal. Law, to Lincoln, was everything. Yet he, like Paine, believed in God and in immortality."—Index.

"I maintain that Lincoln was a deeply religious man, at all times, and in all places, in spite of his transient doubts, although not a Christian."—Index.

I have reason to know, that Lincoln did not believe largely in God; and that, before his death he became a Spiritualist, and was, like his bosom friend, Stanton, a warm sympathizer with the rational and simple faith of the Shakers. He acted well his part before he left the stage of action. That accounts for the Shakers not being "wiped out" during the late war.

Inasmuch as Ann Lee and her companions came by revelation to America, having been spiritually informed and fully assured that the revolution would be successful, and that a Gentile Pentecostal Church would be established upon earth, which, like the Jewish Pentecostal Church, would abjure physical sexuality, selfish rights of property, destructive carnal warfare, wasteful pride, and foolish pomp in dress and equipage, or in vain surroundings in natural things; and would build up community homes on the basis of personal purity of flesh and spirit, and holiness—the perfecting of the individual character.

Disconnected by a discrete degree from the civil government, it is the Church in its true character and order, destined to shine and operate upon the civil government, as the sun upon the moon and earth—the primal source of all vitality and virility, and the Ruler of day and night.

"The law of righteousness shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem"—the civil government—which will continue to progress until it shall be the means of securing all the "inalienable rights" to both man and woman, and the necessities and comforts of life to all the people, each one "sitting under his own vine and fig-tree, with none," moved by spirit of war, "to make them afraid." For wars shall cease to the ends of the earth, in all nations that will accept the reign and rule of the "Prince of Peace!" Reorganization without Disintegration!"

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Ann Lee.

For the greater part of nine years did Ann Lee suffer thus—the severest mental agony—though she experienced seasons of relief, during which she was instructed by heavenly visions and divine revelations why God was thus dealing with her; and with this understanding she bore with fortitude the agonies of preparation, that were fitting her as a receptacle and medium for the Christ Spirit. The revelations made known to her, were the necessity of self-abasement, sorrow for, and departure from sin—the antipodes of that instruction that provides another to die a physical death, to atone for the millions that continue in and unto sin.

Ann realized the full loss suffered by humanity, but was not yet aware of what the foundation of sin consisted; nor could she yet see any prospect of relief in the preaching or practices of theological teachers, for the salvation of souls from sin here, or for their redemption hereafter. She agonized to know the cause of human woes, and of their reparation. While lying in the Manchester jail, incarcerated for preaching against "those fleshly lusts that war against the soul," "the mystery of iniquity," as made known to her by directing agencies, she saw, and experienced the manifestation of the baptism of the Christ Spirit—the same that made Jesus, the Christ; and the same that will make every man and woman Christ, when prepared; and the manifestations of this Christ through her, taught many strange things—of the new heavens and earth; of the true Resurrection, consisting of living above the life of generative lusts; of virgin purity being a component of eternal life, and the impossibility of enjoying the life of the Spirit while engaging in the pleasures of the flesh!

Her testimonies against nature corrupt were the intonations of her directing spirit-agencies, and often brought the deepest embarrassments upon her in their delivery; for she was human, and knew how keenly these testimonies set; but her Christ-duty was superior to human frailties, and she delivered herself "as one having authority."* After her imprisonment in Manchester, she was acknowledged as a leader in spiritual things, and was ever after known as Mother Ann. The religious exercises of her band were singing and dancing, shaking and shouting, speaking in strange tongues, and prophesying after the manner of the Primitive Christian Church.

From this time, Mother Ann testified by the Christ Spirit, against all lustful gratifications as the source and foundation of all human misery; that no soul could live in the generative sphere, and practice the regeneration of Christ simultaneously; that nature-corrupt was not only unfit for earthly replenishment, but that reproduction, in its most pure, elevated condition, was positively unchristian and uneternal! She delivered her testimony in the spirit of love, but with such heart-searching power, that many stood convicted of the truth, and acknowledged her gospel as correct. In some, the home-thrust truths kindled the most bitter spirit of persecution, particularly among the professors of theology, in whom the lusts of the world, and the religion that sanctioned, and wedded lusts to lusts, were combined. Of her experiences with some of these persecutors, we purpose treating upon in our next, just a century after their occurrence.

* A woman, of Cleveland, Ohio, occupying an elevated position in society, while under the influence of the Spirit, declared that "we married women, living in the gratifications of the flesh with our husbands, are nothing but legalized prostitutes;" and when learning what she had said, nearly crazed with mortification, even after realizing the truth of her words.

Items.

Behold the latter day appears,
And things mysterious greet our ears,
Which seems to make this wise demand,
"Let him that readeth, understand."

It has been asserted that the Shaker males hate the females, and vice versa. This is not true; we love each other better than we can express.

It has been said, "The Shakers are the followers of an 'old woman!'" This is not true in any wise: If "old woman" is intended to signify Ann Lee's age, it is false, as she never lived to be aged. As Ann Lee made it the work of her life to crucify the old woman and her deeds of depravity, the Shakers can more consistently be called the followers of the new man (Jesus), and the new woman (Ann).

RIGHT AND WRONG.—"If you don't go to school, my son, who will teach you what is right or wrong?" "I don't get teacht, I find it out." "And how do you find it out?" "By observing that right works for a shilling an hour, while wrong lives on it!"

All persons able to walk should exercise daily in the open air.

"Be careful lest a too warm desire for distinction should deceive you into pursuits that may cover you with shame, by setting your incapacity and slender abilities in full light."

POETICAL.

Spirit Examination.

What is in thy heart for God?
Search its depths, and see
If thou hast a place for Him,
Kept in purity.
'Mid the treasures of thy life—
Treasures without strife—
Hast thou ever for the Lord,
A willing sacrifice?

What is in thy heart for God?
Are thy joys of earth?
Or hast thou deep happiness
Of enduring worth?
And art thou a fruitful branch—
Of the living tree,
Clothed with innocence, with peace
And true humility?

What is in thy heart for God?
Do thy hopes ascend
Unto truth, and holiness
That shall never end?
Is thy love a living fount,
Gushing, bright and clear?
Doth the image of the Lord
Within its source appear?

All I have I give to God,
And his blessed cause;
Praying, that my life may be Guided by his laws.
Lead me, holy spirit, down,
'Till I see my loss.
Strengthen me, to do the work
That cometh by the cross.

C. D., Mt. L., N. Y.

During the month of January, 1871, the angels said "Come!" to two interesting young sisters—Marietta Moore and Mary J. Maffit, of Mt. Lebanon, N. Y. Among the treasures of the latter was found the following tribute from one of her companions—Charlotte—whose affection we here make public, without her knowledge:

Together we began to tread
The consecrated ground;
Together entered here, the home,
Where grace and truth abound.
Together we have sought for faith,
Conviction, power, and light;
Together asked for angel's strength,
To guide us in the right.

Together we have toiled, to earn
The love that is so pure,
Which clothes the soul with patience true
All sorrows to endure.
But now doth sickness intervene,
To part us for a time;
Still we will struggle to possess
The angel-life, divine.

True love and friendship shall not cease
For you, my sister dear;
Though you may enter into realms,
Beyond this mortal sphere—
We still will seek, as one in Christ,
For purity and grace;
For light and truth, our souls to guide—
Our errors to erase.

And I will pray, and you will pray,
That we may brighter grow;
And, while you toil in yonder home,
I'll toil in mine below.
Now, dear companion, take my love;
I'll help to bear you through;
And spirit friends will bear you hence,
To scenes of fairer view.

"A great mind is above doing an unjust act; above giving away to buffoonery; above giving away to grief; and it would be invulnerable if compassion did not prey upon its sensibility."

Christian Distinction—No. 1.

"Brethren, be joint imitators of me, and observe those who conduct themselves as ye have us for an example; for many so conduct, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even with tears, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ; whose end is destruction, whose God is sensuality, whose glory is in their shame, and whose mind is devoted to earthly things. For our citizenship is in the heavens, from which we also are expecting the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall transform the body of our humiliation, so as to be conformable to the body of his glory, according to the energy by which he can subject all things to himself." Phil. iii. 17-21. (Original.)

These words of the apostle inform us, that connected with the Church of Christ in his day, were many whose lives were not in accordance with the profession they made, and he considered it necessary to caution those to whom he wrote, against their pernicious example. They were mere sensualists, devoted to the pleasures of the appetites and the passions, and their thoughts engrossed with earthly things. In opposition to such, the apostle exhorted the Philippians to be imitators as one body of him and of those who lived like him. "For," said he, "our citizenship or community is in the heavens, or heavenly world, from which we are looking for the Saviour who shall transform us—the body of Christ, the Church of the faithful, who are now bearing the cross and enduring the various afflictions incident to this state of humiliation—so completely in spirit and in character, that we shall be fitted for intimate and personal association with those who constitute the church in glory, with whom our names are already enrolled."

This, then, is the essential distinction between the genuine followers of Christ, and those who merely adhere to his church without possessing its real life; the former, instead of hating the cross of Christ, cherish it as the means by which they retain an intimate relation to the body of Christ, so that his very life and spirit circulate through them as the life of the tree circulates through every branch; the latter are hostile to this cross, because it interferes with their sensual enjoyments; its design being as the word implies, to crucify their sensuality, to destroy their very life; not indeed for any real harm to the person, but that the life of Christ, which is the essential life of heaven, and is the opposite of all sensuality, may be substituted for that. They are enemies of the cross, because they are idolaters; and like almost all idolaters, their god is self. Self they worship daily with as much fidelity, as the most zealous devotee who burns incense to his idol! The class of persons to whom the apostle alludes, may not have been addicted to all kinds of sensuality, yet it is evident they must have been to some of its worst forms, for "their glory was in their shame."

They had commenced to follow Christ, perhaps had run well for a season, but from some cause had ceased to bear the cross which was severe against their sensual inclinations, and preferred to be borne down on the current of pleasure, rather than to stem it, so that they became, finally, the enemies of that which was intended for their salvation. The end of this, as the apostle saw, would be their ruin, hence his tears on their account.

The forms of sensualism are various, and are vastly different in degree, according to the length of time and intensity with which one gives himself to them.

But what is sensualism? Is it the mere fact of deriving enjoyment through the senses? That certainly cannot be, for such is the very constitution of man, that the legitimate exercise of the senses is invariably attended with pleasure, and pain is the result of their perverted action. To the eye that dwells upon the various objects of external nature, the mountain and the valley; the ocean, the lake and the river; the forest clad in its summer dress; the prairie with its vast variety of flowers; the cultivated field with its accompaniment of flocks, herds and dwellings, are a source of exhaustless charm. These enjoyments are in themselves pure as the breath of heaven. So the ear is delighted with sweet sounds that greet it from every side, and the taste with agreeable flavors; and God intended these should be. But the eye may look upon forbidden objects; the ear may listen to sounds that pervert the passions; the taste may be intoxicated with the excess of delights; and their entire action may become perverted, instead of being normal, or in accordance with the highest physical, mental and moral welfare of the individual. When this is the case the life of the person is mere sensualism. The legitimate exercise of the senses tends to give a healthy tone to the body, sound action to the mental faculties, and a harmonious growth and development to the moral powers; but their perverse action tends to the very reverse of this. In the body, disease is engendered; the mental faculties are confused, and consequently irregular and uncertain in their action; and the moral powers exhibit an insane condition, just in proportion as the senses have become perverted by abuse. With reason, then, may it be said, the end of the sensualist is destruction. Sensualism is a mighty torrent—a flood that sweeps all before it that is really valuable to man. No matter what may be his natural endowments. He may have a physical form that rivals in beauty and majesty that of Apollo; his intellectual endowments may be of the first order; he may have the ability to move multitudes by his eloquence, and influence to action the minds of thousands by the splendor of his diction, and the moral beauty of his thoughts. There have been very many such. In the beginning of their career, they gave promise of a brilliant course through life, and a glorious termination.

But oh, the disappointment of cherished hopes, and the despair of trusting hearts! The Apostle Paul is not the only one who has had to weep over the fall of those who had seemingly entered upon a course of usefulness and happiness, and promised so much to the cause of virtue. Thousands of others have wept for a similar cause. Many of the brightest intellects have been completely obscured, by drinking of the cup of sensual pleasure; at first, sparingly, but afterwards with the deepest draughts. Men, eminent in political life, and capable of directing the affairs of nations; men filling the desk of the religious teacher, endowed with the rarest gifts of persuasion; men in every condition of life, those occupying the highest places of trust, as well as those pursuing its more common courses—have been swept into the vortex of ruin. Men, too, of every age; those of mature years and large experience, and the youth animated with the freshness and vigor of life's spring-time and the expectation of great enjoyments in the future. I am forcibly reminded of the history of one, who had before him a most hopeful future, and brilliant career; a member of one of our New England colleges. As a scholar, he stood high in the estimation of his instructors, and easily surpassed in scholarship and general talent, all his competitors in the race for distinction. But he had tasted of the inebriating cup, and gradually the sensual gained the ascendancy over the mental. The force of talent enabled him to fill the first place of honor at the finishing up of his academical course, in spite even, of the bewitching and bewildering power of the wine cup; but after that, he went down, down, down,— "his end was destruction."

Would that his were a solitary case among the young! but it is not so. The god of sensuality, whom many of them serve, rules them with a terrible power. It may be at first, they do not despise the cross of Christ—their heart and conscience may approve of it, though their lives are in contradiction to it. They respect virtue, and admit its inestimable value; but the seductive power of appetite prevails over their regard for the virtuous, and honor, truth and conscience are wrecked one by one. "Their end is destruction." O how many of the young are drawn by the enticing charm of sensuality into the vortex of ruin! though they never suspected it was taking them thither, nor intended that it should.

It presents itself to them, under various disguises, so that they seem not aware of its true character. Now, it is the nerve-exciting and brain-bewildering drink; and now, it is the excitement of the licentious passion. But it always leads its victims downward to the pit of darkness and death. And what a destruction is theirs! What ruin of high hopes and glorious promises! what worse than mere waste, what desolation of heart and brain, are often beheld while yet life remains to the wretched ones! What dreadful wreck of intellectual faculties, which were designed for the happiness and glory of the individual, and to contribute to the well-being of others! What wide-spread desolation among the moral powers, that should have allied him so closely to all that is holy! Is it not destruction indeed, that those capable of attaining to so much that is pure and elevating in every possible sense, should have rendered themselves incapable of it, and have become only fit for the opposite? How delightful to the pure heart and sound mind, is the thought of a Supreme Intelligence, possessed of every possible perfection; of the pure occupants of a world of beauty and grandeur, living together in love, peace and perpetual harmony—but characters directly the opposite of these, how dreadful to contemplate!

Yet of the latter, there are multitudes even, upon the earth, who have been led to their deplorable condition through their indulgence in a sensual life. This is a world clothed in beauty for man's sake; and had he lived, and did he still live in accordance with the highest laws of his being, it would be a world of perpetual charm to all, instead of being, as it frequently is to many, a prison, a dungeon, a pest house, physically and morally. The convictions of our reason confirm the opinion that this would be a world of happiness to us all, even though trials and sorrows might be necessary for our perfection, if we were all careful to maintain the eternal laws of rectitude. But now the wail of woe and despair ascends from many a heart that finds no rest. "Their tears are their meat, day and night"—tears of anguish forced from them, because of violated law; and not those of gratitude for blessings daily received and enjoyed, nor those of satisfaction in the way of self-denial, or in the daily discharge of duties that are always attended with pleasure, however exacting of patience and perseverance, and the exercise of every faculty. These faculties lie in ruin; and in the abyss of misery where they are, they bewail their neglect of reproof, from friends and their own conscience. They "have worshipped the beast," sensuality. Instead of enduring the cross of Christ, and despising the shame, they have despised the cross, and are now enduring the shame and wretchedness resulting from perverting the ways of life.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

A Dialogue.

Written for, and rehearsed at an Annual Social Gathering, in Canaan Pine Grove, N. Y., by Ann, Martha, Mary J., Charlotte, Melissa, Margaret, Sarah and Catharine.

M.—In connection with our subject there are three words I would like to ask the meaning of; they are Agriculture, Horticulture and Aboriculture.

Mar.—I should think you would know the meaning of Agriculture, as we have dwelt on that subject some time.

M.—I want to know the direct significance of the term in connection with the others.

Mar.—Agriculture is the broad term for the cultivation of the farm. It is the art of tilling and manuring the ground; and consisting in sowing, mowing, reaping, &c., also the management of different soils, and the cultivation of forest timber. It is said that the highest encomium that could be given to a man of Rome, was, that he cultivated his own spot of ground well! The most illustrious among them applied themselves to it, and their dictators were taken from the plow.

C.—Horticulture is simply the art of cultivating gardens.

Mary—Aboriculture is the art of cultivating trees and shrubs.

S.—As you have introduced the subject of Aboriculture, I would be pleased to know something in reference to trees; I could scarcely tell the names of those under whose broad canopy we are now so nicely sheltered (looking up), but, I believe I do know the beautiful maple, the stately pine, and a few others.

A.—It is necessary, not only to know trees by their leaves, but by the formation of their bark, their texture, grain of their wood and their uses.

Char.—I think that Sarah will have to apply to Mary for information, as she, unlike her companions, always lived on woodland, where she undoubtedly acquired a knowledge of trees which we have not.

Mary.—'Tis true, that,
Away from artificial life—
Far from the city's din and strife,
I had a home 'mid forests grand,
The beauteous works of nature's hand;
There 'neath the leafy bower I often strayed,
And some acquaintance with the trees have made.

Nor is my home less beautiful now, although more in the region of cultivation; and I purposely selected some leaves, which I will present to see if any or all could tell the names of the trees from which they were gathered. (They are passed around, the names are all told).

S.—I do not know all of them, but recognize the leaves of the fruit trees.

M.—I know more of the leaves, than I should of the wood, if you had brought specimens.

Mary.—We will no doubt feel an increasing interest in the study of aboriculture, and may pursue it to some extent, in examining trees and shrubs.

A.—Very little I know on the subject, but an interest is being awakened in my mind, especially as our home is becoming more and more beautified, by the increase of forest and shade trees, which have been set out within a few years. Our Union Grove seems to be an object of admiration, so rapid is its growth under the care and culture of its guardian.

Martha.—It might properly be called an Arboretum; but we prefer calling it by the simple name of Union Grove. I have been located on the east side of the dwelling ever since the first saplings were set out (bean poles we called them), so meagre was their appearance, and even thought it would be a good plan to set some scarlet runners around them to relieve the monotony of the scene, and then it would be a point of economy in saving the gardener's labor; at the same time using the soil, for we were certain that the trees would never come to anything! But good Elder Frederick Evans never entertained such an idea; he set them out to grow, and grow they did, luxuriantly! Bathed in the morning sunlight, watered by frequent showers, and under careful cultivation, they have attained a surprising growth, being interspersed with a variety of fruit and forest trees equally thrifty. I almost imagine, sometimes, that a miniature Eden is before me. Contemplating the scene one beautiful Sabbath morning, I penned the following lines, which (if you would like to hear them) I will ask Margaret to read.

All.—(We would.)

Mar.—I can repeat them—

(She repeats).—"I have watched, with interest, the growth of yonder tree, since first transplanted, a sapling, from its native forest. It was set with care in its new abode; down in the soil its fibrous roots struck deeply, and coursed their way around the crevices of rocks and through the fallow ground. Nurtured by frequent showers, the broad, free sunlight and a healthy atmosphere, its branches spread with rapid growth, and each successive year increased to profusion the richest foliage. Oft has the pruning knife, in the hands of the careful cultivator, lopped the surplus twigs, that it might attain symmetry of form and strength of limb. Now, how beautiful to behold! supple in every part, yielding to the gentle zephyrs, each leaf with graceful motion moves; or 'neath the power of the mighty wind, its strongest branches bow submissively. Amid its leafy bowers the songsters of the woods carol their sweetest notes, to cheer the heart and gladden the pathway of life. O home of mine! how many joys surround thee. I thank God that my soul has been transplanted from without the wilderness of nature into thy blessed soil, and, as the material elements cause the growth and development of the natural plant, so may the rains of heaven, the sunlight of truth, and the spiritual atmosphere of purity and love, cause my soul to grow and expand in the divine life."

Char.—You have portrayed the beauties of the hillside vividly. Its infancy contrasts strangely with that grand old forest above it; I know it presents a most enchanting, lovely sight. But, Martha, I am astonished—I thought your ideas were more general; but, from your remarks, I conclude that you have confined your observation to one tree only. I should be glad to see the tree that has called forth such rich effusions as we have been favored to hear."

Mar.—I should, too. I have never been able to ascertain which one it was.

Martha.—That was but expressive of the whole scene, and I have gathered leaves of the various trees composing the grove—fifty varieties—and have learned most of their names; these I have brought for our pleasure and instruction.

(A folio is now exhibited with leaves arranged in order, and names attached. They are examined by the company with remarks on their beauty, the fineness of their texture, the variety of forms, shades of color, &c.; they then are set aside for future examination.)

THE SHAKER is offered to Subscribers at cost price, and only needs to be read to be appreciated.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Shaker Sermon—No. 1.

BY H. L. EADES, SOUTH UNION, KENTUCKY.

I begin my discourse to-day with the enunciation of two or three aphorisms; neither of which, I presume, any honest, unbiased mind of ordinary comprehension will have an inclination to gainsay; they consist of a simple declaration of the harmony of truth.

1st. All truths harmonize, spiritual and natural; one truth cannot be opposed to another truth; hence, any two statements or propositions that antagonize or conflict, one or the other, or both must be false.

2d. In the end, nothing but truth will have been or can be advantageous to any soul; hence, it would be wisdom in us to cast off all prejudice and prepossession, and make any required sacrifice to obtain the "knowledge of the truth," especially that sacred truth by which we expect to obtain our redemption and the salvation of the soul. It is necessary that some of our discourses should be mainly argumentative or theological, from the fact, that mere declaration of truth, scriptural or otherwise, does not in this day seem to satisfy the inquisitive mind, and people must learn to think correctly before they can either speaking or act correctly.

Well nigh two centuries ago a certain philosopher penned the following:

1st. That a man use no words but such as he makes the sign of a certain determined object in his mind in thinking, which he can make known to another.

2d. That he use the same word steadily for the sign of the same immediate object of his mind in thinking.

3d. That he join those words together in propositions, according to the grammatical rules of the language he speaks in.

4th. That he unites those sentences into a coherent discourse. Thus, and thus only, I humbly conceive, any one may preserve himself from the confines and suspicions of jargon.

Were all men to observe this rule, which I most sincerely approve, there would be but little difference among men on any subject; with their terms clearly defined, strictly applied and adhered to, no two really honest men can very widely differ; each would yield in turn in theology and ethics, just as they are compelled to do in mathematics.

Every rational creature will admit that the salvation of the soul is, or should be, paramount to every earthly consideration whatever, and he who fails in the attainment of this, fails in all, and he who is fortunate enough to secure this, lacks in nothing that is worth contending for: "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" Matt. xvi: 26. Since, then, from these words of our Saviour, a man's soul is of more value to him than all worlds beside, he ought to be willing to forsake the world, with all its habits, customs, maxims, and practices, for his soul's sake.

It appears that this globe now contains over 1,000,000,000 souls, and there are 1,100 different religions; one creed, if I may so speak, for every hundred millions, differing from all the rest; and, as there cannot be but one right way, a hollow cry comes up from the "vasty deep," asking which one of the 1,100 is right; because any line diverging in the minutest degree from the right one must be wrong, and the further it is traveled the more distant the traveler will be from the right way. Hence it becomes a matter of the utmost importance for each one to know he is right—not to guess at it, but know it. You will ask me, then, if there is any possibility of acquiring this knowledge. To which I give an affirmative answer. In the words of the Saviour, as to doctrine, he says: "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God," &c. Matt. iii: 8. Not guess at it, but know. As to his true disciples and followers, he has given us one criterion or mark—and one only—by which they are to be known—"Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles?" But after all this, and without troubling yourselves to look into the different sects for the good fruits, which are the only real evidence, you rest in your easy chair, simply saying you know,

The Good must merit God's peculiar care,
Yet who but God can tell us which they are?

thus giving evidence of one of two conditions, viz: Your own lukewarmness and lack of interest in your soul's salvation, or your infidelity respecting the existence of any religious body where those fruits can be found; and some of you, when you have found the fruits and acknowledge them, then fault the doctrine—at the same time acknowledge you do not keep the commandments of God; and it is only such that should know of the doctrines or should presume to judge them.

Nearly all men agree that among the thousand different forms of religious belief, some one must be right, and as before said, the consequence is, that every other one that essentially differs, must be wrong, and inadequate to the purposes of salvation. Every religious system has for its foundation or formation, some reference to a Supreme Being or Beings, who is, or are, able to reward them for well doing, and punish them for evil doing; and as this seems to be the beginning of religion itself, I propose to offer a few remarks on this subject. I shall try to remember what I said in the beginning, respecting the necessity of having distinct ideas in the mind, defining terms, &c., for I by no means wish to leave the thoughtful part of the audience, especially, in the dark respecting my own position. Leaving, for the present, all others aside, I bring myself to the ground called Christian, whose religious systems have taken form from this book—the old and new Testaments, and so multiplied are the forms derived from the same reading, that it seems almost to justify the remark, that Faith, gospel, all seemed made to be disputed,

And none had sense enough to be confuted.

I am not so uncharitable as to conclude that this state of things has arisen entirely from the dishonesty of the race, but rather more from education, prepossession, and a want of distinct ideas, clear definition of terms, and their consistent application.

Every critical Bible student cannot fail to have taken cognizance of this truth: that throughout sacred writ, God is spoken of in two senses, the infinite and the finite, or subordinate sense. Thus, whenever God is spoken of as coming, going, traveling personally from one place to another, it then must be understood in the finite or subordinate sense; because in this sense he is considered as being less than something else. If he travel, there must be some place where he is not, to which he is going; hence, he must be circumscribed. We cannot help associating with such being, the idea of extension, figure, size, &c.—such as angel or man. Also, when God is represented as having forgotten something, not knowing, or changing his mind or purpose, it is understood as speaking of God subordinate, not infinite. Of the Infinite, or Supreme Being, it is truly said, "His purposes alter not—He is without change or shadow of turning." The same holy writ makes the distinction clear by the saying of Christ, when accused by the Jews of making himself God. He showed them that they were "called gods unto whom the word of God came." Moses was God to the children of Israel in this subordinate sense: "And the Lord said unto Moses, see, I have made thee a God to Pharaoh; and Aaron, thy brother, shall be thy prophet," &c. Exodus vii: 1. Joshua was called Jehovah—Elijah, God the Lord, &c. To the careful reader, the distinction is clear. But God, when spoken of as "the All and in all," "in whom we live and move and have our being," He is then understood as the "Eternal Unity," the "Infinite Jehovah," and he it is whom we have assembled here to-day to worship, and Him only. Almost without exception, every intelligent, unbiased mind with whom I have come in contact, acknowledges that God, in the supreme sense, is Infinite Spirit—indivisible, immutable, uncaused, self-existent, omniscient, and omnipresent—filling immensity—the creator and arbiter of the universe, permeating all worlds and all existences at all times, which removes the necessity of his going and coming. But, strange as it must appear, many good-meaning persons, after this admission, stultify themselves by admitting a plurality of supremes or divisibility in the Supreme, to favor some theological dogma or scheme of redemption they have fixed in their own minds, or others have fixed for them. The merest tyro, having taken but his first lesson in inductive philosophy, cannot help realizing the fact that an infinite existence is indivisible. Truth never conflicts. The term infinite signifies without bounds. This seems to be either forgotten or ignored. We say of space that it is infinite, but draw a line through it; we then have two finite spaces, when infinite space disappears. I know it may be argued that a line beginning at a given point and extending in any direction without end, may be called an infinite line, and that this idea might, by parity of reason, be applied to dividing space; and even should this be conceded as sound reasoning, which I deny, the same cannot be applied to an infinite being or existence. Thus, I think it clearly demonstrates that such a thing as an infinite plurality, or plurality of infinites, is impossible. I am aware that we are believed to hold to the dogma of duality in deity, male and female (!) I will try to clear this point. It is admitted by us all that the attributes ascribed to Deity, some are considered masculine, some feminine; and hence comes the idea of father and mother of the universe. We admit the revelation of these attributes of the Eternal Unity by son and daughter; that is to say, God as Father, or the fatherly character of God was revealed by the Son, Christ Jesus, and God as mother, or the motherly character of God was revealed by the daughter (Ann Lee). Thus, "God manifest in the flesh;" not of man only, but also of woman, male and female, constitute the duality of God, and dual only in this subordinate sense. Being equally manifest in and through finite human beings, who are dual, male and female. Thus the apparently conflicting ideas of unity and duality are reconciled.

In this I can perceive nothing irrational, nothing but what any dispassionate, reasonable mind would readily admit. I will, however, very frankly admit, that for any man to declare that God in the highest sense was the Eternal Unity, and afterwards declare that He was the Eternal Duality, or Eternal Trinity (Eternal Three), that such man would stultify himself because either of the latter would precisely negative the former, and we should not know at last what man did believe. These two ideas of unity and plurality in the supreme and infinite sense, would constitute a formidable and an irreconcilable feature in the theology of any man or sect. I fully concur in the remarks of John Locke on this subject. "Every deity that men own above one is an infallible evidence of their ignorance of him, and a proof that they have no true notion of God (in the highest sense) where unity, infinity, and eternity are excluded." But if, as Christ says, "they were called gods, to whom the word of God came, that the scriptures might not be broken," I have no difficulty in applying this high term in the subordinate sense to the Son of God. Nor would I exclude Jeremiah from among the number of the "prophets of the Lord," for applying the same high title to the daughter. "This is the name whereby she shall be called. The Lord our righteousness." Jer. xxxiii: 16.

Perhaps I have drawn too largely on your patience, but I wished to make a fair beginning, to leave no one in the dark, to carp at our doctrines without understanding them. We claim that the son and daughter already named now stand at the head of the new creation of God, and we, their children, in the "unity of the spirit and bond of peace," are striving to follow their example, by obeying their teaching and walking as they walked, and by so doing have found that peace which this world can neither give nor take away; and may become "heirs and joint heirs with Christ," who has said: "Be of good cheer, for I have overcome the world;" the "prince of this world cometh and hath nothing in me;" "and to him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, as I also overcome, and am sit down with my Father in his throne." Rev. iii: 21. These are the great and glorious promises to all who will take up a daily cross and follow Christ in the regeneration; not generation, but regeneration; not to those who have a blind faith in his atoning blood and still lead a worldly life, but it is to those who "walked even as he walked," and have followed him in the regeneration. And the invitation is now extended to every sin-sick soul; to every one who "panteth after righteousness as the hart for the waterbrook" we say come, "without money or without price," and "partake of the waters of life freely," for now has come salvation, and the kingdom of our God and the power of Christ.

Are the Shakers running the world out? The assertion has been made so frequently, that it is a matter of moment to know of its truth. Regardless of the number of population, the Shakers have maintained their testimony of celibacy, since the days of their founder—Ann Lee; with a knowledge, that to "come down from this cross, might cause all men to believe on them," yet with the certain presentation, that to do so, would pull from under the Christian character, its prime virtue—its foundation.

We are aware that it is the duty of the followers of the first Adam to replenish the earth; in the fullest meaning of that word—to give glory unto God in the perfect fruits of their bodies. We are as fully aware that duty calls on the disciples of the second Adam—"The Lord from heaven, a quickening spirit," to rise up from the earthly plane of physical production and reproduction, and cultivate a life that has an eternal character. Reproduction is an earthly practice and duty; to those who choose to remain on this low plane, they are welcome to all the pleasure it affords them—the pleasure is earthly, transient, not heavenly, eternal. Connected with the duty of earthly beings, "to replenish and subdue the earth," is the requirement that their reproductions shall be an honor to the father and the mother engaged in this earthly avocation; to be such, it is necessary that parents present to the earth only "sound minds in healthy bodies;" every child born and to be born, has this right of demand upon its progenitors. Is this demand complied with generally or particularly? We say not; and if we are right in so judging, the present reproductions of humanity do not replenish the earth, but tend to deteriorate the race—"run the world out!" But were we all able to produce, through our generations, perfect specimens of humanity, this would be no argument that we should engage in it as long and as fully as our ability would permit.

The child of nature ceases after a time to be a child, and dons the character of maturity. The child of the Spirit grows out of and above the pleasures and employments of the child of earth, and finds superior joys in the exercise of its eternal affections. What once appeared as duty, reproduction, ceases to be such; and a new element being found, regeneration, a degradation is experienced in retreating back to the elements and practices of an earthly being. "He that is down," on the plane of sensuality, "needs fear no fall from it;" but those who, having tasted of the powers of the world to come, who like Jesus have been taught of a superior way, resurrected thereto, and experience eternal life, oh, what a fall is theirs, to return, like a dog to his vomit, to engage in the practices of a being beneath them! Marriage is honorable, but not Christian. Marriage is believed by multitudes to be God-ordained for the replenishing of the earth. Let its advocates carefully carry out the provision, in all conscience, agreeably to the Mosaic statutes, then are they good Jews. But there is no law that can make them Christians—even poor Christians! If the Shakers, by abstaining from marriage "are running the world out," let it run; we think Christianity a preferable institution—as Jesus is more honorable than Adam; and when the charge of running the world out rises in the mind as an argument against Shakerism, let crusaders think how much more populous the earth would be, if all should live the life of that Christian exemplar, saying naught of the poor, despised Shakers. *

"It is no more than bare justice to say, that we are indebted to the Shakers, more than any or all other social architects of modern times. Their success has been the 'specie basis' that has upheld all the paper theories, and counteracted the failures of the French and English schools. It is very doubtful, whether Owenism or Fourierism would have ever existed, or if they had, whether they would have moved the practical American mind, if the facts of Shakerism had not existed before them. While we say the Rappites, the Zoarites, the Ebenezers, Owenites, and even the Fourierists are all echoes of the Shakers, we must also say that the Shakers are the far-off echoes of the PRIMITIVE CHRISTIAN CHURCH."—J. H. Noyes.

A Concise Statement.

(Concluded.)

They that believed in Christ's gospel, and were obedient to that form of doctrine which was taught them; by denying all ungodliness and worldly lusts; and became entirely dead to the law by the body of Christ, or power of the Holy Ghost, were in the travail of the resurrection from the dead; or the redemption of the body. So that they who took up a full cross against the world, flesh, and devil, and who forsook all for Christ's sake, and followed him in the regeneration, by persevering in that line of obedience to the end, found the resurrection from the dead, and eternal salvation in that dispensation; but as the measure of that dispensation was only as water to the loins, the mystery of God not finished; but there was another day prophesied of, called the second appearance of Christ, or final and last display of God's grace to a lost world: in which the mystery of God should be finished as he has spoken by his prophets since the world began: which day could not come, except there was a falling away from that faith and power that the church then stood in; in which time antichrist was to have his reign, whom Christ should destroy with the spirit of his mouth and brightness of his appearance: which falling away began soon after the apostles, and gradually increased in the church, until about four hundred and fifty-seven years from Christ's birth, or thereabouts, at which time the power of the Holy People, or church of Christ, was scattered or lost by reason of transgression: and antichrist, or false religion became established. Since that time the witnesses of Christ have prophesied in sackcloth or under darkness; and altho' many have been faithful to testify against sin, even to the laying down of their lives for the testimony which they held, so that God accepted them in their obedience: while they were faithful and just to live or walk up to the measure of light and truth of God, revealed or made known unto them, but as it is written, that all they that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution: and so it has been, and those faithful witnesses lost their lives by those falsely called the church of Christ: which is antichrist; for the true church of Christ never persecuted any; but were inoffensive, harmless, separate from sin: for the true church of Christ taking up their cross against the world, flesh, and devil, and all sin, living in obedience to God, they earnestly contend for the same. Therefore it may be plainly seen and known, where the true church of Christ is: but as it is written, antichrist or false churches should prevail against the saints and overcome them before Christ's second appearance, 2 Thess. ii, 3. Let no man deceive you by any means, for that day shall not come except there come a falling away first; and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition, Rev. xiii: 7. And it was given unto him to overcome them, and power was given him over all kindreds, tongues, and nations; and this is the state Christ prophesied the world of mankind should be in, at his second appearance, Luke xvii. 26. And as it was in the day of Noe, so shall it be in the days of the Son of Man, verse 30. Even so shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed: plainly referring to his second appearance to consume or destroy antichrist, and make a final end of sin, and establish his kingdom upon earth: but as the revelation of Christ must be in his people, whom he had chosen to be his body, to give testimony of him and to preach his gospel to a lost world.

4th. The fourth dispensation or day is the second appearance of Christ, or final, or last display of God's grace to a lost world, in which the mystery of God will be finished and a decisive work, to the final salvation, or damnation of all the children of men: which according to the prophecies rightly calculated, and truly understood, began in the year of our Saviour Jesus Christ, 1747. See Daniel and the Revelations. In the manner following, 1st. To a number, in the manifestation of great light and mighty trembling by the invisible power of God, and visions, and revelations, and prophecies which has progressively increased, with administration of all those spiritual gifts, that were administered to the apostles at the day of pentecost: which is the comforter that has led us into all truth: which was promised to abide with the true church of Christ unto the end of the world, and by which we find baptism into Christ's death; death to all sin, become alive to God, by the power of Christ's resurrection which worketh in us mightily; by which a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto us; and woe be unto us if we preach not the gospel of Christ. For in finding so great a salvation and deliverance from the law of sin and death in believing and obeying this gospel which is the gospel of Christ, in confessing and forsaking all sin and denying ourselves and bearing the cross of Christ, against the world, flesh, and devil.

We have found repentance of all our sins; and are made partakers of the grace of God wherein we now stand: which all others in believing and obeying, have acceptance with God, and find salvation from their sins as well as we; God being no respecter of persons, but willing that all should come to the knowledge of the truth, and be saved. Thus we have given a short information of what we believe of the dispensations of God's grace to mankind, both past and present: and in what manner the people of God have found justification or acceptance with God, which was and is still in believing and obeying the light and truth of God, revealed or made known in the day or dispensation in which it is revealed: for as the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness, and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness or live in any known sin against him; so his mercy and grace is towards all them that truly fear him, and turn from all their sins, by confessing, forsaking, and repenting, which is the way and manner in which all must find the forgiveness of their sins, and acceptance with God thro' our Lord Jesus Christ, or finally fail of the grace of God; and that salvation which is brought to light by the gospel. But to conclude, in short, as we believe, and do testify, that the present gospel of God's grace unto us is the day which in the scripture, is spoken or prophesied of, as the second appearing of Christ to consume or destroy antichrist, or false religion, and to make an end of the reigning power of sin (for he that committeth sin is the servant of sin and satan) over the children of men: and to establish his kingdom, and that righteousness that will stand forever: and that the present display of the work and power of God, will increase until it is manifest to all; which it must be in due time: for every eye shall see him; and he will reward every man according to his deeds: and none can stand in sin or unrighteousness, but in that righteousness which is pure and holy; even without fault before the throne of God which is obtained by grace, through faith in obedience to the truth of the everlasting gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, in denying all ungodliness and worldly lusts; by confessing all sin, and taking up the cross of Christ, against the world, flesh, and devil.

from whence the New Jerusalem from the Lord will descend (Rev. 21:1 and 2), is not yet perfectly settled."—Letters to Dr. Beyer.

A practical life of righteousness, by characters formed after the pattern of Jesus, was the only means by which God could work the work of redemption among the human race on earth, and finally create, in the spirit world, a "New Heaven," having for its foundations the New Church on earth; and having for its founders souls who, while in the body, had accepted the testimony of Mother Ann.

Inasmuch as it is not known that Swedenborg was acquainted with Ann Lee, or her testimony, his witness is the more wonderful in its character, and astonishing in its accuracy!!

"In every view of mankind, and in each fresh system of doctrines which professes to apply itself to the wants of an age, the subject of marriage can hardly fail to have an important place. In many systems, indeed, it furnishes the experimentum crucis, and at once decides their pretensions."

This is emphatically the case with the Shaker system, which claims to be (and really is) the Resurrection Order, and above the marriage relation.

"The author affirms, upon a union of experimental and rational evidence, that sex is a permanent fact in human nature; that men are men, and women women, in the highest heavens, as here on earth; that it is the soul which is male or female; and that sex is thence derived into the mortal body, and into the natural world. Therefore that the difference of sexes is brighter and more exquisite in proportion as the person is high, and the sphere pure.

"The distinction not only reaches to the individual, but it is anatomically minute besides: every thought, affection, and sense of a male is male, and of a female is feminine. The smallest drop of intellect or will, is inconvertible between the sexes; if man's, it can never become woman's, nor vice versa.

"The sexual distinction is founded upon the two radical attributes of God; upon his Divine Love and his Divine Wisdom, whereof the former is feminine, and the latter is masculine."

John the Baptist never approximated nearer to Jesus, than did Swedenborg to Ann; for this is simple Shakerism in its rudimentals, that God is dual—male and female; that the Christs are dual; and that the second manifestation of the Christ was in a woman, for the reason above assigned—difference of sex.

The Resurrection Order, founded by Ann is raising sex up from the physical plane to the Christ, spiritual plane, where there is no "marrying nor giving in marriage." And, while Mother Ann appreciated Swedenborg, and understood his mission better than he did himself, Ann and her mission were not at all apprehended by Swedenborg. He acknowledged that he daily saw thousands of the angels (human souls) descending and ascending to and from the earth. We say they visited Mother Ann, to whom many of them confessed their sins. For she affirmed just as did Swedenborg, that she was "more familiar with the souls of men and women out of the body than she was with those who were in the body; and that she frequently heard them confess their sins."

Here was the dividing line. For, while Swedenborg knew that a new heaven was being founded, he knew not by whom; nor did he know of its fundamental principles; nor how much himself and his followers would have to drop and shake off, in order to find an entrance thereinto. For they also belong to the old generative heaven and earth, which are passing away: for Swedenborg never ascended above the heavens of the first Christian Church, composed of Gentiles, in the spirit world and upon earth. But he understood far better than Ann, naturally, what is known as the circle of sciences, the "Arcana" of Nature; Swedenborg being the body, and Mother Ann the soul of the coming order—Spiritualism and Religion.

Nor does Swedenborg appear to have ever learned the radical distinction of the two Christian Churches—Jew and Gentile; nor the fact of the existence of the Jewish Pentecostal Church in the spiritual world,—the home of Jesus and his Apostles,—as a sun to this earth, spiritually; nor that that Church embodied a distinct system of natural truths (as Moses declared) pertaining to man's earth life;—nutrition, generation, agriculture, chemistry; indeed all the sciences along in their order, as they have a practical relation to man as a religious being, who is bound in all things to do right; and that in doing right, all causes of suffering (bodily diseases included) would be banished from that portion of humanity.

Though Swedenborg's "knowledge on earth was marvelously increased;" and holiness was still more marvelously increased through the sufferings and travail of soul of Mother Ann; for, although he was a good man under Christ's first appearing among the Gentiles—was the Gentile Jesus; and, as such, made it possible for the manifestation of Christ in a female, being her forerunner,—a voice crying in the "wilderness" (see Rev. xii.) "Make straight paths" for the coming female Messiah. For, like John, he only taught human beings to return to the paths of virtue from which they had strayed; to turn the hearts of the parents to the children, and the hearts of the children back to the Apostle Paul, and his Gentile associates.

How different the case with Ann, who opened a radically-new and living way. While the followers of Swedenborg are known by their complex system of theology; in their lives they are like all other men and women of the world, in respect to generation, nutrition, and property; the disciples of Mother Ann—"the virgins, her companions, who follow her"—are led unto the King, Jesus, by the Christ Spirit; and, after a hundred years of isolation and obloquy, are known as having solved the problem that men and women can be "neither male or female generatively; but are one in Christ Jesus," and live a pure, Christian life; and that, too, under greater temptations than ever Jesus or his Apostles, or any of the celibate Orders under the first appearing of Christ to either Jews or Gentiles were subjected to, and stood the test. For the "stars of heaven"—celibates—still "fell to the earth as figs from the tree, when shaken with a mighty wind." See Dixon's "Spiritual Wives."

All human beings, of all nations, sects, tongues, and races, whatever their theology, and whether rich or poor, learned or unlearned, fall under the power of the same passions and emotions, from the Esquimaux to the Swedenborgian; and still seek indulgence through a perverted use of the powers and faculties of their own being. The Shakers are the only exception to this rule; for only they deny themselves of lust, in all its imperious craving, whether in eating or drinking, or in the exceedingly perverted order of reproduction.

"My kingdom is not of this world," said Jesus; "therefore my servants will not fight." Yet Swedenborg had no testimony against war, or any other of the ruling lusts of mankind. Still he "lightened" the earth with the glory of his knowledge, scientific and spiritual; he walked in kings' palaces. The kings and queens, and nobles of the earth—the higher classes of society—were converted to Spiritualism through his agency; while his daughters, the Fox girls, were ministers to the "common people, who have heard them gladly;" they having been the mediums of great power in converting materialists, skeptics, infidels, in and out of the Churches, to a belief in the realities of the unseen world; and thus has the spirit of Spiritualism been "poured out upon all flesh." Even handmaids and servants see visions, as did Swedenborg; and men prophesy, as nominal Christians and the followers of the Swedish seer have never done; for, actually and practically, the Swedenborgians have no more spirituality than have the average of common Spiritualists.

Yet, while the followers of Ann Lee are also undoubted Spiritualists—believers in spiritual manifestations, the immortality of the human soul, the intercommunication between the visible and invisible worlds—they "have no confidence in the flesh;" but, for their justification, rely upon living lives of pure Christianity, similar to that of Jesus and the Pentecostal converts. In conclusion, it may be observed, that there was one point of distinction and most marked contrast, in the different and opposite effects produced by the testimonies of Swedenborg and Mother Ann upon "the world." While Swedenborg personally retained its "friendship," was the welcome and honored guest of European Sovereigns and their courts, and a favorite of the Swedish nation, particularly of the nobles and religious hierarchy; Mother Ann excited the furious rage of the Clergy, and the dragon-enmity of the high, professing Christians of all denominations, without exception. And in proportion to their religious zeal, did they think that they were doing God's service, by pouring out of their mouths, a flood of slanders, to carry away the woman and the remnant of her seed—the Shakers. But "the earth opened its mouth, and swallowed up the flood"—which "earth," being the Materialists, and infidels generally, who hated Christianity as a generative theology, because it was constantly whoring after, and committing adultery with the STATE, then using it as a cat's paw, with which to hunt and punish heretics, by horrid inquisitions! The Materialists having separated, effectually and eternally, CHURCH and STATE in the government of the United States, let not the Clergy impiously seek to join together what God, through them, has put asunder. "Eternal vigilance," on this subject, "is the price of the liberty" of conscience.

Genuine Christianity began its career by dissolving the marriage tie, and making the man and woman nearer and dearer relatives—brother and sister. Popular Christianity has reversed this rule of life; and all the marriages it can solemnize, so much more honor to its churches! Jesus and his followers were virgins, or became single for a purpose.

Millions rely for their salvation upon the merits of Jesus. "Behold, I come quickly, to give to every one according to their works." In the death of Jesus there is no hope, only as he died unto sin; in his life there is endless progression for all who will pattern it.

God's Spiritual House, or the Perfected Latter Day Temple.

The order of God's spiritual House (when perfected) will be beautifully glorious. We, Believers in Christ's second appearing claim, that the foundations of the latter day temple are laid; and, who will say that God was not there? He (speaking in ancient times by one of his Prophets) said, "Mine hand hath laid the foundations of the earth; and my right hand hath spanned the heavens: when I call, they stand up together."

The old heavens and earth are out of course. Man and woman were created in honor; but they abode not in that honor. They were endowed with reasoning powers, and were placed as rulers over inferior beings, and executives of those laws which God had established for the guidance and protection of all grades of animal and vegetable life, having less intelligence than themselves in the earthly order. Had they not inverted and perverted those laws, by corrupting the highest functions of their natures, and violated the trust committed to them on the earth plane, they would, unto this day, have remained lords, or just rulers—a central power—a governing wheel; all the rest of the machinery, as wheels within wheels, would have worked harmoniously, each in its proper sphere contributing to aid the central governing force—man and woman. They would have walked together keeping the commands of God, and "the counsel of peace" would have been "between them both." This was God's original plan, that each—the male and female—should have their appropriate sphere of action, working in harmony, with one accord, for the good of each other, and for the accomplishment of one great end.

Woman, it is said, was first tempted—first beguiled—and became a leader in the wrong direction; instead of being a connecting link between man and angels, she placed herself on the opposite side of the scale, and drew him down to the inferior; and herself became a servant to the instincts of her own nature, and a slave to the baser passions of man; and, instead of occupying a place in his counsels, according to the original plan, she became an appendage; her will subjugated to his will—not because of abstract right, but because of his might. Hence, he makes laws, and she is forced to obey them; common justice is denied her because she is the weaker vessel. According to the laws which man frames, without the consent of woman (and by the usages of society) she is forced to work for half pay; and the little wealth which she accumulates by toiling weary hours when he can rest (by means of double pay which he receives for performing the same labor), she is taxed without representation on her part. This is her reward for being found on the wrong side!

But now, God hath again put forth his hand and laid the foundation of a new spiritual building; a new divine order, or heaven, is established upon a new temporal basis—community of goods, new earth. In this new heaven and earth which are being formed, in which righteousness and holiness shall bear rule according to God's will, not man's, the eternal, unchangeable laws of justice and right will prevail, and the male and female will stand in their proper place: "and His right hand will span them both."

In this new order of things, woman must be purified and elevated: first, purified! Then she will stand erect, according to the design of the Master-builder. Side by side, man and woman must walk and work, in all that is honest, pure, just and true, taking harmonious counsel together in all things pertaining to the present and future life.

Woman is not man's equal in physical strength; neither, as a general rule, is she his equal in logic and the sterner qualities of the mind; but she possesses some properties which he does not; and combine the faculties of both, and when redeemed from the blight of sin, they will make one perfect whole, without schism, capable of honoring God, and beautifying the earth.

It is for man's interest that woman should find and fill her proper sphere, and be something higher, purer, and better than a slave to man's passions, and to make a way for her to become a co-worker with him in elevating the race. How much her influence is needed in all ranks of society! Let woman use her intelligence to find out her proper sphere of action, and in what consists her adorning, and she will soon cease to desire to be a mere thing of outward beauty, or an idol to be worshipped. Her strongest desire will be, to become a saving power; to send forth her influence to calm the raging passions of perverted nature, and rule the angry waves that roll.

There is a great work to be accomplished by woman, on what we term the earthly (or generative) plane. She must work to roll back the flood of sensuality—the giant sin of our time, which finds its way into all ranks of society—is destroying the youth of our land by thousands, and is gnawing at the vitals of its subjects and bringing them to premature graves. Sensuality is the parent of war! By it, all other base passions are set in motion which ultimate in bloodshed and carnage, and fill the land with mourning and lamentation.

It will devolve upon them (in a large measure) to correct the abuses of the marriage relation in the order in which it properly belongs, and to strip off the cloak of sin which has covered it over, and point out its uses, and in trumpet tongues condemn its abuses.

But those to whom the spirit has spoken, saying, "Come up hither on the higher or resurrection plane, and live as do the Angels—live above the marriage order, even in its best estate; have a high and important mission to perform." A broad field is open, and there is much work to be done. In our own loved home we are solving a great problem: Whether it is possible for human beings, under a sense of duty and deep religious feeling—love to God and humanity—to come together under the same roof, from different nations, different religious sects and non-professors, and form a brotherhood and sisterhood, so unselfish, that we can toil together in harmony—in honor preferring others; and to eat the bread of industry together (which is always sweet), supporting one interest temporally, creating one joint treasury, as did the Apostles of Jesus.

And, as the soul and body are so closely connected, while we learn to break our temporal bread together, so also do we learn to eat our spiritual food together at the Lord's table. Industry, Frugality and Temperance being our motto; Truth, Purity and Love the standard around which we gather. As we do not recognize high nor low, rich nor poor, in this new relation, so neither do we find the male and female, as in the old order. "All are one in Christ, working together for the one universal good." And, while we stand firmly upon the rock, Virgin Purity, and are as angels of purity and innocence to our brethren, our feet will never be displaced; in all our relations with them we shall be true helpmates, worthy the dignified name, of "Sisters in Christ," sharing the burdens of life with them, and have a place in their councils, and stand by them in the hour of trial—to light their pathway and make home cheerful and happy.

We recognize the law of dependency running through all created things; the lesser leaning upon the greater—the weaker upon the stronger. Man is the lawful head, and is the representative of God in the male order, the Eternal Father, and will always have the supremacy. Woman, the representative of God in the female part of Deity, Mother, must act her part as co-worker, filling her sphere. There is no bondage in the law of dependency, even as there is no bondage in any of God's laws! for, without law, all would be chaos. But when all his laws are faithfully executed, there will a beautiful structure rise up from the ruins of disregarded and broken law, that will stand upon the mountain of pure truth, and overlook all the hills and valleys below, and it will be a "house of prayer for all nations," and unto it many people will gather. ANTOINETTE.

The R. C. Church demands of its Pope, Bishops and Priests celibacy in the extreme; very good, much like Jesus. Now, a curious anomaly is here made apparent: a pure head—if celibacy intends purity—and a corrupt body—if marriage, and fleshly lusts are the opposite of celibacy. How can the laity hope, or much less expect to go, where their pure-minded priests are rewarded? "I am the way."

"But there is a higher life revealed in Scripture—a life by which an individual may voluntarily forego the mystery of marriage, to become more and more absorbed in devotion to the duties of the spiritual union of Christ and Church; a life in which the love of the anti-type may be even so great as to banish from the mind all thought of the type, concentrating all the affections of the soul upon the reality of the substance—a life so entirely free from the temporal, with all its joys, and cares, and entanglements, as to see nothing, to think of nothing, and to long for nothing but the eternal—Christ Himself, and the fruition of his glorious Godhead! How can it be denied that the Scriptures do reveal to us the possibility of such a life; and that it is the life of the celibate 'for the Kingdom of Heaven's sake?'—not the life of the mere unmarried, which in itself considered is one of the most selfish of all lives, and which is not unfrequently chosen for the sake of selfish and criminal indulgence; but the life of the celibate 'for the Kingdom of Heaven's sake?' Our blessed Lord said, indeed, 'All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given; but he that is able to receive it, let him receive it.'—From Holy Matrimony, by Dr. J. A. Bolles.

Self-denial is one of the fundamental laws of growth for man on the primeval, or earthly plane of his existence. Not entire abstinence from enjoyment, but such abnegation as shall preserve all his faculties in harmonious balance. There is a constant tendency in human nature to run to excess, so that one needs to keep a perpetual guard over himself. Sometimes he is attracted by the charms of sensual indulgence, and again by what he regards as the pure pleasures of intellectual gratification. He may have become so absorbed in intellectual gratification; he may have become so absorbed in intellectual pursuits, as to neglect his physical and moral natures. It is no excuse that the pleasures of sense plead so powerfully for indulgence; nor, that the more refined enjoyments of the intellect ask for an unrestricted field for action; nor that the moral powers, under the delusive plea of serving God assert their supremacy; and their especial right to exclusive indulgence. Intoxication is the word to be applied to all this one-sided self-indulgence of whatever kind. There is no place for indulgence in God's service; every talent must be made to perform its proper and necessary part in the work of life. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." "Apply thy heart unto wisdom," for, "that the soul be without knowledge it is not good." "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." These injunctions of Sacred Writ are binding on all men, under all circumstances, just so far as those circumstances allow of their observing them. Their observance is necessary, in order to keep us from running into excess of any kind, as well as to avoid the other extreme of evil—a barren soul. If dissipation, whether of the senses, of the mental faculties, or of the moral powers, is an essential injury to the individual, so are uncultivated, unfruitful faculties. Desolation and death are the results not only of excesses in the use of God's blessings, but of neglect to improve them. In contradistinction to all those whose lives are given to sensual indulgences and whose thoughts are engrossed with earthly things, the genuine Christian lives constantly under the influence and direction of the Divine Spirit, and hence his affections are placed upon heavenly things, rather than upon things of the earth. "Our citizenship or community," (according to the original,) "is in the heavens. As individuals our names are enrolled with those of the city of God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and as a body, we are one with that community in the heavens; our life is the same as their life, our interest the same as theirs; our loves, our aspirations, our efforts are all tending God-ward as well as theirs; hence, though living upon the earth, we are not of the earth, but really of the heavens. It is true, our present state is one of humiliation compared with what it shall be, but we are looking for the Saviour who will change this state of things in due time, by the inward operations of his Spirit, so that we shall become, in all respects like his church in glory." There is an interchange of expressions made by Jesus Christ and the apostles, that is deserving our consideration. Jesus directed his disciples to pray: "thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven."

Again he said, "No doubt, the kingdom of God has come unto you," and, "the kingdom of heaven is within you." The apostle Paul said to Christians: "Ye are come to the City of God, the heavenly Jerusalem, to an innumerable company of angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect." The coming of the kingdom of God to us, and our coming to the heavenly Jerusalem, then, are convertible expressions. There is implied, something more than being admitted at some indefinite time in the future to the privileges of citizenship in the heavenly state. The community of believers is already in the heavens, and the life of the heavenly world is theirs now. That being the case, their affections cannot be placed on things of the earth; hence the grief of the apostle on account of those who were sensual, instead of being spiritual; they had in reality severed their relation to Christ and his kingdom. Instead of being dead to sin, and alive to God, they were dead in sin; they had no communion with beings of the heavenly state; the angels of God did not associate with them as with familiar and congenial spirits, as they did with Jesus, the Apostles, and all who lived truly Christian lives.

There is hardly anything in the Apostolic writings more evident than the fact of the intimate connection between the body of Christ on the earth, and his body or church in the heavenly world. They are represented as being risen with Christ, sitting together in heavenly places in Christ, and as having Christ formed within them the hope of glory. God's fullness, or complete spiritual possession, was said to be in Christ; the same term was applied to his Church. There was a oneness between him and them as between him and the Father. It is true, the church was expecting another manifestation of him, but it was only a manifestation differing in degree, and not in its essential nature. Christ had already come as a Saviour from sin; they were looking for him a second time, yet that was to be "without sin unto salvation." "We know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him." Salvation from sin, or from the tendency to transgress God's law of love, was the characteristic work of Christ's first manifestation; a complete deliverance from the nature that is subject to trials, and liable to fall into sin, is the glorious and crowning work of the second. "Ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession." It was, then, no unmeaning, or self-exalting language that the apostle addressed to the church at Philippi, when he exhorted them to be "joint imitators" of himself. For he, himself, followed Christ in his entire life. If Jesus suffered humiliation, so did he; if Jesus underwent severe trials, he partook of the same, being in weariness and painfulness often; if Jesus labored incessantly for the welfare of others, Paul also showed that he was actuated by the same benévolent motives, by his abundant labors in behalf of others. Jesus, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame; Paul, also, forgetting the things that were behind, pressed toward the mark, for the prize of his high calling in Christ Jesus. "Let as many of us as are perfect," said he, "be thus minded; let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ." The exhortation then, to follow himself, was most befitting. It would lead them from this state of humiliation to glory, an object worthy of their highest aspirations. By imitating Paul they would become united to him in spirit, as he was united to Christ, and as Christ was united to God and the whole heavenly host. Thus, they would be made partakers of the life of all—their love, their peace, their joy, and their exalted blessedness. Being imitators of him, they would be saved from the evils that were in the world through lust, would keep themselves unspotted from sin, perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord. The Spirit of Christ that was effectual to purify them from evil inclinations, was also efficacious to create and maintain in them all, pure affections. They lived in harmony with each other, and the same power that wrought in them their kind feelings toward each other, also enabled them to conduct themselves honestly and peacefully towards those without their body. Hence, they avoided all occasions of dispute with others as far as possible. And though they suffered persecutions, they bore all with the same equanimity that Jesus did under similar circumstances. There is no fact better substantiated by history, than that of the peaceable behaviour of the early Christians towards their most bitter opponents, and their refraining from wars and contests of every kind, even though they were carried on by those governments of which they were regarded as the subjects. The very genius of their religion required it; and the Divine Spirit of Christ wrought in them an aversion to wars, and enabled them to bear whatever persecutions might arise in consequence of their refusal to engage in them. It is true, the philosophy of their day as well as much of that of the present time, has ascribed their power of endurance amid the severest sufferings to the obstinacy and the sustaining power of fanaticism. That was to be expected from its entire ignorance of the sustaining power which the religion of Christ afforded to its faithful martyrs. If their citizenship was in the heavens, their life should be in accordance with that fact. As a matter of course then, they owed no allegiance to any government whose spirit was in direct contrast to that of which they were the accepted citizens. It was very natural that their enemies should ascribe their avowal of allegiance to Christ to obstinacy, superstition and fanaticism, yet that did not alter the facts in the case. The faithful adherents of Christ, claimed to know what they maintained with so much earnestness; and their opportunities of knowing were certainly superior to those of their adversaries, whose bare assertions many have been disposed to regard as philosophic truth. The Church of Christ, then, in the apostles' day, was a community separated from the common practices of the world; from its wars and contentions of every sort; from its ambitions, its tyrannies, its slaveries, whether of body or soul; from its monarchies, its aristocracies, its democracies, or whatever form of worldly government. It was also distinct from the very spirit and life of the world. It had renounced all sensuality, whether in the form of gluttony, of drunkenness or of licentious passion, and every thing that was contrary to divine purity and love; and if any adhered to it who were not of this character they were such as excited the tears of the apostle for their lack of the genuine spirit of Christianity. It was a community sui generis—peculiar to itself, existing upon the earth amid its various governments, and yet having its citizenship in the heavenly world; acknowledging Christ as its head, and his laws as the supreme rule of its life; whom they were expecting to make a second manifestation to themselves for the purpose of completing the work of salvation he had begun in them, and fitting them for an entrance into the society and blessedness of the church in eternal glory. The Church of Christ in the present day should be no less separated from those things which the apostolic church shunned, than they; and it would not be unreasonable to suppose, that, if possible, it should be more so, after the lapse of so many centuries. It should have greater power of the Divine Spirit to effect a greater work of salvation; more intimate union and communion with the heavenly hosts, whose life of love, of peace and harmony, should pervade the entire body of the church on earth, animating every member to the completest activity and consecration of every faculty, physical, mental, and moral, to the sole work of Christ—that of establishing the kingdom of heaven everywhere upon the earth, and fitting it for its ultimate destination in the heavens.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Ann Lee.

Mother Ann was once dragged out of meeting by a mob, and cast into prison in Manchester. Her cell was too small for her to straighten herself. She remained here fourteen days without other nourishment than a little milk and wine mixed and passed to her through the stem of a tobacco pipe, by inserting it into the key-hole. When taken out of prison, her enemies were astonished to see her walk off, apparently hearty. At another time she was taken by a mob upon the highway and ordered to advance; she did so, and was kicked every few steps for two miles, and for variety knocked down with clubs. A nobleman, living at a distance, was so strongly wrought upon by some unknown power, to go abroad, where, or for what, he did not know, but ordering a horse, he rode as if to save his own life, came upon the mob, reproved and dispersed them, and restored Mother Ann to her friends. Being accused of blasphemy, she was taken before four ministers of the English Church with a view to obtain judgment against her, that would excuse her persecutors for putting into execution their threats—branding her cheek and boring her tongue with a hot iron. Being called upon by these clergymen to speak in tongues, she told them she could not without the help of God. That help came and she spoke for four hours. The clergymen being learned linguists, stated that she had spoken of the wonderful works of God in seventy-two languages! They advised the mob not to molest her; but they, more enraged than ever, determined to stone her to death. Taking her and a few of her companions into a valley outside of the town, they threw stones at them, yet without effect. Quarreling among themselves followed, and they abandoned their wicked design. Mother Ann said:

"While they were throwing stones, I felt myself surrounded with the presence of God, and my soul was filled with love. I knew they could not kill me, for my work was not yet done; therefore I felt joyful and comfortable while my enemies felt confusion and distress."

From one of her own brothers she received shocking abuse, by his beating her until he was exhausted; when, calling for drink he repeated the assault with the other end of the staff until it was splintered. She testified she felt no harm from the strokes.

Fleeing from a mob, she went out on a pond of ice and laid down, remaining there all night, not suffering any inconvenience therefrom.

Her persecutors often met with sudden deaths; one, while on his way to get a license from the king to banish her; others became fearfully convicted of their doings, and desisted; so that for two years before leaving England they enjoyed their faith in peace.

On the 19th of May, 1774, Mother Ann, with eight followers, took passage for America in a condemned sea-going vessel, the Mariah, Captain Smith, of New York.

Mother said: "I knew by revelation that God had a chosen people in America; I saw some of them in vision, and when I met them in America, I knew them. I had a vision of America: I saw a large tree, every leaf of which shone with such brightness as made it appear like a burning torch, representing the Church of Christ which will yet be established in this land."

The Captain of the vessel was greatly offended at their religious exercises, and forbade their recurrence; but they, disregarding him and his threats to cast them overboard, went forth in dancing and shouting, when the Captain proceeded to carry his threats into execution. A storm was raging; a plank loosened by a heavy sea caused the water to rise rapidly, regardless of all the pumps in use. The crew quailed; the Captain, alarmed and pale as a corpse, told all of their inevitable fate. "Captain," said Mother Ann, "be of good cheer; there shall not a hair of our heads perish; we shall arrive safe in America. I saw two bright angels of God standing by the mast, through whom I received this promise." Then came a great wave, striking the ship, forced the plank back into its place. After this, the Captain gave full permission for them to worship as they pleased, and treated them with kindness; declaring, in New York, if it had not been for these Shakers, he never would have reached America. They landed in America, August 6, 1774. Not long afterward Mother Ann and company collected at what is now Shaker Village, seven miles north-west from Albany, New York. Accessions were soon made to their faith, and with increase of numbers came tribulation and persecution. The war of the Revolution was in progress; they were charged with being unfriendly to the Cause, because they would neither fight nor swear allegiance. They were imprisoned; still their numbers increased; many uniting and confessing their sins through the bars of the prison. They were separated: some sent towards Poughkeepsie with the intention of banishment to the British army, but failing here, they were lodged in jail at Poughkeepsie. Gov. George Clinton released them, and they returned to Shaker Village. In May, 1781, Mother and a company left Watervliet on a missionary tour to the Eastern States. They made many converts and established new societies in Massachusetts. They again became the subjects of persecution, and the most dreadful abuse was inflicted. Clubbed, whipped, stoned, dragged about the streets by the arms and the hair of their heads, pulled down stairs by their feet, and otherwise shockingly maltreated, because of their testimony alone. Their lives were often threatened, and were it not for some overruling power, they never could have survived the attacks of their persecutors. Dreadful judgments fell upon their enemies, and it became a proverb that "the Shaker drivers are all coming to naught."

Mother Ann departed this life at Shaker Village, Albany County, on the 8th day of September, 1784, in her 49th year. Christopher Love, who was beheaded under Cromwell, prophesied that "Out of thee, O England, shall a bright star arise, whose light and voice shall make the heavens quake, and knock under with submission to the blessed Jesus." To whom could this apply? We purpose, in our next, to pen some of the sayings of Mother Ann.

Blood signifies life. Blood is the life element. The blood of Jesus was earthly, and powerless for salvation; his death on Calvary is not worthy of notice. The blood of Christ is quite another element; it was the saving element of life that circulated in the soul of Jesus; by it he became Jesus Christ. Being "washed in the blood of Christ," intends that we must die unto sin as did Jesus, and live the life of which he was the pattern.

How easily might the millennium be inaugurated if all would burn up their theologies, and live the religion of Christ. The life of Jesus was a pattern—those who follow that pattern are Christians; any departure therefrom, is a divergence from "follow me," and the creation of a theology that is erroneous. Let the life of Christ be our only theology and religion.

Religion makes the heart better; the life more like the model—Jesus; with Self-denial as its touch-stone, and Virgin purity its standard, its goal is certainly the Angel spheres.

The Sacrament should impress us with the loving remembrance of Christ—wherein he, Community-like, ate even his last supper with the disciples at one common table!

"My servants will not fight." Would the military geni of our country or of any professedly Christian nation take an affront at the plainness of our speech—"Christ knows you not?"

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

Dialogue.

(Concluded.)

Char.—I think that those who reside on the east side of the dwelling are favored, being in such close connection with the grove; and as we have learned that vegetation imbibes carbon, and exhales the life-giving element so necessary for our existence, I think that in the enjoyment of such salubrious breezes which are wafted so frequently from the hillside, you ought to be remarkably healthy.

Mar.—Health is the blessing we seek, and I am thankful that we are not bound by the fashions and customs of popular society, so that we cannot have free use of the elements of existence—air, light and water; they are to be had without money or price, but no wealth can reclaim health once lost.

C.—I often think, as I cast my eyes on the trees, particularly those recently set out by Elder F. W. Evans, in the grove, in the doorway and orchard, not forgetting our favorite Norway spruce, so nicely inclosed within a neat, octagonal picket-fence, how unselfishly all his labors seem to be performed for the general welfare, and to the end that our home may wear the aspect of comfort, both within and without, and become more attractive and beautiful. And have we not, in our older brethren and sisters, a practical demonstration of the valued precept of Mother Ann Lee: "To do all our work as though we had a thousand years to live, and yet as though we were to die to-morrow?" For we know that the worth of the greater part of their labors can never be realized by them in this life.

S.—What you have said is true; and I have thought many times, that each breeze that plays among the trees, and each sweet songster that warbles its early matin and evening lay in the future, would be as voices of thanks and blessing to him who reared while young, each tender tree that now forms this sequestered spot.

Martha.—I have a few sentiments which I extracted from a book, a short time since; as they are quite applicable to our subject, I would like to read them.

All.—(We will be pleased to listen).

(Martha reads:) "There is something noble, pure and simple, in a taste for the cultivation of forest trees. It argues, I think, a sweet and generous nature, to have a strong relish for the beauties of vegetation, and a friendship for the hardy and glorious sons of the forest. There is a grandeur of thought connected with this part of rural economy. It is worthy of liberal, freeborn and aspiring men. He who plants an acorn, looks forward to future ages, and plants for posterity. Nothing can be less selfish than this. He cannot expect to sit in its shade and enjoy its shelter; but he exults in the idea, that the acorn which he has buried in the earth, shall grow up into a lofty pile, and shall keep on flourishing and increasing, and benefiting mankind, long after he has ceased to tread his paternal field."

S.—That is interesting, and as it refers more particularly to forest trees, I would now ask if evergreens shed their leaves every year.

Martha.—The fir and pine, and usually all cone-bearing and resinous trees shed their leaves annually; but as the new ones appear before the old ones decay, the tree is always green.

Mary.—Leaves have not that brilliancy of color which flowers have; but the beauty of the blossom (like most external beauty), fades, while the less showy leaf remains fresh and verdant after the flower has passed away.

C.—Evergreens are beautiful, preserving their color throughout the year. I have heard that tiny fir trees push their tardy growth above the perpetual snow that covers the northern regions. It must be a lovely sight, when contrasted with the clean white snow.

A.—Indeed it must. A fact has occurred to my mind, which is worth mentioning here; it is said, that under the wonderful, magnifying power of the microscope, the most perfect works of art appear quite imperfect; while in Nature's productions, however magnified, no blemish is found; her charms are ever supreme to the works of art.

M.—Have any of you ever studied Botany? and what is the true signification of the word?

S.—Botany is that branch of natural history which treats of plants and their classifications.

Mar.—I commenced the study of botany when quite a child; and found that it opened before my mind, a vast field of interest. The endless variety of plants, with their multitudinous, beauteous forms, with leaves of finest texture, all dyed in the sunlight's varied hues, comprised a theme for study. It was said of Linnæus (the Swedish botanist) that he was so thoroughly versed in the science, that he needed no time-piece to tell the hour of day—he knew it by the opening and closing of flowers, and the various changes that took place in his plants.

S.—The folding up of leaves at particular periods, has been termed the sleep of plants. This may seem a singular term to be applied to plants, but a celebrated Botanist said: "This folding up of leaves may be as useful to the vegetable constitution, as real sleep is to the animal." Almost every garden contains some plants in which this phenomenon may be observed; perhaps we have all noticed the Morning Glory, Four O'clock and Sensitive Plant.

C.—The most common plants on which we tread, may be teachers of wisdom to us; for, when closely examined, we find in them that beauty of form and texture, which no artist could picture or poet describe. Neither can man with all his science, cause them to grow; then we look to the God of nature and exclaim: "To the beautiful order of thy works may we conform the order of our lives!"

Mar.—Should we not delight in the works of God, and in the perfection of beauty shadowed forth in all created things?

Martha.—There is nothing in which the goodness of God is more apparent, than in the inspiring flood of beauty which is continually poured out upon the earth.

Char.—Among these beauties are flowers. It is a pleasing thought to know, that every spot of earth is supplied with vegetation, appropriate and ornamental; scarcely a place is incapable of supporting vegetable life. In the desert, even, a few plants are found and its sandy waste is dotted, here and there, with date and palm trees. Thus, vegetation becomes victorious. In springs, rivers, waterfalls and seas, vegetable life accumulates, and on the margin of lakes and ponds, we often find the most beautiful of all flowers—the Water Lily. The shattered forests of the tropical climes are rich in fruits and flowers. We roam through the massive woods and frequently meet flowers wild and beautiful, growing without culture; but lovely in themselves, because they bespeak the innocence of their creation. It is sad to think that aught so fair and lovely should be despoiled, by having a language attached to them that is corrupt, and by those who should possess feelings superior to what are bestowed on these emblems of virtue, which are designed to beautify and adorn the home of mankind. Too oft are they the medium, through which passions base and wild find an outbreak. Too oft have they by the aid of man drawn woman from chastity, and her superior powers and intellectual faculties have been perverted by the signification borne in these innocent fruits of nature. But let us turn from this sad picture, and glance at their variable life.

A.—Their's is surely a changeable one. In spring, we hail the green grass, which is soon interspersed with the bright Dandelions and Buttercups: flowers wild and beautiful dot the woodland, hills and meadows, and bedeck the verdant vales, as sweet opening notes to the rich anthem which nature chants till harvest time. Then summer comes, with its more ostentatious flowers; the Violet cannot endure the scorching heat, but passes with the balmy spring. Then we have the Rose and Pink and a variety of sweet flowers, which grace our mother earth; but these cannot always last, for Autumn soon steps in, and with its chilling blast destroys the tender plants, and flowers come into the passing scene.

Mary.—But in our hearts, flowers can always grow; through Summer's scorching heat and Winter's icy reign, lovely flowers may always thrive as emblems of a holy life in Christ.

M.—Charlotte spoke of flowers as being corrupted; 'tis true they have been used as a medium through which the sensuous could speak vile passions, yet flowers of themselves are innocent. The testimony of eternal truth, falling on the ears of the carnally-minded, would supply material to feed the sensual appetites; while to the spiritually-minded, it would be pure, living bread—something for the immortal soul to feast upon. Flowers stand in a similar relation to mankind. The worldly-minded too often use but to abuse them, but they never were intended for such a purpose; they can be, and are, by some, used for a higher object. To me they are the emblems of heavenly virtues, purity, meekness, innocence and love. These form and beautify the spiritual character.

A.—In whatever light they may appear to us, or however strong may be our attachment to them, I hope that we will not for a moment plead for their cultivation to the greatest extent merely to gratify our natural taste. A few sweet-scented flowers are not objectionable, but their culture in the extreme requires much time and attention, and would be the means of drawing the mind and feelings away from the more practical duties of life. "Flowers must be redeemed from the blighting influence which pervades their sphere before they can be introduced among us to any marked profit."

M.—With your conclusions I fully accord, and have been interested in, and edified by, our conversation.

Martha.—I hope that none of us will be destitute of the adorning of heavenly virtue, for we are surrounded by influences which tend to elevate the mind, and bring the soul in rapport with the higher spheres. It is our privilege, while young, to store the susceptible garners of the mind with that knowledge which will endure forever. For it hath been wisely said, that "Nothing seen is permanent; from the dust atom to the world, all is mutable—passing away is the mournful farewell of the visible Universe."

(Closing hymn sung by the company.)

HYMN OF PRAISE.

In harmony with nature's voice, we'll chant a hymn of praise,
In our Creator's works rejoice, and glory in his ways.
Our hearts are now attuned to sing the glories of the year,
Praise to the source from whence they spring,
Our life to bless and cheer, our life to bless and cheer.

The blessings of this social feast,
As a rich boon are given;
Among attractions not the least,
To lead our souls to heaven.

O happy home! relation dear!
With these our hearts are blest,
Praise, love and thanks we render here,
This hallowed day of rest.

Selections.

"An English journal, descanting on the various degrees of connubial bliss, states that the official record of the city of London for one year stands thus:

Runaway husbands,	2,348
" wives,	1,132
Married parties legally divorced	4,175
" living in open warfare	17,345
Married parties living in private misund-
standing	13,279
Married parties living mutually indifferent,	55,340
" regarded as comfortable,	3,175
" nearly happy,	127
" perfectly happy,	13

COMMENTS.—Where offspring is the result of such wedlock, may we look from it an improvement upon the conditions under which it was conceived, born and bred? London is not an exception to the general conditions of married life. Something is wrong, or we should have better fruits from this idolized, worldly institution.

Would it not be well for religious organizations to discuss the questions: "Is marriage a Christian institution?" "How does marriage compare with that life, eternal in the heavens, now practiced by the children of the resurrection?" "Is marriage engaged in by members of the churches for its holiness, or for certain selfish considerations?" "Are virgins like, or unlike, the company standing with the Lamb on Mt. Zion?" Is marriage eternal, or what shall we do with it to inherit a life that is eternal?" *

Whoso seeks to save the generative life and relations, will lose the eternal life of Christ; whoso loses that, has an assurance of this. *

"I do not believe the Shakers live as purely as they profess," said a visitor. "Why not?" asked an attendant. "Because I don't think I could live so myself!"

We have an earthly nature and a spiritual nature; this is eternal, that is transient; one prompts to the propagation of the race of earthly beings; the other urges the propriety of resurrecting the inclinations, to live as the Angels do—the life of "the children of the resurrection."

A Virgin life is one of the constituents of eternal life; it needs not to change when entering Angelhood. Not so with the carnal lives of husbands and wives. As there are no husbands, nor wives, nor sexual lusts in Christ, they cannot be Christians, nor in the enjoyment of eternal life, until they exchange the earthly and transient, for the heavenly and unchangeable life. *

NOTES:—THE SHAKER is hailed with joy by the United Societies. We issued 7,000 of January number; think we shall need to use the plates again. Subscriptions come in rapidly. Our object is to disseminate truth far and near. Think it will be what we most desire it should be—a home educator. It is proposed to send free, one copy for every club of five. Samples at six cents, including postage. Exchanges made with the Press, where desirable. Any person addressing the Board of Editors, or Resident Editor, requesting answers, will enclose stamp. United Societies, let us hear from you; send us your best thoughts, from three lines to a column of lines.

SHAKERS, ALBANY, N. Y., APRIL, 1871.

No. 4.

Shaker Communities.

Are they Charitable Institutions for the Body, or for the Soul?

So long as Shakers were known to the religious world as a band of superstitious fanatics, who condemned marriage per se, and danced on the Sabbath, it treated them with ridicule as law-breakers, or with silent contempt.

When influential and highly educated men and women belonging to the popular denominations of Christian sects,—Baptists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Methodists, etc.,—and not a small company of the priests, "were obedient unto the faith," and put it into practical operation by (where it involved no dereliction of duty, or violation of contracts previously formed), sundering all the ties that bound them to "this vain, this wicked, world"—those of consanguinity, property, and marriage; and these founded societies in different States, they ascended above contempt, and "a great persecution arose." At first, this took the form of personal abuse, and often destruction of property combined with it. Their motives were impugned, and impossible crimes laid to the charge of Ann Lee, and the leaders generally. All manner of evil was said, and often sworn to as truth, until the powers of the Judiciary were evoked to prove these imaginary crimes, and punish the authors and perpetrators thereof. Law-suits were instituted to prevent the holding of property "in common," and thus break up these society-deranging establishments.

In process of time "these Shakers having become reputedly rich, are considered also to have become respectable, and are voted a place among the Christian sects; a prominent position being assigned to them in the theological world, no less than that of having 'modified the religious thought of America.'"—Dixon. A new danger besets them; that of popularity, and the "friendship of the world."

Living necessarily in large houses, to accommodate large numbers, the wondering public, not considering how many "families of five" reside and have their homes in one of these great unitary dwellings, which to them look so grand and so much like some individual rich man's mansion, speak one to another: "Are not these Shakers always neat and clean in personal appearance? Is there not ever the glow of content upon their countenances, indicative of well-supplied physical wants, and comfortable, social conditions? Do they ever run in debt? or do any of their members ever end their days in a poor-house? Certainly they must be rich; for what constitutes riches, if it be not a permanent and ample supply of food, raiment, and lodging?"

"And now that we, the discriminating public, have ridiculed, contemned, calumniated, law-suited—persecuted—these Shakers into an American institution, that will neither run out at our bidding, nor be anything but respectable on its own basis; and now, that they have become an object of general curiosity to the political economist, the socialist, the co-operative people; to the moralist, with his "social evil" problems; to the advocates of Woman's Rights, who desire a mixed government of male and female elements, and that taxation and representation should be united; to physiologists, who seek to save bodies first, and souls afterwards, if they need it; to Spiritualists and theologians generally, and to religionists in particular, who behold with awe and reverence the re-incarnation of the Christ Spirit—a veritable Primitive Church—furnishing to the European tourists much of the staple of their books of travel in the United States of America;—the momentous question arises, what are these Shakers for? and to what use can we put their successful industrial establishments?" And the answer comes back spontaneously from all people who "have the poor always with them,"—turn them into eleemosynary institutions!! they will, as such, exactly meet the wants of the age in which we live. The aged and infirm, who belong to wealthy families; the merchant who has failed in business, and lost hope in the struggle for pre-eminence; the lone widow, the orphan children, and poor relatives, generally, who are a burden to their friends; how convenient it will be to have them taken into these charitable, public institutions, where they will receive more than parental and filial care from the religious, the good, the Christian people "called Shakers."

Here follows a specimen letter of the many we receive, omitting the name and place of the writer:

"FEB. 8, 1871.

"F. W. Evans—Can you extend the hospitalities of your society to a married woman and her two girls, aged seven and three years? The mother is educated, intelligent, and virtuous; but is sick with consumption, and cannot do much work. Her husband is so lazy, that he has compelled his sick wife to chop wood, and make the garden; and consequently, as they have no means, she is about to be consigned to the charities of the town.

"If you are able to offer a home to this unfortunate woman, without separating her from her children, please address, with particulars—Mrs. ———; and likewise notify me.

To this appealing letter we returned the following answer, characteristic of our usual replies to such applications:

"MOUNT LEBANON, Feb. 12, 1871.

"Respected Friend—The case which you present is not one that we could do anything with, for several reasons: First: This is not, as many suppose, primarily, an eleemosynary institution for the relief of physical, human suffering. There are institutions especially devoted to that object, and they are above all praise. Second: The woman is not legally divorced, and we do not part man and wife [nor 'forbid to marry']: the law of the land must do that. Third: This is strictly a religious order; a home for the souls of seekers after righteousness,—those who are not, and cannot be, satisfied with the righteousness of worldly Christians, who 'marry and give in marriage,' hold private property, and 'fight' about it and their husbands and wives.

"We seek the best (physiologically) the world can produce—those who are 'compelled,' by the wants of their souls—to come, with the intent and hope of making them better. We can take a limited number of children of good parentage, who have had a moral and religious training, when old enough to understand somewhat of our faith and principles—twelve years and upwards,—preferring them at eighteen or twenty-one, when they are free men and women.

Respectfully,

"F. W. EVANS."

This answer did not give entire satisfaction to the parties applying, as witness the following extract from a subsequent letter:

"Imagine Jesus at table, and refusing food to a woman because she had a husband, and not suffering her little children to come unto him because their mother had not a divorce. I am aware that there are charitable institutions 'beyond praise,' but not beyond censure. They do not furnish country air, fruits, cleanliness, employment and home, such as are to a considerable degree found in your societies; and, thinking of the future of the little ones, I thought they would be safest among you. Let me give you this advice, as a lady: Be charitable outside of yourselves; build a workshop, a hospital, a school-house for non-Shakers, and thus show the world that you can spend money for the good of others.

"I am, very sincerely, the well-wisher of you and your associates."

Now we know what the Shakers are for. Each society is to build workshops, and manage them so that the poor can earn a living, and the public be relieved of the English question, "What shall we do with the pauper baby?" and with the pauper question generally; "for, even in famine and captivity, they (the public) will still get children," without any rational forethought or insight into their future.

Each society is to build a hospital, and nurse the victims of small waists, thin shoes, idiotic, ball-room head-gear, and fashionable air, food and medicines, that the public conscience may be at ease, knowing how the simple Shakers are living upon, and suffering for, their sins.

And next, they may erect and officer school-houses for non-Shakers the more readily, as now we are likely to have "A Law for the Protection of Minors," termed by the Tribune, "Norton's Inquisitorial Bill." And this will amply protect such children from any mistaken ministration on the part of the Shakers, of their heretical, unorthodox, and unpopular theology, or even of their religion, "which is contrary to all nature;" but of whose temporal "fruits" the public are desirous enough to possess themselves.

This is what the Shakers are for: to provide a home for the body, if they do not prove to be so ignorant, and such "obstinate heretics," that they cannot comprehend their mission in and to "the world" who "marry and give in marriage."

It appears, upon record, that Jesus did rebuke those who followed him, not because of his miracles—his soul ministrations—but for the incidental "loaves and fishes" with which he had fed their bodies. And the "little children" who constitute heaven, are (in their characteristics of innocence and dependent love of truth) such as have become little children. "Except ye receive the kingdom (which in the latter day was to be established upon earth) as little children" just born into the natural world receive external things from a natural mother, and then successively from a father, and brothers, and sisters, they should in nowise enter therein; and not that little children (who are simply used as a figure) literally are subjects of a heavenly order, until as men, and women, they, by their own free agency, travel into it. If "the kingdom" were composed of "little children" physically, they would outgrow the "kingdom" when they come to be men and women.

The suggestion of the above letter writer to the Shakers is not a bad one, at all. It is questionable whether we ourselves have not become somewhat mixed in our ideas of charity, confounding the body and soul together; the Lord's poor, and "the world's" poor.

There is no law against love and good works—against charity to the poor and afflicted of this world. But, what Believers are able and willing to do for non-Shakers," let it not be done by "taking them into the number" who, from Christian faith, "have all things common," and thereby attempt to make Shakers of them. But rather, build work-shops, wash-houses, hospitals, and school-houses, or help to support those that are already built.

"Hanging a man" is not a worse use to put him to, than converting a Shaker Society into a world's charitable institution for the relief of the poor. It would be a desecration, and a double wrong; first, to the real Shakers, by compelling them to associate with paupers, and then to the poor, by "compelling" them to become Shakers (if that were possible) in order to have a home for their bodies. Let there be a separation. 7

Lost! somewhere between sunrise and sunset, two golden hours; no reward is offered, as the loser knows they are gone forever! E. MYRICK.

1. "If all should be Shakers, the world would run out!" We want none to be Shakers, who copulate only, to prevent that terrible catastrophe—"running the world out."

2. Ye consumptive patients! abandon your diseased animal food—live on natural food. GEO. WILCOX.

While the young in Zion are anxious to spread true testimony, let them not forget that a practical working-out of the beautiful theory is just now, more than ever, needful. Jesus' teachings were plainly manifested in common life; and the conviction of mankind in our day must be, by our efforts, in the same homely manner. N. A. BRUGGS.

POETICAL.

Morning.

A brighter day is dawning,
Blest Zion, upon Thee!
I see the rays of morning,
Now gilding spire and tree—
I see the cloud-capped mountain
Take on a golden hue,
As up the eastern horizon
The sun appears in view.

Arise! and shake thy garments;
Thy night of rest is gone!
Arrayed in thine adornments,
Come forth to meet the morn!
Hail, with a joyful greeting
The Messenger of Light!
Before whose face retreating,
Are seen the shades of night.

Come, now, and view the landscapes
So splendid to behold;
While Light, as with a mantle, drapes
The Earth in limpid gold.
See, little, pearly drops of dew
All sparkling with delight;
Soon these will vanish from our view,
As have the shades of night.

For, as the Sun ascendeth higher,
The gilded Glory fades;
While radiant Light, like heat from fire,
The shadiest nook invades.
All who within the forest stand,
Are shielded from bright rays;
While those who cultivate the land,
Work in the Sun's broad blaze.

So, well improve these golden hours
E'er they have passed away;
On wings, the Morning upward soars
To full Meridian day.
"Arise and work," is duty's call;
Come forth, the vineyard prune;
And renovate the broken wall
Upon the ground now strewn.

For, all the beasts that roam the fields,
Can enter when they please;
And whatsoever fruit it yields,
Appropriate with ease.
Let more security ensure
The product of this soil,
Although the laborers are fewer
Who in the vineyard toil.

A. E. P., Har.

Soliloquy.

Oh, my sweet gospel treasure!
Oh, my soul-cheering treasure!
All the cross, and burdens vanish
At the sight of my reward!
See! my Fathers and my Mothers!
All my Sisters and my Brothers!
Can the world, with all its glory,
Produce one like unto these?

"I want to be an Angel," is sung by the multitudes with much sincerity; but the reality of the ideal is not desirable, with the majority, while carnal gratifications are possible. People too commonly live as though they despised the life of an Angel, nor would they be "children of the Resurrection" if they could.

"Do you enjoy yourself?" asked a scoffing inquirer of Br. Daniel Moseley. "Nay," said Daniel, "I crucify myself, and enjoy Christ!"

The inauguration of Christianity called upon all to forsake the carnal lives of father, mother, wife, husband; and property, such as houses and lands. Has the gospel of Christ changed hands?

The Shakers do not worship Ann Lee; never did. They do not worship Jesus; never did. Jesus was a man—a Jew; Ann was a woman—a Gentile; they were both baptized with the Christ Spirit—this Spirit we worship.

What is Infidelity and Who Are Infidels.

Growth is a law of soul, as really as of the corporeal frame. All truth is, in its nature, adapted to progress. All genuine revelations from God to man are conformable to this law. It follows that all religious creeds, that do not admit of continuous and eternal revelations of the purposes and will of God to man, are of human, instead of divine origin. It only requires researches into the plan of human progress in divine grace, set forth in the Christian Bible, to perceive the truth that God's requisitions and laws to man in one dispensation of His grace and truth to humanity, are superseded, or transcended, by succeeding dispensations of the revelation of His will to man.

A primary necessity with correspondents, in order to be rightly understood, is a mutual acceptance of the meaning of words and phrases; a want of this precaution has been the cause of fierce verbal contentions among those whose real faith and convictions—whose actual life conditions—were not dissimilar, except in a limited degree.

Since the prefix in, negatives words to which it is applied, we are first to look for the signification of "fidelity" and to its application to God, Christ, and Religion. As used in theology, fidelity means faithfulness to the testimonies of a Creed of religious faith. Hence, infidelity is unfaithfulness to such testimonies.

Thus, since we have opposition of religious Creeds in what is called Christendom, in this sense, we might have Christian Infidels, as well as heathen Infidels. And, to illustrate: The Creed of Universalism is Infidel to the Creed of Episcopalianism, since the former teaches the eventual salvation of all mankind, while the latter teaches that only an elected few are to be saved, and the remainder are subjects of damnation! Equally Infidel to these two is the Christian faith "par excellence," taught by Jesus and his disciples: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Whoso will, let him partake of the waters of life freely." "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper; but he that confesseth and forsaketh them, shall find mercy." That is, all who come to Christ, confess and forsake sin, will be saved!

But, as the creeds of all religions claim God as the "Rock of Ages" on which to build their faith, so Infidelity, in a wider and more extended sense, refers to a disbelief in God. Yet, as there are "Gods many, and Lords many," and the character and attributes constituting the Being which religious people call God, vary so widely in the Creedal faith of different denominations called Christian, that, the first subject to be decided in order to determine the question what constitutes an Infidel to the Christian's God, is to determine what are the true attributes and true character of the Christian's God.

As God, the Creator of Heaven and Earth, and the illimitable Universe of Universes, is infinite in power and wisdom, so is God unknown to, and incomprehensible by man, except by revelation; and the God, or the character of God, revealed to the human family of one era of the world's history, is widely different from that revealed in a subsequent age. And, further, the God revealed to one nation, or class of human beings, differs widely from the God revealed to another class of human beings in the same era of the world's history.

Thus, one class of believers in God are infidel to another class of believers in God! But, this infidelity is easily seen to be simply relative infidelity; that is, the creed of one class of believers in God is Infidel to the creed of another class, leaving the question still open, "What is positive Infidelity to God?"

The lowest, most primitive idea of God known to man, is that of Fetichism, so called: God, as known to the Africans; consisting of some vast object of wonder or power—as cast rocks, huge mountains, immense forests, boundless waters, etc. Their symbolical representations of gods, their idols, are in human form, because this form exists intuitively in the human mind as the highest manifestation of God's creative power. The first act of reason in man is to personify incomprehensibilities, so as to obtain a clear idea of such existing facts.

The second idea of God, manifest to humanity in the ascending scale, was God as a vast, abstract, incomprehensible power, possessing all the prominent passions of man, and the cause of the same; or God, in the character of a vast Producer, Provider, Originator of all things, ministering to man's necessities, or pandering to his desires, good or evil.

In this character man attempts to present God to the imagination of his fellow man, in any form embodying what he most needs or desires—as a rare plant, a strong element; as winds, waters, fire, etc. This era of the knowledge of God embraces the Grecian Mythologies. For the most part, God is now represented as a Positive or Generative power, or Being; and the idolatrous symbol was a BULL; an ORB—as the SUN, the MOON—Egypt's OSIRIS, which, with other Egyptian Idols, was meant to represent whatever acts upon passive matter, for the good of man; or, the active energy of life! This character of God was also represented by the Grecians' JUPITER, the most powerful of the heathen gods, and the Origin of everything, good or evil—the ACTIVE POWER. It was also represented by the Musselman's ALLAH, the Platonist's ALL GOOD, the Theist's DEITY, and the Norman's ODIN.

The third idea, or first revelation of God, is religious—GOD as a Ruler of mankind! yet, incomprehensible to man. This is the first character of God, designated by Moses to the Jews; that is, I. AM. A jealous, revengeful, passionate, repenting, changeful and fitful Sovereign, visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children to the fourth generation: giving the Jewish law to Moses. This idea of God might have been spontaneously suggested by the want of government in the human family upon earth.

The fourth idea of God, or the second revelation of God, was made to Moses, and revealed God as a Parentage, under the Hebrew name of "JEHOVAH," literally meaning "He,

She." This name was so sacred to the Jews, that they only pronounced it in a whisper, evidently because the time had not yet arrived for the comprehension and declaration of the character of God as a dual Being, Male and Female.

The fifth idea, or third revelation of God, is a HEAVENLY FATHER; a Being, but a spiritual Being; the Creator of all things, and dispenser of blessings to man; the establisher of law, and obedience thereto was LIFE; disobedience, DEATH; a kind, loving, merciful Parent; careful for the good of His creatures; in character the opposite of the Mosaic I AM. The law of the I AM God, as revealed to Moses, was that of revenge; "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth;" "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." This God was in possession of the passions of humanity! Joshua said: "Our God is a jealous God."

The law of the Heavenly Father God, as revealed by Jesus Christ was: "Do good to all, and good only!" "Ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time," said Jesus, "thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy; but I say unto you, love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that despitefully use you and persecute you."

The sixth idea, or fourth revelation of God, is God as a Dual, Spiritual Parentage, FATHER AND MOTHER God; kind, merciful, loving and forgiving; not only creating, but nursing, developing and happyfying their creatures.

Thus, it is clearly seen, that a human intelligence, who, in any of the former eras of these manifestations of God, had a revelation of God more full and true, in advance of the day in which he lived, would be considered Infidel to the God, or God Character, previously known. Also, the believer in the former character of God, would be infidel to him.

It has been said, and we believe truly, that "The God of the Jews was not the God of the Universe;" and, we might truly add, not the God of the Christians! This, to some understandings, may appear infidel; but, viewed in its true light, the kind of infidelity which is the fruit of a new, a true, and increasing revelation of the knowledge of God, is a virtue, and not an evil!

It is not difficult to see that the character of God revealed to Moses, in the name of I AM, was different from that revealed in the name of Jehovah; neither is it difficult to perceive that the character of God revealed in the name of a Heavenly Father only, is different from that of God as a Heavenly Father and Mother. Hence, the actual truth, when fully revealed, is, that there is but one true God, consisting of Male and Female constituents or principles, forming one complete Being, as God, A HEAVENLY FATHER and MOTHER, the primary source and Creator of all existences; yet, this God, in this Character, has not been generally revealed to man; but God has been gradually revealed to man, and understood by man in different characters; and, in this light, "The God of Moses was not the God of the Universe." The God of the Universe, the HEAVENLY FATHER and MOTHER, God, was not fully revealed until the second coming of Christ, in the female. This is the dispensation of the revelation of God to man, wherein "the mystery of God should be finished."—Rev. x. 7th. Then, and not till then, was to be revealed the Mother in God, or, the Motherhood of God! She was hinted at by Moses, and alluded to by Jesus, but the time for the revelation was when Christ should make the second appearance, through "One like unto the Son of Man." Nothing is more like unto a Son of Man than a daughter of man! And thus, as the Son Jesus, revealed the FATHER, God, so the daughter, Ann, "the Word," revealed the MOTHER, God! Here it should be observed, lest the understanding be falsely impressed, that, aside from the clothing of the spiritual baptism, the Mediator of this revelation, the embodiment of this Sonship, is not an Oracle of God; is not authority. Had Jesus, as a man, been infidel to the duties of his high calling, as the first-born Son of God, the Father would have rejected him, and called in another Medium in his stead, to reveal the Fatherhood of God.

In like manner there is no absolute importance, in the abstract, attachable to the person of Ann Lee, that she should become the first-born daughter of God—the Oracle to reveal the Mother in God, and the Bridal help-meet of the "Second Adam," "The Lord from Heaven," "a quickening Spirit." Had She been infidel to her high calling into Christ's death and resurrection, another female would have been called who would be filial, and by her sufferings and obedience, reveal the Motherhood, the Duality of God, and of his Christ!

Many Creeds of religion teach that Jesus is God; that the Holy Ghost is God, and that the Father alone is God; but, whence is this idea of God derived? When we search for the divinely inspired Mediator between God and man, to find who was the chosen Oracle to reveal this character of God to man, we fail to find such an agency. It had no existence until near the close of the fifth century of the Christian Era; hence, it was no revelation of God through Jesus Christ; but its birth seems to have originated in a Popish Council.

Now, if Jesus Christ is the Oracular law-giver, and divinely-anointed teacher of the Church of Christ on earth, and he never taught that Jesus is God, but did, habitually call himself "the Son of Man," as if to wisely forestall all legendary and mythological assumptions of his Divinity, is it not Infidelity to the Christian religion to declare that Jesus Christ is God? His immediate disciples, the twelve Apostles, dared not do it; they declared him to be the Christ of God, after he had been clothed upon by the baptism of the Holy Ghost! In answer to the question which Jesus put to them, saying, "Whom say ye that I am?" Simon Peter answered, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God!" Jesus blessed him, and told him flesh and blood had not revealed it to him, but "My Father which is in Heaven."

Again, where is the Oracle who was Divinely authorized to declare that the Holy Ghost is God? We have no record of such an Oracle! The idea was not taught by Jesus, neither by his apostles, nor by the Primitive Christian Church. From all of the teachings and references of Jesus and his Apostles concerning the Holy Ghost, the only idea taught is, that the Holy Ghost was a godly spirit, which the followers of Christ should receive and be filled with, and be covered, by a baptism, once spoken of as a "Witness for Christ;" "The Comforter;" an Anointing resting on Jesus (see Acts x. 38), and on his disciples, as is manifest by multitudinous passages of Scripture. The Apostles spoke of the "Holy Ghost" also, as a Servant or Messenger of God! Paul speaks of the "love of God shed in your hearts by the Holy Ghost." Peter speaks of the "Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven;" but, no where, in Scripture, is the Holy Ghost called God! No history, then, gives us any account of a revelation of God proclaiming to us the Holy Ghost as God! but simply a ministering spirit!

The Holy Ghost, God, like unto the Jesus, God, had its birth in the Anti-Christian Church, after the falling away of the Primitive Christian Church! It was a god-child of the Catholic Priesthood; and, may it not be truly said, born of folly? And, when the true God (Heavenly Father and Mother) is revealed to all humanity, will not a Triune God be considered by all humanity as Infidelity? The Christian revelation of the true God will bear stating; bear canvassing; bear investigation; and, God of Mercy be praised, that, however infidel it may appear to some professors of the Christian faith, there are, at the present day, even in Rome, "Prelates who do not believe that the Pope is the authoritative and infallible interpreter of God." But freedom of belief, liberty of conscience, is infidel to Popery! And, in these days, Modern Italy, the Governor of the Catholic World, has become somewhat Infidel to Popery in the proportion of 40, 835, to 46. But, we are not to consider this question as Catholics, nor as Protestants, but as men and Christians!

Descending from Infidelity to God, we are more particularly to inquire after Infidelity to Christianity; that is, the doctrines of Christ, and those opposed thereto; Infidelity to the Christian Church!

In reference to Christ's doctrines, as the standard for Christianity, we have the Gospel Testimony in a nutshell, the fulfilling of the law! Jesus said, "I came not to destroy the law (of Moses), but to fulfill it." The great precept of the fulfillment of the law, is "love to God and Man." We then have the fruits of love: First, Purity; second, Peace; third, Mercy; fourth, God-like, or good fruits. Goodness embraces Charity and forgiveness; these all sum up in newness of life, in everything! "He that sat on the throne said, 'Behold, I make all things new.'" This was Jesus Christ. New Heavens, New Earth, a new man, a new woman, a new relation and association of the sexes, for a new, a heavenly purpose—to people the new Creation of God by regeneration (which is synonymous with the resurrection of the soul), not by generation! For, said Jesus, "My Kingdom is not of this world;" "They that are counted worthy to obtain that world, the heavenly resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are (in this present time and world) as the Angels of God in Heaven."

Generation is the basic law of this world, and the Oracle for its perpetuity. Of generation we have the selfishness of man; mine and thine. Of this is derived the impurities and lusts of humanity, both of the flesh and of the mind! Of these lusts come ambition, fraud, strife, war and woe. "Whence come wars and fightings? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?"—James.

Thus, then, an Angel life, a Celibate life of virgin purity, in thought, word and deed, is the Christ life! The Christian character is set forth by the Apostle as follows: First pure, then peaceable, full of mercy and good fruits; a life Christ lived out—not merely believed in; this is Christianity. Jesus said, "Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in Heaven! This is fidelity to Christianity! Hence, Infidelity to Christianity consists in merely believing in Christian precepts, and trusting in the merits of Jesus for Salvation; for, said Christ, "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give to every one according as his works shall be." Not to crown him with Salvation according to the righteousness of Jesus; this is Infidelity to Christianity! Judged then, by Jesus Christ, all are infidels to Christianity who trust in the merits of Jesus for Salvation, instead of living as Jesus lived!!

Descending in our inquiries from the Christian's God and the Christian Testimony, to to the Christian Church, to inquire what is Infidelity and who are Infidels, we are first to consider, that a Heavenly Father and Mother, God, presumes a family; who are their children? for no Being, not even God, can be a Father or Mother without children! Hence, we have Sons and Daughters of God, constituting the Christian Church, the Kingdom of God.

The Governmental Order of this Christ Church is theoretically Patriarchal, the Supreme Authority being the Heavenly Father and Mother, God! The secondary, derivative, or mediatorial authority, Elder Brethren and Elder Sisters! Jesus was the Elder Brother of Christ's Church—"The first-born among many Brethren," as set forth by Paul. Ann (the Shakers believe) was the first-born among many Sisters; if not, then a first-born Daughter is yet to come! But if the Son revealed the Father, should not the Daughter be the legitimate revelator of the Mother?

The Church of Christ, then, being constituted of a heavenly family of Brethren and Sisters, living in the innocent and dependent capacity of the Children of God (not of husbands and wives), in a pure, celibate, angelic state, as live the Angels of Heaven, and governed, in an immediate capacity, by the Heavenly Father and Mother, God, but in a Mediate Capacity, by the Older (Elder) Brethren and Sisters of the family, and practicing the life-teachings and examples of Jesus Christ, is the Christian Church! And, thus to live, is fidelity to the Church, "par excellence!"

Then, may not Infidelity to the Church consist: First, in ignoring the Father and Mother, God, as the leading authority of the Christian Church, and substituting a Triune God, of three males, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, all equal in age—that is, the Son as old as his Father, and older than his Mother (Mary), yet, having two Mothers, the Holy Ghost Mother being the same age as her Son? And secondly, as Mediatorial authority to lead this Church, substituting Popes and Cardinals, all of the male sex, as infallible vicegerents of this Trinitarian, Masculine God. And, thirdly, for the Church laity, instead of simple Brethren and Sisters, of grace, and of the regeneration, whose souls are resurrected from the death of sin and made immortal, substituting husbands and wives—men and women living in natural generation—who propose to be carnally resurrected, to continue to propagate an earthly, sensual race, to be forever mortal, only simply clothed by a frock of immortality.

In a financial capacity, Fidelity to the Church of Christ on earth, is, for its Church members to have all things in common, as Brethren and Sisters of the Parents' household!

May not Infidelity be claiming personal and selfish property for their generated offspring, mine and thine—practicing wars and bloodshed by which to settle controversies, instead of loving and forgiving?

The language of Fidelity to the Christian Church is, "Come unto me all ye that weary and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." The language of Infidelity is: Believe or be damned, and be damned if you do believe, unless elected by God to be saved, let you be Sinner or Saint.

Fidelity teaches election to Heaven; Salvation to all souls, indiscriminately, who will confess and repent of all sin, whether in this world or in the next.

Prospectively considered, Fidelity to Christ's Church consists in forsaking the world, for the purpose of living a holy life—that is, a life set apart for a godly use; coming unto Zion, Christ's Church, with a motive to build up the Cause of God in the earth; consecrating temporal substance, time, talents, and spirit to work for God, and work, too, with a will.

Infidelity to Christ's Church prospectively, is to gather to the Church because of poverty, "for the loaves and fishes," because of inability through sickness, idleness or negligence to make a home in the world; hence, ready to unite with any movement that promises ease, plenty and individual freedom from earthly cares!

Nay, these may not build the temple of the living God on earth! these may not reform society and "make all things new." These are Infidels to the Church!!

The problem of a new life for humanity, and a new order of society, of heavenly type, must be solved by those in possession of living faith, unflinching devotion, indomitable perseverance, and undying energy, and who consecrate their lives and treasures to God forever.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Teachings of Ann Leo.

Multitudes visited Mother Ann at her home, and made many inquiries. She was ever ready and willing to give information when inquiries came from the honest seeker after truth.

From the following remarks may be learned the answers she made to some of the questions asked her; the questions are generally omitted as unnecessary. 1. Joseph Meacham, on meeting with her, asked: "How is it, you being a woman, teach in the Church, and even claim to be the head of it?"

"The order of God in the natural creation, is a figure of the same in the Spiritual: As in nature, it requires a man and woman to produce children, the man being first, and the woman second in the government of the family; and the children must be subject to their parents, and the woman subject to her husband, who is first; and when the man is gone, the right of government belongs, not to the children, but to the woman; such is the case in the family of Christ."

2. "The Gospel is the greatest of treasures; be faithful unto it. Put your hands to work, and give your hearts to God. Beware of covetousness, which is the sin of witchcraft. If you have anything to spare, give it to the poor."

3. "Be faithful unto gospel duty; be neat and industrious; keep your family's clothes clean and decently repaired. See that your house is kept clean, and your food prepared in good order; that when the brethren come from their hard work, they may bless you, and eat their food with thankfulness, and be able to praise God in the beauty of holiness. Watch and be careful; don't speak harshly, nor cast reflections upon them; let your words be few and seasoned with grace."

4. "You must put away your covetousness, your lust and your filthiness, and be prepared for the increase of the Gospel. Remember the poor and needy; the widow and the fatherless; deal your bread to the hungry, and your clothes to the naked. Your natures will say, 'let them work for them;' but Christ sayeth not so. Remember the cries of those in need and in trouble, that when you are in trouble, God will hear your cries."

5. "Little children are innocent; and they should be kept so. If brought up in innocence and simplicity they will receive good as easily as evil. Do not blame them for every little fault; teach them obedience, let your word be law. Never speak to them in a passion; it will put devils into them. When I was a child, my mind was taken up with the things of God, so that I saw heavenly visions, instead of trifling with toys. Do all your work as though you had a thousand years to live; and as though you were going to die to-morrow."

6. "Once my feet walked in forbidden paths; my hands handled unclean things, and my eyes saw nothing of God aright. Now, my feet are in the narrow way; my eyes see, my ears hear, and my hands handle the word of God. You can never enter the kingdom of God with hard feeling towards any. God is love; and if you love God, you will love one another."

7. "The work of God in this day is an inward, spiritual work. It is not so great in outward appearance as it was in past Dispensations; therefore, souls must be very careful how they treat this Gospel. Such as finally reject the testimony thereof in this world, will not have another day equal to this; nor any, until an offer of the Gospel shall have been made to the entire race of Adam. The Gospel will increase; small at first, but will yet be embraced by hundreds and thousands. It will increase, until the covering is taken off, that now covers the rottenness of anti-christ's foundation; then, souls that are bound in sin will call to the rocks and the mountains to cover them."

8. "Those who obeyed the Gospel on Earth, taking up their cross as Jesus did, stand with him on Mount Zion; these are in the first resurrection; while those who wait to receive and obey the truth in their disembodied states, will not be so glorious, but constitute the second fruits."

9. "All souls will have an offer of this Gospel, either in this world or the world of spirits. You have your day now, prize it. By obedience you can progress out of your loss, and become over-comers as Jesus was; but souls in the world of spirits make their progress through sufferings, passing from prison to prison, until they find the mercy of God!"

We purpose a continuation of Ann Lee's sayings; they may sound ancient; they may seem superstitious; but obedience to them has ever wrought greater purity of character, and created an appetite for works of righteousness—a progress from a little faith unto greater faithfulness. *

The Religion of the Revolutionary Fathers.

In early childhood—almost in infancy—when the mind is plastic and confiding, I went to meeting. The meeting was in a barn, still standing, near the 45th parallel, on the Highgate side of the line, between what was then Elder Thomas Best's and Colonel Lake's.

The preacher, in demonstrating the necessity for deferring the final judgment to some remote period, used the following argument: "It cannot be ascertained, at death, the amount of good or evil that a man has done. For instance, there is Father Wesley: it may take thousands of years to determine the amount of good he has done. On the other hand, there is Tom Paine: it may take as many thousand years to calculate the vast amount of evil he has done."

Of course, I took it for granted, that Father Wesley, if not the best, was next to the best, man that ever was; and that Tom Paine must rank next to a certain unmentionable character, of which or whom the preacher made frequent mention.

First impressions, especially in theology, remain, till driven out by sternest logic.

While still a child, of some ten or twelve summers, my father, from one of his frequent visits to his brother, Captain John Prentiss, of Rutland, Vermont, brought home a book, entitled "The Jeffersonade; or Democracy Unveiled: by Dr. Caustic." This I read.

Jefferson, in his "Notes on Virginia," written while Governor of Virginia, said: "It matters not to me, whether my neighbor believes in one God, or twenty. It neither picks my pocket, nor breaks my leg."

Jefferson wrote the Declaration of Independence, and it was unanimously adopted by the Continental Congress, with slight variations.

When something over twenty years of age, a gentleman from Albany gave me a pamphlet purporting to have been written by Thomas Paine. How dared I to read it? I did read it, and then threw it into the fire.

The pamphlet, written in America, was addressed to the masses of Europe, with the intent of lifting them from the thralldom of superstition, that they might begin to be men. He dealt in great plainness of speech, with what he seemed to regard as the unwarranted assumptions of the clergy; told, at considerable length, what he did not believe. Then he said, "Perhaps some of my readers would like to know what I do believe. That there was such a man as Jesus of Nazareth I verily believe; and that he was the most perfect example of righteousness this world ever saw, I also believe. And, if they who profess to be his followers would pay more attention to following his example, and make less noise about it, I believe it would be infinitely better for the world of mankind."

Some years later, I met with my father, who was deeply religious and an admirer of Father Wesley. I ventured to question him on what seemed to me an incongruity in my early-imbibed notions of Tom Paine, as compared with the sentiments expressed in the pamphlet. I said to him, "Do you know anything of Thomas Paine?" He said, "Yes; I was well acquainted with him. He was Washington's private secretary; and, while I was in the Life Guards, I used to see him every day." "Well," said I, "what can you say of him?"

This was the first time I had ever moved the question. I regarded it as a delicate subject; and my father seemed so to regard it. After some deliberation, he said:

"Well, to do him justice, if I say anything, I must say he was the best man in America. He did more to achieve our independence than any other man, except Washington. And I don't know that I do right to make that exception. For when, after repeated disasters, we were retreating south, pursued by a well-fed, well-clad, superior force (it was the darkest time of the war), Washington said to his Secretary: 'Paine, what shall we do? This army is the only hope of the country. Here we are, in dead of winter, unclothed, unfed unshod; the men leave the prints of their bare and bleeding feet on the frozen ground; their term of enlistment is about to expire; and I have not the heart, under such circumstances, to ask them to re-enlist. What can we do?'"

"After solemnly reviewing the situation, Paine replied, 'If you will form the men into a hollow square, around that stump, we'll see what can be done.' The men were formed; Paine mounted the stump. All eyes were upon him. The men had often seen him, but had seldom heard him; for he was a man of few words. Paine carefully and solemnly surveyed his audience. There was silence audible. He spoke. His words were highly charged with electric fire. Thus he began:

"This is the time to try men's souls! The summer soldier and rotten-hearted villain that now deserts his country's cause deserves the curses of his fellow-citizens."

"When his oration was ended, the soldiers, almost to a man, re-enlisted. They had received Paine's inspiration. A new soul was in them. They assaulted and carried the Hessian camp. The tide of war was turned, and success followed success. Cornwallis surrendered; the war ended; the men, unpaid, went home to provide for their little ones as best they could; and Paine's reputation, like that of public benefactors in general, was committed to the tender mercies of—not the wicked, of course not—the clergy."

"Independence is my happiness; I view things as they are, without regard to place or person. My country is the world; my religion, to do good."—Paine. O. P.

Plain Talks—No. 1.

There is a deep, religious agitation at work in the hearts of the people. It is not manifested by bubbling, church revivals, that too commonly burst, and leave the individual the worse for its spirit-intoxication; but it is deeply, silently working; silently anxious for, and demanding more of soul-satisfaction. Church theologies are becoming stale, and the Divine life is looked for, yearned for, demanded. "What shall I do to be saved?" stirs the bosoms of thousands who cannot find satisfactory answers in their temples of worship.

Popular preachers are learning that popular preaching may pamper the intellect, but does not feed the hungry soul; and that it is impossible to impart the love and life of Christ to their flocks, when they neither have that love, nor live that life. The crisis is coming. The Life-of-Christ testimony has taken issue with the death, and Calvary-blood theory! Life versus Death!

There is much soul-distress in the land; this is the result of disobedience to heavenly light—"this is the condemnation." God hears the earnest seeker after truth, and answers; but God's answer speaks of self-denial, of the physical cross; of the higher life and the Angel character, and sweetly says, "Come up hither!" and the representative soul responds, "Lord! (for the present) excuse me." God does excuse; the soul's trouble increases; it feels that it is excused from God's help, by refusing to obey God's will.

"Help, help!" cries the soul; "LIVE, LIVE!" cries the Spirit. And yet, how hard is the lesson, "live unto God and die unto every sinful practice!"

Scores of individuals are writing us, predicting the coming of the Spirit of Christ the second time.

Scores of periodicals are just issuing, declaring the same fact; to all of which we say, Amen. The Spirit of Christ has appeared once, through Jesus, and already to some the second time; and we learn from its testimony, to live apart from sexual and sensual lusts; we learn from it that the virgin character is alone countenanced in the heavens; we learn from it, that private property belongs to the earthly life—to the generative sphere, and has no part with Christ nor with Christians. It teaches us that war is devilish, and those who practice it, the servants of the devil! Plain, but true. The soul wants truth; it will be satisfied with nothing else. We have taken issue with the whole world of sin; we have stripped off the mask that covers, with fine words and splendid appearances, with false philosophy and unchristian teaching, the distresses of the soul, that rob it of eternal life; and we accept the consequences.

Theorise, twist with dexterous legerdmain the Scriptures; transform the real life of Jesus into what his teachings may have meant; we accept his life and love of goodness as our pattern and hope of Salvation, knowing full well, that as fast as the second Appearing manifests itself to souls, and its teachings are accepted, others will do likewise.

We have large respect for the sincere; but we have no respect for those who sing the praise of Jesus, but hate him in their lives, knowing what they do. We cannot daub, with hopes of salvation, the carnal mind nor body, whose loves and practices are at enmity with Christ's life. Let us, before accepting any religious sympathy from our professedly Christian leaders, demand that they strictly follow the true leader—Christ; and were this rule generally adopted, we would see the sheep's-clothing thrown off extensively, and the hood-winks dropping from the eyes of the multitudes.

Let us have Christ's life as a pattern—can we do better? and what in our lives, does not harmonize with it, let us confess the same to be unchristian, and we, so far from being Christians. "Open confession is good for the soul;" and to this point of decision is the present religious agitation bringing souls—to a self-examination. Many there are who have arrived at the conviction (in foro conscientia) that their lives have not been Christian; and rather than do the work, and live the life of a Christian, they have renounced the name—F. E. Abbott-like—and declare we are not, and will not be Christians. This is the more honorable course, rather than live and die in sin; exulting in all the practices, or even in some of them that are opposites to Christ's life, and yet hope to be saved from the penalties of sins we will not relinquish while it is in our power to engage in them. *

The following is Prof. Bush's rendering of Zach. 4:7:—

"MI ATTAUH HAUR GAUDOL LIPNA ZERUBEABEL LENISHOR DOTZIA EBEN ROSH TESHUA ANN ANN LEE."

Let us look into the next world: Bodily habits contracted here, will have no medium there; and hence we will be necessitated to unlearn there, wrongs we have indulged in here. Is it not a wise choice, to engage in nothing here, but what we can hereafter?

The most useless of tasks is to save another from conditions we are lost in ourselves. Jesus first overcame the whole world of evil, before he encouraged his disciples to follow him. We are called to be Saviours; let us first seek salvation, not from penalties but from practices of sin; then can we help our fellows out of the pit.

Parents should think, while teaching their children to confess to them their wrongs, that the gospel of Christ demands of Parents, confession unto apostles. *

The Church of Christ.

What is the church of Christ? The apostolic term, which is rendered church in our English version of the New Testament, is ecclesia, which signifies, sometimes, a collection of believers in Christ in any one place, and sometimes, all the believers, wherever located.

In ancient Athens, the term was applied, commonly, to the assembly of citizens for the transaction of public business. The ecclesia included only the freemen of Athens; hence, by a very appropriate transfer, it was applied to the Assembly of Christians, who were all regarded as one, and entitled to equal privileges in the church. In respect to all essential rights, no association of persons has ever existed in which was greater equality than in the church of the apostles' day. In this respect, there was neither Greek nor Barbarian, bond nor free.

The Greek word, ecclesia, with slight changes, has been retained by the Latin nations of Europe. In the Italian language, it is chiesa; in the Spanish, iglesia, and in the French, eglise. But the Teutonic or Germanic nations have taken their term for the church from another Greek word, kuriakon, an adjective, which, taken with the agreeing noun, soma, signifies the Lord's body, and, with doma, the Lord's house. Hence, we find in the German language, kirche, in the Danish and Scotch, kirke and kirk, and in the English, church.

The Apostle Paul, who, in common with most Asiatic writers, had a fondness for the use of metaphors, sometimes represented Christians in their collective capacity as an edifice. "That thou mayest know how to conduct thyself in the house of God," he wrote to Timothy; then, in immediate juxtaposition, he used three other similar yet appropriate figures, "which is the ecclesia or assembly of the living God, the pillar and foundation of the truth." Again, in addressing Christians, he said, "Ye are the temple of the living God." But his favorite figure was that of the human body, which probably as aptly illustrates the real, living church of Christ as any figure that can be employed. "God has appointed him (Christ), pre-eminently, the head of the ecclesia, which is his body, the fullness of him who fills all things among all." "For as the body is one, yet has many members, and all the members of this one body, though many, are but one body, so also is Christ"—that is, Jesus Christ and his church,—"for by one Spirit we have all been baptized into one body."

The figure has been so amply enlarged by the apostle that one can hardly fail to comprehend its full force. He has presented to the imagination a living, active being, composed of various parts, yet all actuated by an impulse; the head devising what is deemed needful for the entire body, and each part acting in harmony with the whole, so that whatever is done by each, contributes equally to the welfare of every other. That which characterizes this being, is the spirit with which it is animated. Its fulness or completeness is from the Infinite Being who fills all things. That Being is unchangeably the same—Eternal Love. The body that is actuated and governed by Love, evinces it by harmonious action within itself—there can be no division among its various parts. The figure means this, or it means nothing. Hence, the propriety of these words of the apostle,—"If any man has not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." By no effort of the imagination can we include in such a body opposing elements which array the members against each other. We may use other figures, if we choose, to express the various opposing elements that exist among mankind; but how they can be admitted as appropriate to a body moving under the impulse of divine love, and governed by it in all its actions, it would be difficult to tell. Not only must the apostle's rhetoric be changed, but human reason must be reconstructed. Let it be granted that human nature has been such in all ages, that wars and contentions have been unavoidable, yet, why not assign to these their true origin? If human passions are stronger than God's grace in Christ, yet it was never admitted by the apostle. The Christian's course has been represented by Paul as a warfare, it is true, yet such a warfare as is not inconsistent with the figure of a united body, a well-constructed and beautiful mansion, or a temple which is the glory of the whole earth. So he has represented it as a race, but only such a race, as that in which the prize—the crown of immortal glory—may be gained by every one who enters upon the race-course. Not so with those who ran in the Grecian stadium.

It may be asked, "Are you aiming to prove, from a mere figure of speech, that the mighty hosts which have come down to our times through the ages, with the standard of the cross conspicuously elevated above every battalion, every division, and every army, do not really constitute the body of Christ?" The figure certainly proves this, if these hosts have all along been contending with each other with "carnal weapons of warfare" as well as with "the sharp sword that goeth out of their mouth," instead of using those weapons that are "mighty through God" to destroy sin in themselves. That the history of the past as well as the present condition of the nations show this, every one may see who casts but a cursory glance over both.

The "God of all peace" as well as of love, rules the body of Christ. It requires no great force of logic to show what must be the result of such rule. But if the figure of speech is not clear enough, then let us take simpler language equally apostolic with the figure. "Whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother." "Let us not love in word, nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth." "He laid down his life for us, we ought also to lay down our lives for the brethren." These words are explicit enough to show that those who make war upon each other, instead of loving and laying down their lives for each other, do not constitute the body of Christ, whatever else they may be.

These words of Jesus Christ to his disciples, though expressed in a figure, are sufficiently clear to show of what characters only his church is composed:—"I am the vine, ye are the branches. He that abideth in me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit. If a man abideth not in me, he is cast forth as a branch that is withered." The life of the vine and its branches, as well as that of every plant in the vegetable kingdom, is maintained only so long as they adhere to that which supplies the vivifying sap. Christ abides in God, His life is the life of God—eternal love—and those who are united to him also partake of the same life. There is no other alternative,—either make the tree good and its fruit good, or the tree corrupt and its fruit corrupt.

The church of Christ, then, consists of those persons, wherever they may be, who are so united to him that his life, which is the highest element of life in the universe—divine love—pervades their being and has a controlling influence upon their entire conduct. In this sense the oft-repeated expression, "there is no salvation out of the Church," is true. There is nothing else that will save one, in the broadest and highest signification of salvation, but that which unites him to the divine life, and when he possesses this within himself, he is an integral part of that body in which is the divine completeness.

Christ's church has also been represented as a kingdom. This was the prevailing form of government in his day, and that under which the Messiah's government was prefigured by the Jewish prophets, so that it was almost a matter of course that he used such an illustration. But in our democratic age, the figure is less agreeable to the taste than some others. It conveys an idea of too much pomp and splendor. There is too great a distance between ruler and subject. We can scarcely get a glimpse of the meek and lowly Jesus amid the glitter and show of palaces, thrones, and countless attendants, and through the smoke of the adulatory incense. However attractive and venerable it has become by reason of its existence of ages, yet, "Come from the four winds, O breath," breathe upon and dissolve forever this scene of oriental enchantment!

We like better the gentle shepherd leading his flock through verdant pastures and by the side of still waters. If we wished to indulge the feeling of reverence, then we would enter the magnificent temple, where God dwells and walks among his people. But the figure of the family admits, if not as great a variety and splendor as that of the kingdom, yet more naturalness; more attractiveness to the soul in its gentler and kindlier moods, and is really more in accordance with the spirit of divine love and tenderness that dwelt in Christ. Male and female are each representative of distinctive features or principles in Deity, and as these are one in essence and co-equal in office in the Divine Being, so are they to be, and should be regarded in Christ or in the church. In the family of Christ are Father and Mother. They have their offspring, those who have been born into the higher life of divine love. These are brothers and sisters, possessing equal rights and privileges. There are, in this family, no rights of primogeniture. There is no oldest son to claim all the dignities and inherit the estate, while the rest are dismissed to the plebeian ranks. There is reciprocal love between parents and children and between brothers and sisters, for love is the element of their existence. They have unlimited wealth—"durable riches of righteousness;" "all things are theirs, whether things present or things to come," and they are to remain theirs throughout "the age of ages." WM. H. BUSSELL.

To my Youth—No. 1.

By the good providences of God you have a privilege to see and hear of, and practice Christian principles. There are many persons educated in schools and colleges, and called Christians, who preach and pray, and yet have not begun to practice the first Christian principles; indeed, have not yet begun to practice the first just, natural principles—that is, to get an honest living with their own hands. Your opportunities to become truly learned, greatly exceed theirs; and if you receive the principles and truths of the gospel—the glad tidings that Christ and Mother brought—and put them into practice in your every day life, in all your goings forth, you will become truly learned, and finally, you will be assured that in Christ Jesus is hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. My object in writing to you is not to open up any branch of knowledge, but to point where some of the treasures of wisdom and knowledge may be found.

The Old Testament is a wonderful book—it contains a system of law adapted to the natural man, which exceeds all other systems of human law; and portraiture of human character, so truthful, and applicable to human conditions, that even after the lapse of three thousand years, they are still fresh, new and instructive. In the above respects, the Bible is without a parallel among books—it is above and beyond them all. And of the New Testament, the parables alone are caskets of knowledge, to say nothing of the great leading principles which underlie Christianity—lived out by the Saviour and opened in his teachings. What can be more comprehensive, or fuller of simplicity than Christ's interview with the young man who came to him, and kneeling, asked, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? In a few words he conveyed to the young man a knowledge of the work necessary to be done as a preparation to entering his kingdom—to keep the Moral Law—that is, do nothing to injure others, and give his all and himself to God; then he would be in a condition to learn of Jesus.

The reading of the parables as presented in the Scriptures, is very much like unto a rich man having a casket of precious things, who comes along and shows you a nice box; he opens it, and every little compartment is stored with jewels; he shuts it up and takes it away with him, and you are none the richer for what you have seen.

So of the sayings of Jesus; you may read them, and get an outside understanding of them, but if you do not practice, nor square your life by them, you will not be any richer in heavenly things. Jesus spake from the life he lived; hence, he was able to say, "the words that I speak unto you they are spirit and they are life." Now, if you will make his life your life, so in your degree, you will be able also to speak from your life. But if you fail to do so—have not the life of Christ in you, you will be able to speak of natural things only, for out of the contents of the heart the mouth speaketh. It may be observed here, that all human beings have in them a two-fold life—an inward or spiritual life, and an outward animal life. Before I close, I will say a few words on this subject. In the meantime, I will open one of the caskets. On the outside is written the following words: "I will open my mouth in parables, I will utter things which have been kept hid from the foundation of the world"—the natural man. Parable first: A sower went forth to sow his seed, and as he sowed, some fell by the way side and was trodden down, and the fowls of the air devoured them. And some fell on stony places, and forthwith the seed sprung up because there was but little earth, and when the sun shone, the plants withered. And some fell among thorns, and the plants were choked. And some fell on good ground, and brought forth, some one degree of fruit, and others, a greater measure. When Jesus had opened this casket, he said, "he that hath ears to hear let him hear." He then shut the casket up and took it away with him, and left the multitude to think about what might be the meaning of the parable. No doubt, you would like to know the reason why Jesus did not explain it to them. He would have been well pleased to have done so, but he considered their state of preparation to hear his word and wisdom, forbade committing further knowledge to their keeping.

And with pleasure he turned to his disciples and said, "blessed are your eyes, for they see, and your ears, for they hear." "Hear ye therefore the parable of the sower." And he began to open to them its interior meaning, which you may read by turning to Luke 8:5. But before he began, he said, "Many prophets and righteous men have desired to see what you see, and hear what you hear, and have not." To the language used by Jesus in explaining the first part of the parable, I would draw your attention. "Those by the wayside are they who hear; then cometh the devil and taketh away the word out of their hearts." Now, how did the devil manage to take the good word out of their hearts? They gave way to lightness—"the fowls of the air devoured it." Here we see, that giving way to lightness in sacred things, is an act of the Devil. Young persons are greatly exposed to receive from others, this spirit of lightness; to many, it is just as natural to be light as it is to breathe, or in other words, they willingly work the work of the Devil, and minister the same spirit of lightness to others, and think nothing about it; and that is the way the Devil wishes his work to be done; do it, and never think about it afterwards. Christ, knowing how exposed souls are, said, "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation," that is, into the spirit of the Evil One. The Devil has the easiest access to young people through the avenue of lightness; they think there is no great harm in it, and will actually sing the songs of Zion in a vain, careless sense.

When a soldier is placed on guard, it is his duty to watch and see that no enemy goes over the line or gets a foothold in the camp.

So of all the thoughts that enter your heads; except you gather and keep the gift of self-examination, you will find that the Devil will enter your premises every day, and instead of you being a guard to keep out evil, you will be an avenue to receive and admit it. D. F.

If the people called Shakers, do not exhibit, with an increase, before all men, the faith, spirit, doctrines and principles of the primitive, Christian Church, together with power over evil in their own souls, let that decide the whole question. WM. LEONARD.

EDITOR'S NOTES:—Attention is called to the address of Wm. Leonard, "Ayer, Mass.," changed from "Groton;" also, a change in "Mt. Morris" agency. Individuals sending articles for publication will regard the spirit of the "Cirenlar" issued to Believers. The Editor's drawer, though nearly full of good matter, will hold some more. We want a wider sphere of contributions; some think we are acting on too contracted a scale—the reason is, we have not yet heard from the East nor West, but in small degree.

Remember, THE SHAKER is the organ of the UNITED SOCIETIES. We want short articles; full of pith, testimony, and true to life. We repeat: we will send one copy extra for five subscribers. G. A. L.

The First Cause of all causes we call God; by descending terms, Father and Mother; Being and Will; Truth and Love; I am and I do; Spirit and Matter; Religion and Science. The religious instinct is inherent in the human race. A recognition of God is the fountain of goodness, and source of truth. The desire to be and do good, is religion. The desire to know how, why, and when to be good, is theology. Spiritualism is the soul of all systems of philosophy.

The rudest of races have their philosophical theological cosmogony; and some of the most civilized and cultured of the races have not been exceeded, in absurdity, by the most savage, in their theories of creation, the being and attributes of God, the nature and destructibility of matter, etc. This is under the general law, that "light is sown for the righteous—the doers of right; and darkness of the understanding for the violators of law, physiological and spiritual."

It is a historical and present fact, that a highly-civilized nation, like the French, are, to a large extent, seeking happiness through the exercise of the same passions, and by the excitement of the same senses, that it is sought for by the Hottentots.

"In Paris, pleasure, or more properly, sensuality, appears to be carried to its highest possible summit."—Swedenborg.

The nobility and serfs of Russia, if not equally sensual, in the use of their absorbing and procreating powers, the balance is in favor of the serfs, who, by poverty and the necessities of existence, are kept in a more simple physiological condition; their passions not being inflamed by abnormal excitants, in drink and food; while the nobles are as full-fed horses, each one neighing after his neighbor's wife—the abuse of nutrition and reproduction.

It has come to pass, that while in the wisdom of God, "the world by wisdom"—material and sensual theology—"knew not God," it has pleased God, by the foolishness of preaching, and the ministration of the Spirit of God, acting upon the same senses that evil acts upon, has saved them that believe, from the indulgence of gluttony and drunkenness, and from fruitless sexuality, which has been more emphatically the work of darkness, whether by the married or unmarried, as it is the most concentrated form of human evil.

The priests of Nature—Pythagoras, Diogenes, Plato, Seneca, and the Stoics, enjoined self-control, and, to a great extent, self-denial of the senses, as did the Avatars, like Confucius, Buddha, Zoroaster, Jesus; they touched each other.

The material worlds! the spiritual worlds! Why, is it not all spirit, in different stages of unfoldment, from the stand-point of Deity? All spirit, more or less externalized, down to the earths, which are first, gas and ether, then granite, rock and diamond. All matter, more or less attenuated, sublimated, etherealized, up to the lowest spirit sphere, and thence up to the heaven of heavens.

Jesus inherited physiological and moral conditions derived from a long line of self-controlling, self-denying ancestry, concentered into an organized body like the Essenes, who, throughout the Jewish history, did not eat animal food; nor did they fight or marry. This gave Jesus an advantage over all other human beings, Adam and Eve not excepted: because their innocence and goodness was that of the baby-hood of the race. As a child, his aspirations were upward, towards the seventh heaven. A comparatively-few of his countrymen and women, of the Jews, approximated the high religious status to which he attained.

It should be distinctly remarked, that it was in goodness, rather than in intellectuality—in religion rather than in theology, that he excelled. "Whence hath this man this knowledge, seeing he knoweth not letters," plainly indicates that he belonged to the order of human beings who were called to externalize God on this earth in their lives, rather than in deep, great, and grand philosophical and scientific theories, explanatory of the mysteries of creation to the human understanding. His work was to make human beings good and true lovers of God, and companions of angels; as social beings, to learn them to love one another with a pure heart, fervently; to pray, rather than study.

This was religion; and "none but a good man can be a true philosopher."

When Paul came up, who was also of a good philosophical and intellectual stock, and had been educated in all the learning and culture of the Jews, he taught theology—the science of the religion of Jesus. It was an effort of the human mind to comprehend the height and depth, and length and breadth of the work of human redemption, and to systematize and explain it logically.

During the first three centuries, the religious organizations having all things common, created by the holy Christ Spirits acting upon the emotions and affections, and operating in the hearts of the lovers of righteousness (not mere lovers of knowledge), stood the test of internal corruption and outward persecution; but they finally succumbed, and a Gentile bishop led the Jerusalem Pentecostal Church: a fit type of the "man of sin," who was to inhabit the most holy temples in the Gentile world for twelve hundred and sixty years of educational preparation of its heathen people to receive the Christ of God in the female Order, through a female Messiah, as the Jews had received him in the male order through Jesus—a male and female Christ manifested through male and female human beings.

During the reign of Anti-christ, Spiritualism operated to create a mixture of elements. Hebrew, Christian, Heathen, Mahomedan, and everything in heaven and on earth—all the spheres being confusedly blended together—the relation of the natural and spiritual worlds was abnormal, represented by three unclean spirits, like frogs (amphibious) proceeding out of the mouth of the dragon—heathenism; of the beast—the Catholic, Protestant, and Greek Churches; and of the false prophet—the heretics and witnesses: false miracles, false relics, false confessions and absolutions; false piety, which thought killing was doing God service; false marriages, doctrines of devils; false everything. Whoredom, adultery, fornication, are terms plentifully used by divine religionists, to represent the commingled wickedness of these so-called Christian Churches. "Babylon the Great, the Mother of Har-lots—Whores;” by which obnoxious terms, the reforming daughters of the Roman and Greek Churches, and State Governments, are not inaptly designated.

As in the days of Jesus, the Essenes—the ancient Quakers; and the Sadducees—the ancient Materialists—alone escaped his denunciations; so, in our own time, the modern Essenes—true Quakers; and the modern Sadducees, organized into the American Governments, in our day, of all others, go the most unrebuked by the “seed of the woman”—the followers of Ann Lee,—who are bruising, in themselves, the head of the sensual powers and passions of Christendom, the lust of sexual indulgence; the nude statue and black crooks of this “Murder of the Innocents” age, which has legalized monopoly of the life elements; thus making war and the destruction of embryonic human beings a society necessity, in order to hold in check population, which continually presses on the means of subsistence in cities, towns, and villages.

It is said, that the private character of Swedenborg, from youth to manhood, was altogether irreproachable. He opened the portals of the invisible world, which the Protestants had closed, to keep wicked men and women from coming back to them, as they had been in the habit of doing under the Catholic rule; so that they were like people who shut the door against their enemies, by refusing to admit even their friends, the angels.

Never was the simile of the ladder which Jacob saw, so appropriately illustrated as in the case of this seer. He was a believer and follower of Jesus in his first advent upon earth. He began, as Assessor of Mines in Sweden, and went up the ladder of the sciences to the great First Cause. Like his ante-type, John the Baptist, he lived a celibate life. “He complains that his scientific labors were not appreciated; that his productions are looked down upon, by a number of political blockheads, as mere scholastic exercises, which ought to stand back, while their presumptuous finesse and intrigues step forward. He said the beginning of nature was identical with the beginning of geometry.”

“He discovered the science of crystallography, or law of crystals. Every metal has particles of its own, of a peculiar form; the same being true of all mundane substances, from the rocks to the most etherealized elements. The various shapes of these atomic crystals cause the different tastes, smells, and feelings which attach to them. He appears to have labored to apprehend the origin and arrangement of matter in the earths, and also, to apprehend the nature and condition of the intelligent atoms which compose their social organizations, and are the inner worlds, so far as he found entrance thereto. He affirmed that the object of his mission was, to ‘demonstrate immortality to the natural senses:’ that is, Spiritualism. His prevailing idea was, that external objects were the product of internal powers and and forces.” 7

The Social Evil.

It was the peculiar mission of the first founders of Shakerism to bear testimony against the “social evil,” in all its phases, legal and illegal, and in all its relations and bearings in human life; hence, it was reported that they condemned marriage; but this was a mistake—they only condemned the abuses and evils cloaked under it, holding it to be exclusively a civil right, and not a Christian institution. And when it was incorporated into the Christian system, in the outer court, in the Apostles’ days, it was considered more of an innovation than from divine authority—hence, it was said: “Brethren, the time is short that remaineth; that both they that have wives shall be as though they had none.”

America is destined to take the lead in all the reforms of the 19th century. Through the power of the invisible, operating through a visible agency, great and mighty things have been accomplished, and still greater things remain to be met and overcome. Seeming impossibilities belong to the past and not to the present age of the world. Various opinions are entertained by reformers as to the best manner of disposing of the “social evil.” It seems to be a principle inherent in human nature, and been handed down from time immemorial; like some old chronic hereditary disease, hard to eradicate, and too delicate a subject for public discussion. Yet, reformers say something must be done, and this false delicacy must be laid aside before science can be brought to bear successfully against it. True!

But, we say, the reason why reformers in the past have not been able to reform the world, is, because they have not been sufficiently radical on this point. Now we propose to begin at the root of human depravity, and put away the cause, that the effect may cease. “And now, also, the axe is laid unto the root of the trees,” etc. Man in scripture is compared to trees and known by his fruit; and it may be that we have all, in the past, eaten apples very improperly. Trees are in the plural and implies both sexes, because both sexes are involved in the social evil.

Perhaps there is no sentiment more common concerning its origin, which is implied, if not expressed, than the fact, that had it not been for the transgression of Adam and Eve, in the Garden of Eden, we should not have been found in this fix; or, in other words, the social evil would never have existed.

The cause of the “social evil,” and the root of human depravity is traced back to Adam’s transgression; to a lawless principle, which was never essential to the reproduction of the human race—the excessive indulgence of which, is the great problem now up for discussion. In scripture language, the principle is called by different names; “lust,” “flesh,” “old man,” “forbidden fruit,” “man of sin,” “son of perdition,” “carnal mind,” “devil,” “dragon,” “evil,” “which the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming,” etc. (2 Thes. 2:8.) Which are all synonymous in their signification. But the great question is, what shall we do with it? This is the problem:—How shall we eradicate it without destroying the human race? Science cannot do it; if it could, it would have been done long ago. Philosophy cannot do it; it has tried, and proved a failure. But science and philosophy, combined with practical obedience to law and order, can do it; it has been done.

What has been done can be done again. It is of so long standing and so incorporated into the very heart and core of humanity, that we admit the difficulty. The principle in and of itself is lawless—is not subject to any law, neither indeed can be, when left uncontrolled by a superior and higher power. The principle is bad—it is wicked in the extreme!—it has been tried before the High Court of Heaven, and found guilty of the most abominable crimes; the earth, itself, bearing witness against it; and the sentence pronounced by the Court and Judge of all the earth, is, death.

It is doomed to crucifixion, by a daily cross and self-denial; that is, total abstinence; starving it to death by inches, until the principle is entirely eradicated from the soul. This can be done without extinguishing the human race, by recognizing two orders of people, viz.: the natural order, and the spiritual order—separate and distinct. These two orders comprise the whole family of man, and admit of different grades and degrees. Each order is governed by its own laws.

Two great problems have been solved in the United States within the last century, viz.: the actual practice of a “virgin life,” and “community of interest,” without the aid of nunneries and monasteries; where the sexes enjoy social and daily intercourse, and preserve their chastity from year to year, and have for the last seventy-five years. They prefer keeping the higher law. This was so new and strange at first, that the world did not believe that this profession of life could be actually produced and carried out.

Elder F. W. Evans, of Mt. Lebanon, N. Y., one of the most progressive minds of the age, in a letter to North Union, dated May 25th, 1868, said: “For the first fifty years, the question of there being a resurrection order on the earth, and quietly living pure, celibate lives, was always met with the scoffs and jeers of the world, with the charge that they did not so live; that ended the argument.

“Thus the world called in question the fact of any living lives of chastity. Eighty years have passed away, and that fact, now, is no longer called in question. Hundreds of men and women have lived together, maintaining a close, social relation, upon the basis of pure celibacy, for eighty years in succession, known to the thinking, philosophical mind as a problem not to be (but is now) solved. This fact, Henry Vincent will make known on his return to England." J. S. P., North Union.

Anastasis.

This word, which is rendered resurrection in our English version of the New Testament, has two important meanings attached to it by Jesus and the Apostles, and these so intimately connected that the use of one immediately suggests the other. One signification is, a new, spiritual life, which succeeds the sensuous life in the Christian believer; and the other, an endless existence. In fact, when the term is applied to Christians, the two ideas, usually, are completely blended. We see how closely connected these were in the mind of Jesus, from the words he addressed to Martha, who was bewailing the death of her brother. "Jesus said to her, 'Thy brother shall rise again—anastesetai.' Martha said to him, 'I know he will rise again in the resurrection in the last day—en te anastasei en te eschate hermera.' Jesus said to her, 'I am the resurrection and the life; and whoever lives and believes in me will never die.'" The same union of the two ideas is also observed in the reply of Jesus to the Sadducees, who denied that there was to be any anastasis—any rising to a future life. Which of the seven brothers, they ask, is to have the woman whom they each married, if they all live hereafter? The answer is, "Those having been deemed worthy to obtain that life and the resurrection from the dead—tou aionos ekeinou kai tes anastaseos tes ek nekron—neither marry nor are given in marriage; nor can they die any more."

These two meanings we find also blended in the Apostle Paul's argument in reply to those persons in the Corinthian church who denied the resurrection of the dead. "There is a sensuous body—soma psuchikon—and a spiritual body." "The first man is from earth, and the second is from heaven." "As we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." "When this mortal shall have put on immortality, then will be fulfilled the recorded saying, 'Death is swallowed up in victory.'"

These two thoughts, it is safe to say, are the prominent ones in the mind of Jesus and of Paul whenever they allude to a future life. Life in God, the heavenly life, is the resurrection, and that is to continue forever. So completely does the idea of the Divine Life fill their minds that it is as though there were no life in the human race where that is not—all else is death. The Apostle Paul represents himself as eager to rise out of this state of death. "If by any means I may attain to the resurrection from the dead," that is, from among those who are dead. All who are destitute of this spiritual, heavenly life, are the dead. It matters not whether they are in or out of the physical body. This spiritual life is the life of the last day, the day of the Messiah, the eternal age; and this he was striving with all earnestness to gain.

It is worthy of notice that, in his argument for the resurrection addressed to the Corinthians, he speaks only of Christians as actual subjects of the resurrection. From this fact some have drawn the conclusion that a part of mankind, in the view of the Apostle, are to be annihilated, or else to remain forever without hope of everlasting life. This is because they have supposed the Apostle to be speaking of an event that is to be accomplished in a brief period of time, and not to continue throughout the Messiah's reign until his work shall be completed. A proper attention, however, to the course of his argument will satisfy any one that no such idea can be deduced from it. Having given his proofs of the appearance of Jesus among the living after his crucifixion by the Jews and the Romans, he exultingly exclaimed, "Now has Christ been raised from the dead, the first of the sleeping ones. For, since death has intervened through a man, resurrection, also, has come through a man; for, as all die in Adam, so all will be made alive in Christ; but every one in his own order; Christ, first, then those who are Christ's in his coming—en te parousia autou. Then—in due course of time—comes the end—the completion of his work—when he shall have destroyed all rule, and all authority and power opposed to God's. For he must reign until he put all enemies under his feet. Death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed."

It is to be observed, that the Apostle declares all will be made alive, but they will be made alive in Christ. None but Christians are subjects of the resurrection, in the essential, sublime sense of the term, yet none are excluded from the privilege of becoming such. This he puts beyond a doubt by the sweeping declaration, "All will be made alive in Christ," in which the all that are to be made alive in Christ are contrasted with the all that die in Adam. He speaks elsewhere, it is true, of those who are to be punished in the time of Christ's coming, but the penalty meted out to them is just that which their offenses merit, according to the age in which they live. It is the diken olethron aionion, a term similar to that which Jude employed when speaking of the guilty inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah—the diken puros aioniou—the penalty their offenses demanded in that age. Death and hell are to be destroyed; and, unquestionably, the penalties resulting from violated law, which are more severe the greater the light which one sins against, are means which the Being of Infinite Love uses for the destruction of these enemies of everlasting righteousness. There can be no escape; the penalty is just as certain to follow crime as day to follow night. And as transgression of the divine laws has been, in one way or another, universal among mankind, there was no impropriety in the Apostle's regarding all as in a state of death, while he proclaimed a way of deliverance from it for all men.

The mode of deliverance is not an arbitrary one; not that of a partial, fitful, passionate being, nor of one who takes pleasure in displaying his power so as to overwhelm with terror and amazement the human soul, and to confound the sense of right and justice implanted in man. God works so as to confound the plans of the proud and self-sufficient, yet always so that his methods of working commend themselves ultimately to the highest reason of his creatures. The Apostle Paul speaks of the resurrection as occurring in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, and yet it is evident, from his statement that each person is to be raised in his own order; that he refers only to the commencement of the work in the individual soul, which may, in fact, be as sudden as the language represents, and yet not occur, in many cases, until after a long preparation in the person for it. His own conversion to Christianity was remarkable for its suddenness, and yet he represents himself as striving to the utmost to attain to the resurrection from the dead. "I have not yet gained, I am not yet perfect, but I am pursuing so as to gain the prize of my high calling."

The resurrection, then, in its essential nature, may commence in this state of being, and in the case of the Apostle, it did so commence. It was to him the introduction to a condition of happiness of which, while he adhered to his Jewish religion, he had no conception. It was a sun, illuminating his entire spirit. It was the rain which waters the tender plants of the new, spiritual life, causing them to grow and become strong. It was the inspiration of divine truth within himself, which made him the effectual preacher of righteousness wherever he went. It was the opening of heaven to his internal view, showing him the heavenly messengers descending and ascending, earthward and heavenward; showing him also, Christ himself, who stood by him and encouraged him in his efforts to advance his cause, and inspired him with strength and courage to bear the numerous persecutions to which he was subjected. The resurrection was to him a spiritual, heavenly life, whose characteristics were joy and peace, gentleness, kindness, and the ardent and abiding love of one who has been baptized into the element of love, in the place of pride, self-will, hatred and malice; unwavering faith in the infinite goodness of God that purposes and plans the welfare of all his creatures; the substitution of new and living hopes for old prejudices; the breaking down of old barriers that had been interposed by ignorance and folly between different portions of human beings, enabling him to love as ardently and work as earnestly for his Gentile brethren as for those of his own nation. This to him was a present resurrection; and so he represents it in his epistles to Christians. "If ye, then, are risen with Christ," he wrote to them, "seek those things which are above, where Christ sits at the right hand of God."

And yet it is plain, from his own words, that he regarded the resurrection, in its fullest sense, as something far beyond anything he had yet experienced. He was looking forward to a grand consummation of hopes that he had been led to form. There was a prize at the end of his course which he purposed to gain, a crown of righteousness which, as victor, he expected to wear. "When Christ, who is our life, shall be manifested, ye also shall be manifested with him in glory." This glorious manifestation was to be the fulfillment of his hopes, his complete deliverance from the state of death in which he still found himself, though he had been elevated already "to sit in heavenly places in Christ." That was to be not only freedom from the power of sin, but from the liability of ever again falling into sin.

In addition to this expectation of a glorious deliverance from the death of sin, there was an assurance in his mind that this blessedness was to continue forever. "For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. I have a desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better." His song of triumph, at the close of his argument for the resurrection, is not only that of the assured victor over sin, but also of one who expects forever to wear his triumphal crown:—"O death, where is thy sting? O Hades, invisible world of the dead, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God who gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ! Victory now, over that which gives to death all its force and bitterness—sin; so that we are elevated completely above it, living lives of purity and practical righteousness in spite of the enemies by whom we are daily beset! Victory in certain prospect over all the foes we now have or may yet have to encounter, until we shall, each, be able to say, 'I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith,—henceforth the crown of everlasting life is mine!'"

POETICAL.

"The Shaker."

Hail! hail, thou welcome messenger of truth—
God speed thee, and sustain thee, thou art forsooth
Answer to long, long years of earnest prayers
And supplication to God that somewhere,
Or somehow his holy truths we should declare.

Thy sacred pages yet will light unfold,
More precious to a sin-cursed world than gold,
Diamonds and rubies; all the gems of earth
Fall before thee—of more intrinsic worth
Thou art by far. Thou art a chast'ning rod
Wielded in the mercy, truth and love of God.

That all may read and understand the Truth
From hoary-headed sage to prattling youth,
That whoever will, may come and be partaker
Of heaven's choicest boon, we send THE SHAKER,
Which will reveal the new and living way,
From darkness to an effulgent day.

The mission of THE SHAKER to fallen man [Ann,
Is, God's love revealed through Christ and Mother
To teach mankind that unto him is given
To do God's will on earth, as done in heaven,
To break the shackles, let oppressed souls free,
Proclaim abroad the glorious jubilee. [sword
To unsheath the bright and glittering two-edged
Of Gospel Truth, the spirit and power of God;
To enlighten souls, convict them of their sins,
And make them feel and know 'tis Truth that wins
Aye, Truth alone will stand, all else will fail,
'Tis God's decree that Truth shall yet prevail.

O speed, speed on thou sweet angelic sound,
Convince the skeptic and the wise confound;
Strengthen the weak,—confirm the strong
To battle for the right, and to subdue the wrong.
Teach all mankind this Truth to fully know,
That in the depths of earthly hearts do grow
Germs of unrest, and, all learn this, would
You feed on heavenly manna—Angels' food,
And be forever happy, then BE GOOD,—
Take up thy cross and follow Christ the Saviour,
Serve God with thy whole heart, also thy Brother
Love as thine own self; and, wouldst thou at last
A home in heaven secure? All that thou hast,
Forsake; houses and lands, children and wife,
Brothers, Sisters, Father, Mother, thy life—
Thy carnal life surrender, lay it down
If thou wouldst reign with Christ and wear the crown Of Everlasting Life prepared for those Who've conquered sin, and all their inward foes.

Aye, friend, know this, and do this Truth believe,
That Christ lies not, nor yet doth he deceive;
Would'st thou be his, and enter heaven's door,
Sell that thou hast and give it to the poor;
All selfishness be wholly laid aside
And all thou hast be willing to divide.

By this we do not mean that we must hate
The person, or the thing—the selfish state
The carnal mind, that loves a selfish few,
This is the meaning, the good and true
Are all of God, and we must love them all;
These are universal—belong not to the fall,—
These are Christ's conditions, none else will do,
For those who would the narrow way pursue.

Yea truly, 'tis a straight and narrow road
That leads the Pilgrim home to heaven and God,
No vulture's eye hath e'er this pathway seen,
Nor lion's whelp hath ever trod therein;
No ravenous wolf or other beast of prey
Can walk this pure and holy, heavenly way,
That leads the soul to Life, and to eternal Day.
Many shall be called—the Chosen few—
'Tis they alone who daily will pursue
The strait and narrow way, forsaking all
For Christ's sake and the Gospel; who will fall
Upon the rock, and there will broken be,
And from all dross and sin be purged free,
Who'll wash their robes in Blood, that of the Lamb,
Through living works come up, the great I AM
Alone to serve; who'll strive to know and do
His holy will, the narrow way pursue,
Whose every breath to Father, Mother, Son,
Is, Not my will, but thine O God be done.

My Shaker Home.

1

In a hamlet, remote from the thronged thoroughfares,
Where business and pleasure with folly abound,
I dwell in retirement, and breathe the pure airs
That flow from the mountains which circle me round.

My home is so pleasaut, contentment draws near,
And bids me rejoice in its pleasant retreat
So closely allied to that heavenly sphere,
Where discord no more may her tauntings repeat.

2

No edict from monarch nor empress I dread,
In a President's frowns nothing piercing can see;
Christ, in his true order, I own as my head,
And love is the magnet which captivates me.
To the goddess of fashion we never bow down,
Thus saved from the trouble her votaries share,
A cap, smooth and modest, a neat tidy gown,
With kerchief and collar, my Sisterhood wear.

Our shoes are for comfort, and made to the feet,
Not so small to compress them and freedom destroy;
Yea, our understandings would be quite a treat,
To such slaves of folly as "Miss Afong Moy,"
Not with jewelled fingers our work we perform,
And pendulums hang in our clocks, not our ears,
No pearls, nor yet ribbons, our persons adorn,
They are deemed quite as useless as crocodile tears.

Our costume throughout is well fitted for those Who prize health and comfort, 'bove fashion or pride,
And find in a neat humble garb, more repose,
Than the gay, pimping lady, whose heart is outside.
What can adorn woman like virtue and love?
A heart full of kindness and heavenly grace,
These deck her with jewels and charms far, above
All that art can devise for the form or the face.

5

O let me be clothed in garments of these,
And thankfully toil in my plain Shaker dress;
For Wisdom's bright treasures which give the heart ease,
And clothe me in raiment of true righteousness.
I'll toil for these blessings, these jewels of love,
Ills patiently suffer, that cannot be cured,
From under the cross never seek to remove,
To be by the world, or its follies allured.

B. K., Canterbury, N. H.

*A Chinese woman who exhibited her small feet in this country some years since.

More easy than to live it, thrice,
Was always found to give advice.

Who plands the great, who helps the poor
That spirit hate, this one adore.

Love is a gem of priceless worth,
Aye, more than all the gems of earth.

Is War Compatible with Christianity?

How strange, that in the nineteenth century of the Christian era, there should be a doubt upon this subject! but, inconsistent as it is, a majority of the professedly followers of the "Prince of PEACE" would, no doubt, answer unhesitatingly in the affirmative. How often in religious tracts and biographies are soldiers taken as models of piety and of exemplary Christian conduct, and among their other virtues they are often described as being very much attached to their profession! their horrible trade of blood, masked with the name profession! How often is a beneficent God invoked for a blessing on the murderous weapons of war!

Across the Atlantic we behold one of the fairest countries of Europe devastated by a most needless and cruel war, where two millions of men endeavored to destroy each other by every means which ingenuity could devise; and the melancholy results of the conflict are now seen:—a desolated country,—towns laid in ashes—thousands upon thousands of men slaughtered in the prime of life; with hundreds of thousands of wounded and disfigured human beings; together with an immense burden of debt that will weigh heavily on their descendants for ages. Friends of humanity, listen, for a voice of woe is heard through the land! The weeping of desolate widows! The wail of the bereaved mother in her agony of grief,—and the pitiful sobs of orphan children! Even the victors, who, by the chance of war, are spared a desolated and ravaged country, bear a heavy share in its miseries: four hundred fathers killed in one regiment, in repulsing a sortie from Metz, leaving 1,070 orphan children, tells a mournful tale.

The Teacher, whom these warring nations profess to follow, said: "Love your enemies." "Bless them that curse you." "Do good to them that hate you." "I say unto you that ye resist not evil." "If a man smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." Instead of doing this, they aim the deadly rifle at a brother's heart,—plunge the cruel bayonet into his breast—mow their brethren down in ranks with the ponderous cannon-ball, or cast their mangled bodies on the blood-stained ground with their worse than diabolical shells. What a commentary on human consistency is a battle-field,—a Christian (?) battle field! where enlightened (?) men professing to follow the gentle and loving Jesus of Nazareth, meet in hundreds of thousands to tear each other limb from limb, like wild beasts! What a picture! it makes the Angels weep! But, some will say, "It cannot be helped; it is impossible to avoid it." Did Christ teach impossibilities? It has been avoided, and it can be avoided. The example of William Penn and his peace-loving Quakers, for 70 years in Pennsylvania,—where the government was sustained without any weapon more dangerous than the constable's staff, and during which there was not one drop of Quaker blood shed, surrounded as they were by powerful tribes of what have been called, "treacherous and merciless savages;" while the neighboring colonies were the theatres of Indian wars and bloody massacres—defiantly contradicts the assertion! Neither soldiers nor savages will fight an unarmed peaceful people: Teemseh when asked why he did not attack the Shakers at Busrow said: "What! attack a people who will not fight? It would be a disgrace to the name of an Indian!" Witness again the instance recorded in history, when Alexander, incensed at the Jews for refusing to violate their oath to Darius by furnishing food for his army, marched to Jerusalem, with the intention of chastising them severely. They went out to meet him unarmed, dressed in white, with the high-priest, Jaddus, at their head. What a change was wrought in his conduct! After treating them with the greatest kindness, paying marked respect to their high-priest and exempting them from the payment of the seven years' tribute, he left them in the most friendly manner.

Non-resistance, as has been demonstrated in this and thousands of other instances, is practical, politic, humanitarian and Christian; war, on the contrary, is unwise, impolitic, unchristian and diabolical.

We appeal to you, friends,—brothers and sisters of our great human family—to unite your influence to banish from the earth this great curse of our race! Let all nations see in the calamities of unhappy France, the fate that has, or will, sooner or later overtake every warring nation. Let all who profess Christianity, see if their practice will bear the only test of discipleship, as given by its founder. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples: THAT YE HAVE LOVE ONE FOR ANOTHER;" and let those who would continue the barbarous anti-christian practice of war, hear his last warning, which has been fulfilled among the nations of the earth from that day to this: "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword."

W. C., Mt. Lebanon.

Plain Talks—No. 2.

Our warfare and weapons are not carnal; but spiritual and mighty when exercised with earnestness and wisdom. We are bold adventurers in a most extraordinary endeavor—overcoming the world! We have taken issue with the world; and against its allurements we mean to wage the most unrelenting warfare—knowing no such word as failure. The world, against which we turn our efforts, is composed of "the lusts of the flesh, of the eyes, and the pride of life!" We are charged with being contracted in our religious life—working only to the overcoming of the lusts of the flesh. We know this to be the root of the great tree of evil; and had better work eternally here, than attempt to kill the tree of evil by pruning among its branches. We find, that success in battling against the lusts of the flesh assures us of that peace which humanity, generally, know not of; nor can they know until, beginning as children in the school of Christ, they learn that A, B, C is self-denial to their animal appetites, that have made their souls so dyspeptic that the least morsel of truthful testimony against a carnal, fleshly life, afflicts them like a vomit, and they pour forth the vilest thoughts, feelings and persecutions against the mediums of this testimony. Thousands, while knowing the lusts of the flesh to be their greatest enemy, implore of the Shakers not to destroy this god of sensuality.

We find that sensuality does not pay, physically nor spiritually; and that it is very unchristian in its mildest attacks—as observed in marriage, etc. We do not abhor marriage—we get along with it in our warfare against fleshly lusts, just as our great Captain did—by letting them severely alone! We ask of Christians to do no better with them. And here the argument comes in: "It is natural to desire marriage!" So it is; and our choice is to aspire above earthly desires, to inaugurate on the earth "thy kingdom come," which shuts out marriage, private property, and their consequences—misery, disease, war and famine; these are of the world and belong not among the resurrected!

Truly, we have taken an advanced step in a life of purity—under the self-denying restraints of a celibate life—while living as spiritual Brethren and Sisters in a common household—God's spiritual house! And while the unself-denying would feign disbelieve in our accomplishment of this, and picture to themselves the horrors of "the eunuch for the kingdom of heaven's sake," we assure them there is a continual increase of comfort on our journey through life; that we never suffer anything, in consequence of self-denial, that will compare with their self-indulgences, even of the first nuptial evening—and then, how different the results of their sufferings and of ours! This brings an increasing purity, eternal in character; that brings with it disgust, disappointment, bitter anguish and soul defilement, that grow not less with increased indulgence, but constantly make wide the gulf between their souls and God! "Oh, for a closer walk with God!" "Nearer, my God, to thee!"

And while, as before intimated, some choose to disbelieve our position in life, as regards our testimony against all fleshly lusts, in whatever form of indulgence, we mean to advance still farther in the work of self-denial, and leave all who love the world still farther in the rear. "Away from the world of fleshly lusts!" was the first of seven trumpets; six more are to sound; and the worldly will observe true Shakers engaging in advanced works of self-denial—progressing "from faith unto faith."

We view the habits of a worldly life—intemperance in fleshly lusts, in eating, drinking, swearing, tobacco-using and fighting—to be the refusal of the soul to increase in godliness; nothing can suppress these; but something can supplant them. And that religion is a false and worthless one, that does not present its subjects with substitutes for these, that speak of eternal enjoyment; that does not supplant them with food that stops that yearning for something—which something is spiritual advancement, and the true remedy, resurrection of life, and in our ways of life,—living as Christ lived; who neither lived in those lusts which the world glory in; was not a tippler; was never seen with cigar, pipe nor quid; would not fight; had good health—the result of temperance in all things. We admit the world of humanity, generally, to be in our advance on the outward run; but, on the home-stretch, we feel ourselves nearer our Father's and Mother's home.

"Time is Money."

Seated in an easy chair, last evening, after the muscles had performed their share of the duties of the day, my eyes fell upon the above motto, ingeniously woven into an advertisement. It was an incentive to industry. Summing up the spare moments that frequently slip by unimproved, I thought how much of the symmetry and beauty was lost from our ideal of perfect manhood.

"Time is money." We can account for the origin of so singular a proverb, when we consider the fascinating influence of money on the human mind. Could three other words express so much of the hearts of men? While it speaks to us of the virtue of industry, it would have us toil at Mammon's shrine! The Angel of Wisdom lifting us upon the platform of the World! We will not object to the elevation. If we are below it, we must need come up; but I trust we shall not consider it the acme of human development.

Sentiment is at fault if it points us no higher. If it provides only for the body, it leaves a void within. Industry should be one of the first lessons of life. It is the secret of growth; but if that growth is too much toward materiality, it blunts the finer feelings and develops the animal rather than the angel.

When we weave our garland of mottoes to adorn the crown of Industry, we will write it, by putting our hands to work and giving our heart to God: TIME IS MORE THAN MONEY.

J. V. C.

"Hark, from the depths!" This wail comes from Philadelphia: "I look upon the present laws and relations of marriage, as the direct source of more pauperism, crime, disease, and death, than rum, tobacco, war, pestilence, and famine; and I speak not at random when I say this. Tobacco, rum, and war, are chiefly male accomplishments: pestilence and famine are confined to a few localities; but marriage is nearly universal. No condition, sex, nor locality where human beings exist, is exempt from the curse of this human foe! * * * Perhaps I write too severely; if so, it is because I feel deeply that this truth is too true. * * * I have been in the camp of marriage; I know the rottenness of every fibre of this gilded monster, and nothing shall shield it from my piercing shafts, until its death-throes say—'the deed is done!'"

Comments: There are thousands, who, having been caught in the beautiful spider's web of marriage, feel as the above correspondent. But this individual, and the majority of his sympathizers, would be among the last to live totally abstinent from the gratification of their sexual appetites. The Shakers look upon marriage, under Mosaic injunctions, to be honorable; but neither it nor the practice of any lasciviousness is, or can be Christian. Neither Jesus, Angels of God, nor the Shakers are ever afflicted with the pangs of matrimony; neither soiled by sexual uncleanness nor individual vices.

War between Freedom and Slavery,

FROM THE CHRISTIAN STANDARD.

"Those whom Christ makes free are free indeed."

Was Mother Ann the first Enfranchised Woman?

Taking a view from the highest earthly standard, she was truly the pioneer in the battle between Slavery and Freedom, as touching the human soul.

She was divinely inspired, and illuminated by the light of truth. She broke the shackles which pinioned her to the affections of man on the earth plane; and by degrees arose, one fetter after another being severed, and falling, which gave new impetus to hope and freedom.

With agony of spirit, so intense as to produce bloody perspiration, her mind being invulnerable, she persevered with invincible courage, praying to God day and night, until she triumphed. No wonder she was reduced to a skeleton, under such extreme travail for the birth of freedom. In this prepared condition, the Christ Spirit proffered aid, illuminating and extending the hand of sympathy, which endowed her with wisdom and power to break the heaviest and strongest shackle, causing it to fall powerless. Then she arose in queenly majesty; in royal grandeur! Beautiful; especially to those baptized with the Christ Spirit. No powers of Earth nor Hades shall forge those fetters again. The powers of Liberty and Truth triumphed. There was joy in the New Heavens, a grand celebration! "A woman compassed a man!" "The wisdom of the wise was confounded!" This was the commencement of a new era, the beginning of the New Creation, the manifestation of the second Eve—coming forth, opening the graves of conventionalism, unloosing the mantle of creeds and dogmas, which bind both hands and feet. Thus untrammelled she was competent to compass man in every respect. She penetrated the dark recesses of the heart; no iniquity was hid from her searching eye. Man quailed and sank into insignificance before her penetrating spirit. Her love was equal to her justice. Merciful, divine; forgiving her enemies, their bitter and cruel persecution, their malignant slanders, scoffs and frowns. At length she reached the summit, where she stood emancipated, clad in her freedom suit—elevated above every sensual appetite and passion—"having the light of the Sun in her countenance, the stars in her forehead, and the moon under her feet." In this condition she could attract and lift mankind up to a higher standard, regenerated and emancipated. And shall not her followers, who are baptized by the Christ Spirit, who are living the same life, reach this summit—have the same power to lift up humanity, and set all captives free?

OLIVE, Har.

The fool gets mad at almost every call;
The wise man ne'er gets mad at all.

This rule is simple, certain, true.
Who takes offense will give one, too.

I ask no greater treasure, than
To be at peace with God and man.

To possess Emulation without envy, is a most enviable possession.

Health.

"It may be both interesting and profitable to notice the views and habits of Swedenborg, in relation to physiology—health. 'Seership, as a general rule, is coincident with abstemiousness, which is the directest means of putting down the body, and (by the law of the balance) lifting up the soul; and, where seership is thus of itself, it leads to new demands from the soul, or new exigencies of temperance. We might instance the Hindoo seers, as examples of these remarks; or we might support them by numerous cases occurring in Europe, and even at the present time; not to mention that the germs of the experience are within every man's knowledge."

As the man depends so much upon the dinner, and the dinner upon the appetite and the self-control, it is advisable to know what was the diet of a man so industrious, peaceful, and deep-eyed as Swedenborg. The following is his account of his first baptism into the spiritual world:

"I was in London, and dined late at my usual quarters, where I had engaged a room, in which at pleasure to prosecute my studies in natural philosophy. I was hungry, and ate with great appetite. Towards the end of the meal, I remarked that a kind of mist spread before my eyes, and I saw the floor of my room covered with hideous reptiles, such as serpents, toads, and the like. I was astonished, having all my wits about me, and being perfectly conscious. The darkness attained its height, and then passed away. I now saw a man sitting in a corner of the chamber. As I had thought myself entirely alone, I was greatly frightened, when he said to me, 'Eat not so much.' My sight again became dim; but, when I recovered it, I found myself alone in my room. I went home, and the following night the same man appeared to me again. This time I was not at all alarmed. The man said, 'I am God, the Lord, the Creator and Redeemer of the world. I have chosen thee to unfold to men the spiritual sense of the Holy Scriptures. I will myself dictate to thee what thou shalt write.' The same night, the world of spirits—hell and heaven—was convincingly opened to me, where I found many of my acquaintance, of all conditions."

Again, he says: "In the middle of the day, at dinner, I heard an angel saying that I should not indulge the belly too much at table; and there clearly appeared to me, as it were, a vapor exuding from the pores of my body like a mist, extremely visible, which fell towards the earth where the carpet was, upon which the vapor, being collected, was changed into various little worms under the table, which burnt, or flashed off, in a moment, with a noise or sound. Seeing a fiery light in this vapor, and hearing a sound, I thought that thus all the worms that could be generated from an immoderate appetite, were ejected from my body, and thus burnt, and that I was then purified from them." From this time his diet became a constant harmony and preparation of his seership.

Sandel says, "He was never ill; he always enjoyed most excellent health; having scarcely ever experienced the slightest indisposition, except when in states of temptation. Health is the ground which great persons cultivate, whereby they exchange the light flying hours into golden usage. To them it is industry represented in its power,—the human riches of time. The minute-glass runs sand of centuries, when great ideas are in healthful moments. So it was with Swedenborg. The powers of his mind were matched with extraordinary strength of body. Health, in its whole sense, is happiness. His life, in all respects, was one of the happiest that ever fell to the lot of man. He says, 'I have had joys and happiness such as no other man, I suppose, has felt in the universal world; and these both were more and more exquisite than any mortal can imagine or believe.'"

His biographer says, "It appears that he abstained from animal food from dietetic considerations. At the same time, there dwelt in his mind a vegetarian tendency, pointing towards the future, or at least, what is the same thing, crying out from the past. He writes on the subject, in his 'Arcana,' as follows: 'Considered apart, eating the flesh of animals is somewhat profane. The most ancient people never, on any account, eat the flesh of either beast or fowl; but lived entirely upon grain, especially on wheaten bread, on fruits, vegetables, and herbs, and various kinds of milk, butter, etc. It was unlawful for them to kill animals, or to eat their flesh. They looked upon it as bestial, and were content with the uses and services that animals afforded them. But, in process of time, when men became as cruel as wild beasts, yea, much more cruel, they began to slay animals, and ate their flesh; and, in consideration of this nature in man, the killing and eating of animals were permitted, and continue to be so.'"

God.

His first spiritual command of "Eat not so much," was placed over the portals of his study. His childish supposition, that God had appeared to him in person, was owing to the gross physical condition of his body, the consequent dullness of his faculties, and his low spiritual state, at that early period of his experience,—a fallacy common to the seers and prophets of all ages, from Adam to Moses; from Moses to the modern spiritual mediums; and from those mediums to the instruments in the early Shaker spiritual manifestations. Subsequently, Swedenborg, like his brother, John the Revelator, became disabused, and declared that "God cannot be seen in person by mortals on earth, or in the heavens." He says, "there were angels who were sent to men, and who also spoke by the Prophets; but what they spoke was not from the angels, but by them; for their state then was such, that they knew no otherwise than that they were Jehovah. But, when they had done speaking, they presently returned to their former state, and spoke as from themselves." This is a true principle; and no human being, Jesus not excepted, has ever seen Deity.

Swedenborg further says, "The Patriarchal Prophets, Psalmists, and Evangelists, are not holy men; they are not even venerable, for the most part; but the voice of sacred history itself generally assails them: their names are unknown in heaven. There are no saints with earthly names; but only sinners, scarlet more or less. God's is all the glory. Abraham, Moses, David, John, are plain mortals, like ourselves, entitled to no great consideration, when their office is laid aside, and their divine insignia put off. The men after 'God's own heart' are only so for a time and a mission. Every one is after God's own heart for the functions that he does best; holiness is not involved. The 'chosen people of God,' were the worst of people: for redemption begins at the bottom."

FRAGMENTARY IDEAS.

Stability of the solar system.—"Though the solar system is liable to certain mutations, in the form and eccentricity of its orbits, of very long periods; yet its orbits return again exactly to what they originally were, oscillating between very narrow limits."

"At once, by a single effort of his genius, worlds innumerable, in congregated spheres, were beheld in harmonious operation, without end or limit. The boundaries of the Universe, so to speak, became to man at once illimitable; and the scattering goodness of the Divine hand, strewing mercies and blessings amongst unnumbered worlds hitherto unseen and unknown, and un conjectured, was a scene worthy of the Almighty."

"The most glorious and magnificent region in the material Universe,—the heaven of heavens,—formed, as Swedenborg expresses it, of innumerable heavens in congregated spheres beyond or outside our own, was displayed, first to the intellectual, and subsequently to the ocular vision, when one universal blaze of glory burst forth on an astonished world, who beheld the Almighty traversing the innumerable spheres with the same flowing richness, beauty, and care, as is so conspicuous on this atom of a world upon which we dwell."

Thus, witnesses for the day, were Swedenborg and his followers, the Spiritualists. For long ages, the human race had been religiously impressed, but their rational faculties had been "held in durance vile."

Man hungered after knowledge which "State and Church" had withheld, by taking away the key of science, and substituting therefor, the senseless dogmas of superstition.

Light broke upon the religious world through Swedenborg.

Right began to be established in the religious world through Mother Ann.

In due time, these are now being conjoined together, and they are building up, or as Swedenborg expressed it, are "forming the new Heaven"—the New Church—that will not last after an adulterous union with the State—the New Earth—nor seek to put together what God hath put asunder.

SEPTIMUS.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Teachings of Ann Lee.

10. "Labor to feel the life of God in your souls; labor to make God's will your will; let it be your inheritance, your treasure, your daily occupation. Labor for the good of your souls, as though there were none on earth so needy of salvation as yourselves."

11. "In dealing with humanity, endeavor to understand their temperaments, and deal with them according to their creation. Some will need the plainness and severity of the testimony to bring them to a true sense of their condition; others will be saved by mercy and charity; they cannot be saved in any other way. Who wins souls to Christ, must needs be wise; but some never will find salvation except by feeling the judgments of God!"

12. To one who remarked that "he was full of evil;" Mother Ann replied: "Not so; you are not full of evil, for there is room in you to receive good; the conviction you feel for your sins, is good."

13. Some one sent Mother Ann a pair of velvet shoes; she returned them with the remark: "I choose to have my feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of Christ."

14. "Eat and drink with temperance. Let none abstain from food which they need; but let them not fail to serve God by the strength of their food. The wicked eat and drink and consume it upon their wicked desires. Ye must not do so; eat hearty and with thankfulness; then go and do the will of God."

15. Some persons complaining that their food did not satisfy their appetites, Mother Ann replied: "Your bodies are not hungry; but your souls are starving for the bread and waters of life. Confess and forsake your sins; hunger after righteousness, and you shall be filled to satisfaction."

16. "Men and women can engage in the gratifications of their lustful appetites in this world; but if they do not learn to crucify the flesh, it will follow them into the world of spirits. Death does not destroy the passions, nor make them less powerful; souls in hell feel the strength of their lusts a thousand fold stronger than in this world; and finding no way to gratify them, their lust is their torment, and torments them according to the proportion of its rage.

"And further: they have to feel the wrath of God against that filthy nature; and this torments them, even worse than their lusts. The more people yield to gratify their sexual appetites, the stronger their passions grow, and the more their lusts will rise in hell against them; torment will take the place of their present pleasures.

"I see now, in vision, souls suffering hell enough to take natural life, for sins committed through generative lusts. They are bound in the prisons of suffering; and their torment could be no greater, if they were in a cauldron of molten lead."

17. "Souls who have had an offer of the gospel of Christ—to depart from sin and live a virgin life—but who reject the offer, will go into the world of spirits and wander in deep distress looking after God. I have seen some wandering, in despair of finding deliverance from the torments of their sins; weeping and wailing until, to appearance they had worn gutters in their cheeks! Flee, therefore, from the wrath to come, by sacrificing the causes of hell."

18. "You must forsake the marriage of the flesh, or you cannot be married to the Lamb, nor have any share in the resurrection of Christ."

19. "Some gifts of God are given to souls in perverted nature's darkness; not because they have repented, but to lead them into a repentance." Some asked: "What is repentance?" "To leave off the commission of sin, is the only repentance God accepts," said Mother Ann; "and this no one can do, only by an honest and faithful confession of every sin that he has committed, to those who are already saved from the sins he would repent of."

20. To some who kneeled before Mother Ann, asking her blessing, she said: "Kneel not to me; kneel to God; I am only your fellow-servant. If I reprove you, remember, I also love you, and desire to bring your soul nearer to my soul, and nearer to the Spirit of God."

"The Shakers never accept any, nor reject any; they admit many, leaving it for the Holy Spirit to prove whether they belong to their Society or not!"

R. W. EMERSON.

To my Youth—No. 2.

Without watchfulness and self-examination, you cannot progress a single inch—without self-examination you will stumble as you go every day; not only so, but you will be a stumbling block in the way of other souls. A lack of the gift of self-examination is the reason why young people need to be examined by others.

They do things from an inward pressure of evil. Against this pressure a cross has to be borne. And that is the reason why Jesus taught his disciples to bear a daily cross; and it is just the same with you to-day as it was with the young disciples in Christ's day. And when he warned his disciples to watch and pray, he, in the course of his labors, added another word—pray and faint not—do not give up to the enemy.

One of the reasons why youth do not examine themselves, is, because they do not want to change. They want to remain the same kind of persons they have been—to follow their own natural way, and not God's way. Now that will never do—Jesus and his followers changed—turned from their own ways—came not to do their wills. The youth who stands stiff in his own will is not in a fruitful condition. Another reason why youth do not like to examine themselves, is, they do not like to read the record of their own doings as written on their memory—do not like to look at themselves, because they have been yielding here and there, from the path of right, and so have been co-workers with Satan, and so much under his power, as to be afraid to say to him, "get thee behind me, Satan;" have not simplicity enough to tell themselves and their parents the truth, and so shame the Devil.

In examining natural objects, men are not content with their ordinary vision; they use helps—examine things microscopically, and are much pleased to have the microscope open up something they could not see with their naked eye. Now, how is it possible for any person to know himself, if he will not examine himself with his own eyes. Those who do, will have the help of other eyes, that see clearer and further than their own; in this way "God helps those who help themselves." But those who have eyes and see not, shall wander—stumble and fall in the dark—the darkness of their own will.

It may be asked, how can the gift of self-examination be gained and maintained? The answer is, by continually exercising it on all you do, by night and by day. Persevere therein, till it becomes pleasant—becomes a delightful duty. Then you will know for yourself, experimentally, and truly, that "Christ's yoke is easy, and his burden light." I omit saying anything further on this interesting parable; exercise your own mind upon it, and gather information from others on the subject. And when you get through with this parable—this beautiful casket, there are others equally beautiful.

There is the casket of the Fig Tree; of a grain of Mustard Seed; of a little leaven; of the Prodigal; of the unjust Steward; of the Beggar and the Rich Man; of the Man who thought too highly of himself; of the unjust Judge; of the Man who went into a far country; of the Man who planted a vineyard; of the Woman and the lost money; of the lost Sheep; of the Tares; of the Shepherd and the sheepfold; of the net and the Fishes, and the Casket of the Pearl of great Price. Every one of these caskets contains gems illustrative of the kingdom of heaven; where lust has no place—even the uncleanness of marriage is not permitted.

Blessed are those who have a part in that kingdom, never to go out.

I will now say a few words on the two-fold life in man. Jesus said, "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven."

Now, all the animal creation are flesh and blood; and are brought forth through the action of the propensities; and we, in common with the lower animals, have the same kind of life, and the same propensities; therefore, that life can have no part in heaven.

Intellect, in connection with our animal life, does not make it any better, nor change its nature. In addition to that life, we have another life—a life, that the word of God can quicken; but no mere animal can be so quickened. The Apostle said, "Ye hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and in sins"—hath he quickened into a higher life, who were wont to live in the lusts of the flesh and of the mind. And again, "if ye live after the flesh ye shall die; but if ye, through the spirit, do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." "And as many as are led by the spirit of God, they are the sons of God," and no longer the sons of Adam. The testimony of the gospel which you hear from time to time, is the testimony of life to the inner man; and no soul can ever be quickened, except in obedience and subjection to it. You may gather from these few words an understanding which life is acceptable to God, and from you to your Brethren and Sisters, and which life is not. Remembering at all times, that ye cannot serve two masters.

Which will ye serve? Carnal, fleshly nature, or will you strive and pray that you may be quickened into a newness of life; and living the life of the Angels—maintain your virgin characters—that never need to change to be eternal in character? D. FRAZER.

One little cherub from New Hampshire—seven years old—writes us some truths, which we are glad to place before our little readers. Many long sermons have been preached, without containing so much simple Shakerism. The kernel when reached, is: "Confess and forsake sin; live purely, and you are a Shaker without knowing it—regardless of your theology." ED.

How to make a Shaker.

To make a Shaker is to confess your sins honestly, live purely like the little spirits in heaven; you must not hide your sins, because you do not like to confess them; you cannot hold them forever; you will be found out before long, by the light of truth, which will urge you to confess them. You cannot have your own way unless it be right; but will have to obey what you are taught; you will not be allowed to be unclean, nor tell falsehoods among the Shakers, without honestly confessing and repenting of them. If you do not do this, you cannot make a Shaker, because the people will not bear it very long.

This is true, for I have been taught all this, and more. If I had room I would write you some more about it.

GERTRUDE, Canterbury.

To "owe no man ought but love and good will," is a fundamental principle of Shaker faith. Any persons, therefore, trusting a Shaker, for longer or shorter periods, must do so at their own risks, and without the sympathy of Society. None, within the precincts of Shaker Society, not excepting its officers, have any right to contract a debt.

Love is not lust; these two are opposite. Oil and water cannot blend; neither the generation of the earthly with the resurrection of the heavenly. We cannot live fleshly lives, and at the same time be Children of the Resurrection.

NOTICE!

1. THE SHAKER is the official Organ of the United Societies called SHAKERS.

2. Therefore, be it understood, that "to owe any man aught, but love and good will," is unbecoming a Christian, or Christian Community. No one having connection with the Societies, has any permission to run in debt; any one, therefore, trusting any member, does so at his own risk, under the discountenance of the leading authorities; and no part of Society will be holden for debts so contracted. *

"Running the World Out."

SHAKERS—SALT.

The two most stereotyped objections to the rationality and perpetuity of the Shaker Order are, First: That if celibacy be a normal principle, all people are under obligations to adopt it; that if it be right for one, for a thousand, it is right for ten thousand, for everybody.

Second: That if mankind should hereafter, at any time, so adopt it, the world would run out—the human race would cease to be upon this earth.

The foundations, very extensively laid in the theological education of religious people in Christendom, upon which rest these objections to a religious celibate life, are the subjoined ideas:—

First: That, in the spirit world, there are but two receptacles of the souls of all earth's inhabitants—one heaven, and one hell, the antithesis of each other. That there is no evil in heaven, nor in those who, as soon as they are out of the body, go there. That there is no good in hell, nor in any one who (after they cease to breathe the earth's atmosphere) enters it.

Second: Not the solid facts of human experience, which constitute character, will determine to which of these two extreme places the disembodied soul will go; but the belief, or disbelief, of some abstract dogma, having in itself no intrinsic good nor evil, and of no practical use nor consequence to either the individual or the race.

Third: Of the six hundred (more or less) sects in Christendom, each one supposes itself to be the one true way to heaven; and supposes that all who die outside of its pale will go to the other location. Practically, they are all one way. In dogmas they differ; in works, which go to the formation of character, they are one; and, after death, they will all go to "one place"—Hades, the place of departed spirits—the first spirit world; and will from thence descend, or rise, according as their works have been, without any reference to their theology, until they find their proper heaven, or hell.

There is one thing in which these theological sects are all agreed.—"the works of the flesh,"—the practice of generation, and its inevitable concomitants, or fruits—marriage, selfish property, war, creating rich and poor, bond and free, on the basis of "male and female;" living to eat and drink those things which afford the most present satisfaction, or gratification, at the expense of future sickness and disease; then employing a class of men to cure them of their sicknesses and diseases, by the use of poisons, as the great cure-all, which induce premature death, and pass them into their heaven or hell in the spirit world.

Contemplating Shakerism, all these unite and say, if celibacy is right, marriage is wrong, and, the Shakers excepted, all will go into hell, and be eternally lost.

Jesus said to his disciples, "Ye are the salt of the earth," to preserve it from decomposition—putrefaction—and ye bear the same proportion to the mass of mankind, that salt does to the bulk of the earth, or that salt does to the quantity of meat to which it is applied as a preserver. "There be few that be saved" while in the physical body, and living upon the earth. But those few will be the Saviours of all who live and die in generation, after they have passed through the gates of death into the land of souls.

Thus, as "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump," and maketh it all into leaven; so is it the tendency of salt to make whatever it is applied to "taste like itself"—like salt. And thus, all who become Christians actually—Shakers—on earth, are the first-fruits of what the whole mass of mankind may hereafter become in the spirit worlds; as those who are themselves saved from the lust of generation, the lust of eating and drinking, the lusts of dress and equipage, and the lusts of the mind, in this stage of being, will have to help other souls up to the same plane of existence in the eternal spheres of spirit life.

Jesus was eminently a man of principles and not of persons. He would not alternately love and hate the same man or woman, according as they changed their spirit and character, but would hate the corrupted character and spirit. And, when it is shown, from historical data, that the system of spiritual ethics promulgated by him was rather the result of the "progression of primates" (as Professor Mapes would phrase it), than a new product of his own individuality; and that Buddha, Confucius, Zoroaster, and Moses, the world's Avatars, had each, in their day and generation, built up a comparatively perfect system of moral precepts and religious maxims, illustrated by their own lives, which were the exponents of the same eternal principles of truth that Jesus taught and practiced; and as the primrose by the hedge-side can, by judicious culture for successive germinations, be progressed to a double-flowering moss-rose, not easily propagated, so the Shaker Order, being the second appearing of Christ to and in humanity, in its entirety of male and female, is where, for a hundred years, the sexes have lived together as celibates, in a spiritual relation, without faltering or deviation (Dixon's "Spiritual wives," and Noyes's Community, or "Complex Marriage," to the contrary notwithstanding), as brethren and sisters, just as they expect to live to all eternity; this being eternal life.

Of itself alone, salt would make a poor meal for a hungry man or woman; or poor soil in which to grow vegetables. But, applied agriculturally to the soil, or mixed in proportions with other substances, it is invaluable and indispensable.

"I came not," said Jesus, "to bring peace on the earth," to its generative family relations; "but to set a man against his father, a daughter against her mother;" and to make a man's foes, his generative lusts, and their products, to be those of his own household, when called into the Christ Order and converted; just as salt is set against meat that is on the highway to decomposition.

By reason of "the corruption that is in the world through lust," the earth, in its proper family relations, is fast passing away, is being burnt up by its own internal fires; and society, to-day, is being threatened with general disintegration, which nothing but an increased and more extended application of Shakerism—the Christ Spirit and principles—can avert! No less potent causes can arrest the downward tendency caused by so many seeking pleasure in unrighteousness, through the highest functions of individual and society life—nutrition and reproduction.

The end has come, and "the earth, and the works that are therein, will be burnt up," either by the spiritual fires that Jesus kindled eighteen hundred years ago, or by the fires of its own unsubdued passions. So that it is only a question of high-life foeticide, low-life infanticide, or Christian celibacy.

A female Saviour—Ann Lee—arises, who makes use, not pleasure—right; not expediency—principle; sensuous enjoyment, not the object of human existence; seeking, with all the powers of her being, the wealth of others (the Community), not her own; such only are Avatars—Saviours. They are salt, with which to save themselves, and to preserve and protect all upon whom they act, by influence, primarily or approximately. Their followers are the "Ye" who "are the salt of the earth."

"But, if the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted?" Sure enough! If any one turn to the "weak, beggarly elements," and so become earth, and not salt, such is good for nothing, but to be returned to the earth as manure, to stimulate the growth of earthly plants.

Seeding Shakers perform this use. They are preachers to the world, like its own priests, knowing more than they practice, and are to be regathered into the fold at some future day.

There is an obtuseness in the public mind upon the subjects of this article which cannot be accounted for, except on the principle that "the flesh lusteth against the Spiritual Order, even as the Spirit of Christ warreth against the sins of the world, and seeketh to burn them up, and thus save souls therefrom; even as physical fire consumeth matter that is more gross than itself.

St. Augustine said, "Marriage peoples the earth; Celibacy replenisheth the heavens." Were all females to be married, and each one to bear six children, the earth would soon be overpopulated; and were all females to become celibates, the earth would soon be depopulated. If marriage were appropriated to its proper use only—the begetting and rearing of offspring—celibacy would still be necessary to check population, and to raise up seed of the Resurrection heavens—a class of Jesuses and Anns, to minister the eternal Order of the Resurrection, or Christ heavens to souls after they pass over the river, into the land where there are no pomegranates nor figs, and where they will say, "There is no bread here; nor is there any water; and our souls loath this light bread. O, that there were a physical resurrection of our material bodies; and that we were back again on the earth, where we could have our long-accustomed, stimulating indulgences, and not forever suffer this hungering and thirsting after earthly things in this Hades, the valley of the shadow of death to all our earthly enjoyments."

Let the new heaven arise, that it may create and regulate a new earth—a new life!

Salvation.

We all want Salvation; but differ in opinion what shall be saved in us, and who shall do the work. The most generally accepted idea of Salvation, is something to be effected hereafter, by the imputed righteousness of one who was murdered by the Jews for the purpose; for which the Jews are hated and Jesus very much worshiped. This idea does not require us to cease the practice of sin, but to believe that Jesus "paid it all." We are arrested by conviction of wrong-doing; under this education, we plead for salvation, not from the act of stealing horses, but from the penalty deservedly our due; and just so, the next time we steal a horse. Popular Christianity teaches, that of ourselves we can do nothing; that we must rely on the death of a certain body, not on his life and example. We claim, that Jesus never taught such doctrines, has no fellowship with those who believe them, unless he feels the fellowship of pity. We have a noble example of our duty as students, accepting Christ: "Lord, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" "Keep the Commandments." "These I have kept." "Then if thou wouldst be perfect, DO AS I HAVE DONE." "But Lord, these are not what I want to do; nor the practices I want to be saved from; excuse me!" Thus we have in the life of Jesus, an example; and in his teachings what we must do, and not do, to be saved. What would be the effect, if the moral code were enforced upon all professing salvation through the merits of Jesus? Verily, we believe they would be better exponents of Christian principles than now; and enjoy more salvation from the crying evils of the day, than millions of centuries will save them from, while believing that Jesus has taken medicine that will save them from sin, or the punishment of sin. Jesus teaches that the boon of salvation is obtained by patterning his self-denial, and by "Go, and sin no more!" "Those who do the will of my Father, the same shall be saved." "Not every one that saith, 'Lord, Lord;' but those who do something,—my Father's will."

Give me a religion that has the power of salvation in it; that is not made up of forms, creeds nor ceremonies, but has in it vitality that yields present salvation.

Give me a religion that yields life—eternal life; not a hypocritical cloak under which I can hide, on the first day of the week, the evil transactions of the previous six! Give me a religion that is the power of God unto salvation now; that purifies, elevates, ennobles; that takes cognizance of outward acts; of inward thoughts; not only at stated periods, but pervades the whole being, from Sabbath to Sabbath; all the weeks of the year; all the years of a life! And thus is summed up the call of the Spirit on every one who "names the name of Christ" or would live a Shaker life.

Christian Faith.

Faith, as usually defined, is the assent of the mind to a statement made, having reference either to the past or to the future. Christian faith almost invariably refers to the future, and denotes the certain conviction which one has of events that will transpire, or of the results of a given course of conduct. In the language of the Apostle, "it is the foundation of things hoped for, the assurance of things not seen." It is a principle of the same character as that which exists in the mind of the Divine Being. "By faith, we understand, the ages have been arranged by the word of God, so that the things which are beheld have not come into existence from things apparent." That the entire future is clear to the mind of Deity, so that he is certain what will be the moving panorama that, in the course of ages, will pass before the eyes of created beings. Though the events which occur in a regular order of sequence have not yet actually transpired, yet they exist as realities in the Divine Mind. "God calls things that are not, as though they were." The Christian, united to the Divine Being by his Spirit dwelling in him, possesses an unshaken confidence in the future; whatever may be the agitations of earth, either in its physical convulsions or moral revolutions, he has a firm persuasion that all things will eventuate in the greatest good to himself and others, and will evince the infinite wisdom of the Supreme Ruler.

"His hand the good man fastens on the skies,
And bids earth roll, nor heeds the idle whirl."

Christian faith, as the term implies, must be the faith of Christ; not merely a belief in him, nor on him, but the faith of Christ, the very faith which he possessed. It is that which influenced him to a life of self-denial, by bearing a daily cross against every inclination that would lead the soul downward to find its gratification in the sensual life, and not up to the celestial; against every prompting of ambition that would have urged him to strive for the renown of the warrior, of the earthly monarch, or of the ecclesiastical dignitary; against whatever would have influenced him to exalt himself above the lowest of those whom it was his mission to elevate to a life of purity and righteousness. By his faith he was united to the Father, so that the future, which was all transparent to the Divine Mind, was laid open to himself in proportion to his capacity to comprehend it, and he was able to show to his disciples things yet to be. These early disciples, who ultimately became firmly established in the faith of Christ, the Apostle Paul exhorted Christians to take as examples of faith and patience: "Whose faith follow, considering the aim of their life,—JESUS CHRIST THE SAME, YESTERDAY, TO-DAY, AND FOREVER." He is the same in his intimate union with Infinite Love; in faith and hope; in meekness and humility; in unbounded kindness and charity; and in his aspirations for whatever is in its nature of the utmost purity and divinest beauty, both for himself and all God's children.

Christian faith, therefore, is not simply an assent of the understanding to some truth presented to it, but an active principle operating throughout the entire existence of man, whether in this or the spirit world, and continually bringing him nearer to the All Good. It embraces not only an assurance of ultimate blessedness, but also the life of faith, which is its very essence—faith in active exercise, manifested in every-day conduct. It is the foundation of an edifice, laid indeed in the present, but whose superstructure is to be the work of the future. This foundation is laid in God; it therefore partakes of the stability of the Eternal, and is a certain prophecy of the beauty and glory that will ultimately greet the eye of the beholder. This faith is not the self-confidence of the worldly-minded. It is not the assurance of a Napoleon that the star of his destiny, which had risen so brilliantly, should continue to shine more and more brightly till he had reached the zenith of worldly power and glory. The throne which he had established by so great efforts, and that he fondly hoped would remain as a permanent seat for many generations of his posterity, was suddenly broken. It lacked the element of durability possessed by that which the Psalmist beheld in prospect when, viewing Christ's final triumph and glory, he exclaimed,—"God is thy throne for the age of ages!"

One may learn a valuable lesson respecting the instability of earthly hopes and confidences in reading the biography of Sir Walter Scott. He was a man of wonderful, intellectual abilities, who stood on the very summit of literary eminence in his day; was remarkable for his social and amiable qualities, and of decidedly aristocratic tastes and aspirations. As a consequence of these tastes, he was anxious to be the founder of a family with a name and fame above the many. The great wealth which he acquired by his literary efforts was employed in gratifying this desire, and Abbotsford, the grand estate, with its beautiful and aristocratic mansion, was established. But a crisis came in his financial affairs, which stripped him of his wealth, and the remaining days of the distinguished man of letters were spent in toilsome efforts to retrieve the disaster. Abbotsford passed into other, though kindred, hands, and no one is left to transmit to posterity the name which he so highly cherished. He was not of that class mentioned by the Apostle, who look for a city that has foundations whose builder and maker is God.

The Christian's faith is always accompanied by a power which enables him to obey the law of divine love, and ultimately frees him from the tendency to transgression. In the language of the Apostle, "it works by love, purifies the heart, and overcomes the world." This indeed is what gives to it the certainty which distinguishes it from the mere assent of the understanding to a proposition. It is the Spirit of Truth, which Jesus assured his disciples should abide with them forever. It does not give to the soul its "longing after immortality," but assures it of its reality. It was this faith, with its accompanying power, that dwelt with so much fullness in Mother Ann. It was the sword of keenest edge that severed at a blow the knot that has troubled so many mere logicians. She needed no long-drawn argument to prove to her the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. She was athirst for the waters, and hungry for the bread of eternal life, and she sought to satisfy her spiritual wants just as she would those of the body. The words of Jesus, "Labor for the food which endures to everlasting life," were to her a divine oracle. She did labor. Her spiritual instincts led her at once to the true source from which all her wants could be supplied. Whatever could be effected by confession and repentance of sin, she did with a purpose. Whatever power was to be obtained by prayer, that she sought by earnest and continual supplication. The Divine Spirit wrought powerfully in her when she consented to yield to its saving influences. It taught her the renunciation of every desire that leads the soul to find its heaven among those who are dead to the experimental knowledge of the higher, spiritual and heavenly life. It inspired her with that earnestness and zeal which made effectual all her efforts to rise from the darkness of sin, and to attain that state where the sunlight of Divine Love should shine continually upon her. To accomplish this, she was willing and glad to forego every possible sensual gratification, being assured that what she sought to gain would be an infinite reward for every trial she should be called to endure. And she did gain it. By following Christ in the regeneration, denying herself in accordance with his requirements, she was made partaker of the same life which he possessed—eternal life. God, as manifested by unbounded love, gentleness, kindness, and enduring patience, dwelt in her. His peace was her peace, and his joy, her joy. So that it was with the utmost propriety that she replied to a sister who was expressing the ardent love she felt for her, "You do not love me, but you love God in me." Situations which to many minds would have been utter darkness, were to her all aglow with divine illumination. She beheld the future through a glorious medium, like that which enlightened Jesus on the Mount. What she gained, dwelt in her as a permanent treasure. As a fountain springing up to everlasting life, it overflowed continually for the benefit of others, and many, thirsting as she had thirsted, were eager to partake of its refreshing waters.

There ever is, in the faith which is wrought into the soul by the influences of the Divine Spirit, a certainty that is as satisfactory to its possessor as the demonstrations of the exact sciences. There is need of no complicated, metaphysical process to arrive at this assurance. It comes as the rain from heaven; as the sunlight to the plant, that asks not, "how is it possible?" but drinks in the light and the dew, and then grows on, and buds and blooms, and sends forth its fragrance, and displays its beauties to every beholder. "Those that are planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God;" and this planting is the result of that faith which, the Apostle says, "I will show you by my works"—in every day life. Life in God—No. 1.

The foundation of all religion rests on the sublime truth, that man is the image of God; intellectually, the miniature of the Supreme Intelligence, and can only be happy in the Divine.

To grow in the Divine Nature is his privilege; to become more and more perfect, by degrees, through time, to the endless ages of eternity!

In this approximation to the Divine Attributes, consists his happiness; his heaven; his all: like a well-tuned musical instrument, he has to be attuned into the harmony of the great Prototype; and when the intonations are complete, man will be in possession of all the happiness designed, and of which he is capable.

If man were not the image of the great Prototype, how could he be the recipient of any revelation, inspiration or teaching? How could he understand, and come to the knowledge of the Divine Will? How could he be responsible to the great Tribune, without the consciousness of the Divine impress in his soul?

On this great truth, of man being the image of God, rests the revelation of our Heavenly Father through the prophets, and lastly, through the great Prophet, Immanuel, the Holy Saviour, which, being interpreted, is, "God with us."

When the Lord Jesus opened his mission, by preaching salvation from the evils in the world, his disciples became conscious of the Divine truth, having in their own souls a response.

On this fact, of man being the miniature and offspring of God, the Saviour predicated the Judgment: the final justification, or condemnation, of those who heard his Gospel; for said he, "This is the condemnation, that light has come into the world, and men choose darkness rather, because their deeds are evil." They saw and comprehended the Divine truths necessary to their salvation; but on account of the cross, were not willing to accept and obey them.

Being endowed with the capacity of understanding the Divine will and mission, man is therefore made responsible for his own happiness or misery; the final result resting on his own choice; for he is left free to exercise his powers of volition, to choose the good and refuse the evil. On this fact, the Holy Saviour predicated his mission. He made no attempts to change the structure nor attributes of the human mind; but in all cases and conditions, to adapt his doctrines and teaching to the understanding of his hearers.

And his call was, invariably, "Whosoever will, let him come, and partake of the waters of life freely." A privilege, no compulsion; free liberty to make the choice of the way of salvation, and the kingdom of heaven; or the dark labyrinths of condemnation, and the precincts of the damned!

The strongest advocates for sulphur and the other concomitant combustibles, cannot possibly get half enough into their crucible to make a hell comparable to a guilty conscience, and self-abnegation from the enjoyments of the righteous in the kingdom of heaven; to whom the Lord of salvation will say, "Ye goats to the left, and ye sheep to the right;" a condition of volition and election!

Here we may pause and ask: "Is it possible for any human being to bear the separation from his or her Heavenly Parents, and their good and faithful children?" Thoughts of everlasting separation, darkness and despair, are hardly endurable by a finite and dependent being. If man could change the intelligent god within him, and obliterate it from his soul, then he would be a fit companion, and there would be a place for him among the swine; but as long as he has the knowledge of Life in God, he must be with his Parents, or be forever miserable!!

And now, once for all time, let us cease to teach Divine mysteries; the inscrutable ways of Divine Providence and his specialities in the salvation of his children; the fighting of the winds in the shape of imaginary demons; the groping in fogs of uncertainty of our creation and destination, and come out into the broad day of everlasting light, where creation can be seen and known: let us take the right way, calling on the bewildered and lost in darkness, to "Come into the light, for we have found the way, and are on the road home!" Response from the lost children: "But we are doomed to everlasting fire and perdition!" Voice: "Who told you so?" Response: "The holy catholic fathers, John Calvin and Martin Luther." Voice: "A false report, the Holy Saviour is here, and he says, you may come and welcome!!" Response: "All right, we will soon be there!!"

God the Eternal is positive; positive in his own nature and being; positive in his plans of creation. The universe of mind and matter, now in successful operation, attest his eternal efficiency! His agents, whom he employs, must be like himself, ever active in carrying into execution the Divine missions, for the well-being of his creatures.

It is the doing of positive good, for ourselves and others, which constitutes the good man or woman. Negatives in agency do nothing; they are nothing in human beings; and the man or woman, who expects a reward for being a passive recipient of heaven's good store, and the selfish withholding them from others, will hear the unwelcome sound, "depart from me, for I never knew you."

The mission of the Holy Saviour was a life of continuous labor: "My Father worketh, hitherto, and I work."

Jesus said, "it is more blessed to give than to receive;" in accordance, he went about doing good; giving aid and comfort to his poor fellow-beings; in blessing others, he was the constant recipient of blessings from his Father; and the voice at his baptism, "this is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," attested the Divine approbation and blessing!

The very consciousness of having imparted to others the means of eternal life and comfort, is a blessing that enlarges the divinity within us.

Recapitulation: Man, intellectually, the miniature of God; being thus constituted, it is impossible for him to be happy only in the Divine nature; a constant growth in time, and through the ages of eternity to constitute his heaven. God, in his revelations, has addressed man, through his rational faculties, making him accountable for their use; and predicating his happiness or misery, on the powers of volition. The false teaching of anti-christ can never change these Divine truths.

VERITAS.

The Household of Faith.

As the Trinitarian God of the past, and the masculine church of the present, have neither been fruitful of the power of salvation, nor grace to redeem humanity from degradation, so will all religions, all systems, and all creeds prove themselves inadequate to the wants of the world, which fail to recognize and be governed by the living principle of duality.

As natural things are but types of spiritual, and the more real is comprehended within the crust of the outer, so must the significant fact, underlying this so long negative truth, be admitted, if we would see the advancement and spread of Christ's kingdom.

Can the paternal influence alone beget and bring forth children in the natural order? Neither can it in the spiritual.

What is home without a Mother, either in the natural or the spiritual household? And, when the true heirs are produced, and "the sons and daughters of God without rebuke," they will come of a parentage balanced as that which said in the beginning, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness;—male and female created he them."

A simple, reasonable, theological basis on which to rest the principles which are to redeem us from the thralldom of the earth-plane, and inspire us with the necessary fortitude and self-renunciation, to subordinate the natural to the spiritual, and thus be truly "born again," are essentials to the development and progress of the soul.

E. H. W., Har.

Was the God of the Jews, the Creator of heaven and earth? The Shakers say not.

The God that directed the Jews was a tutelar divinity; not the Father of the Christ. One believed in, and directed war; the other taught of an enduring peace. One permitted "an eye for an eye;" the other taught, "love your enemies."

Very many complications of opinions may be unraveled by learning the distinction made by the assertion: "The God of the Christian is not the God of the Jews."

POETICAL.

"The Servant of the Lord must be Gentle."

2d Tim. 2:24.

Gentle words and gentle actions,
Tokens of a tender heart:
When to all they render kindness
What rich blessings they impart!

Thus, when clouds of sorrow lower,
And the soul is bow'd with care,
Gentle words with magic power,
Strengthen us to trials bear.

Let us cultivate those virtues
Which adorn and beautify;
Clothe the soul with heavenly graces
And to angels bring it nigh.

Peace and love, and tender kindness,
Breath'd around us as we go,
Scatter all the selfish blindness
Which prevents pure love to flow.

L. W., Whitewater.

Inspiration of the Sunlight.

O beautiful sunshine! how brightly thou'rt beaming,
So warming and cheering I love thy pure light;
Messenger welcome, o'er earth thou art gleaming,
Dispelling the darkness and gloom of the night.

Thy glory awakens a feeling of gladness,—
A happy emotion springs up in my heart!
Beholding thy beauty, devoid of all sadness,
To me thou doth unbounded pleasure impart.

3.

Bright orb of our system, in glory excelling,
Dispenser of light, and of warmth to the earth;
Roll on in thy pathway, forever thou'rt telling
'Twas God, who created and gave thee thy birth.

His Infinite Power, Creation discloses;
His works so majestic in grandeur are spread;
Within nature's bosom, in silence reposes
The wonders of ages, so awful and dread!

5.

Rich treasures, yet buried in ocean and cavern,
In wilderness places, and deep, fruitful soil;
In valleys, on mountains, in deserts all barren,
Only awaiting discovery and toil.

The bright sun of Science in splendor is rising—
Now piercing the clouds, long obscuring its ray;
Gray mists are dispersing, and oh, how surprising
The light that is ushering in a new day!

7.

Strong demons of gross superstition and error,
Which long having held many souls in their grasp,
Deprived of authority, shrinking with terror,
Recoil from the light, like a poisonous asp.

8.

In death-robes its victims hath Ignorance shrouded,
In cloisters and prison-walls long were they bound;
While priestly dictation their vision beclouded,
No passage for light to their dungeons was found.

But, thank God! the fetters are now being broken,
And thousands rejoice in their happy release;
All hail the glad tidings! and welcome each token
Preparing the nations for truth's great increase.

10.

When Freedom shall triumph o'er earth's vast dominions,
And high shall be carried the standard of right,
The angel of love will unfold her soft pinions,
And guide honest souls that advance in the light.

11.

All hail, then, the morning of true Resurrection!
The sunbeams of glory descend to the earth;
O blessed enjoyment! O happy reflection!
With angels we gather a substance of worth.

MARTHA.

The Weaver.

I've laid my web for life,
And now I'm left to fill it;
With care and daily strife,
Or ease, if I so will it.

An even thread, and strong,
Will weave me sure protection;
A 'linsey woolsey' one
Will break, and cause vexation.

And when the work is done,
'Twill make my seamless garment;
Or, clothe my soul upon,
In sad and sackcloth raiment. M. W.

Testimony of John Whiteloy.

"I have a very decided opinion of the Shakers," said a Boston editor: "that they are no better than other people, and no worse!" Considering the above remark as indicative of "whatever is, is right," in one man's opinion, at least, I was led to make clear the difference between the Shakers and the world, as follows:

Nothing but the spirit of Christ can elevate us above earthly conditions, wherein we are "pretty much all alike." Evidences of possession of Christ's spirit are given, only, in pure, unselfish lives. Riches, honors, place, power and literary attainments, may all be acquired without regard to purity or right; but the righteousness that creates newness of life, has its springs in complete denial of what "other people" delight to engage in. Seeking Christ, the Spirit led me to a Shaker Community; I here found Christ manifested in the lives of individuals, as I had never found elsewhere, though a professional "Disciple of Christ" when I came. All that wore the garb, were not Shakers, but probationers—"being tried by the holy Spirit for acceptance or rejection," as Emerson would state it. I have given the Shakers nearly a quarter of a century's trial; and during that time have been tried and crucified on the same cross that Jesus died to the world; and to-day find myself among the antipodes of "other people," and one of them. I see "other people" glorying in all that tends to build up pride, lust, war, private property and marriage, which are the very enemies of the Christ Spirit. The discipline of the Shakers has been good for me; for by it I am redeeming myself from following those fashions that lead "other people" in selfish, fleshly unions; seeking to save that life that can only live at the expense of life eternal. I live for others; "not for myself alone," nor for my natural kin alone; but am giving expression to that love for others, that requires the laying down of my carnal, generative life, and thus I enjoy Christ; and this is the only way to enjoy the real Christ.

"The Shakers are no better than other people," unless they actually bear more cross against sinful practices than do "other people;" or if the crosses they bear do not enlarge their sphere of doing good, and bring them en rapport with that life, which we in common with "other people" believe the Angels now live. I bless good wherever and in whomsoever I see it. I love a temperate man; if he is not perfect, he is on the road, and therefore my relation. But a truly honest Shaker forms the most complete idea of what a follower of Christ should be; and to be one, is the daily effort of J. W.

Divine Influences.

When in a proper condition, physically and spiritually, we inhale and exhale the spiritual atmosphere as really as we do the natural air. We receive from, and impart to each other, spiritual influences, as readily as the Sun's rays are absorbed by objects upon which it shines, or the thirsty earth imbibes the rain that falls from the clouds, and reciprocatingly returns the same in a purer form. It is said, the rays of the sun move the massive monument on Bunker Hill! How much more should the heavenly Luminary—God—sway the masses of human intellect and feeling, to act in consonance with it, for the promotion of the life that is divine—to live, move and exist only in Him—in his service, who is "the way, the truth, and the life!" "When we are resurrected from the mists of error, false educations and superstitions, into the glorious sunshine of everlasting truth, we shall see the right way, and walk therein; we shall know of the truth, and obey; we shall know of the life, the divine, spiritual element, and live in it, as do the Angels, now in heaven. As the soul grows in the divine life, the loves of this gross, animal existence will disappear; the habits will no longer be related to earthly things, but will be fashioned after the Angelic. It is in our power to make a large measure of heaven on the earth, by engaging only in those soul enjoyments that occupy the inhabitants of the Christ sphere. With the All-wise, the All-pure there is no trouble, and in the ratio we are wise and pure, there certainly will be none with us—our life will be divine.

H. B., Shakers, N. Y.

Tobacco.

It is nearly thirty years, since an inspirational testimony from the heavens was delivered to the Societies of Shakers, against the use of tobacco, swine's flesh, and alcohol; the latter being permitted to be used discretionately, by direction of physicians only. Our people were generally tobacco users; pork and cider were common at every meal; yet they were abandoned and by many, never indulged in afterward, though some had been habitual users of pork, alcohol and tobacco for upwards of thirty years. There never was a time in our history, when the same testimony against tobacco was more needed, though but few of the old Believers use it; and they sorrowfully. It is a lamentable fact, that two-thirds of all persons asking admittance to our Society, are habitual users of tobacco in one or more forms! And what are we to do? We cannot yet feel, that because of its use, they should be denied the privilege of confessing and repenting of still greater sins—"the lusts of the flesh, of the eyes, and the pride of life"—acknowledging, that the use of tobacco is a barrier, to speak mildly, to the overcoming of the sins of the world. Prominent minds among us do not fear that our testimony is at all too strong—nor that we shall need to back down from any position we have taken; even while we admit its use with adults having formed the habit, under protest, and denying the right of minors to engage in it at all. The argument that all nations practice it, is one that we will withstand; and nothing will convince us that it is respectable, nor any so respectable, as if they did not use the weed.

The finer sensibilities of our nature sicken at the thought that our clean, consecrated dwellings, should ever again be polluted with the fumes or saliva of the tobacco user.

There is a moral responsibility resting on us, to be exemplars to mankind, by a continuance in self-denial to this bewitching narcotic. Once we were as deeply in love with it as any outside of our Society are, or can be. We well remember our social smokings,—when, with our well-filled clay pipes of home manufacture, we would make the air blue with the fumes of the weed! Who wishes the return of those seasons? We accept with joy the light that science has shed upon the subject—that it has, as usual, taken the hand of our religion, declaring tobacco no less respectable than rum, and that it is a moral and spiritual degenerator, and a physical disorganizer.

The writer of this was a rank tobacco user, but has long since abandoned its use; and all honor to those who have done likewise.

We cannot be saviours to others in this, nor in any other respect, until we first are saved. It is to be hoped that we will not be hypocrites, by practicing what we preach against, as we commonly fault Christendom generally. We have proclaimed against the lusts of the flesh and of the mind; against rum, pork and tobacco; and if we engage therein, do not let us seek to hide them under Christian colors.

Which is Nobler, the Aesthetic or the Ascetic?

Were there no sin confronting us at every step in life, with its general accompaniments of poverty, want and wretchedness; were there no ignorance, with its lack of happiness and growth, chafing continually upon the benevolent and philanthropic elements in our being, the gratification of our taste for the beautiful would not seem so contrary to the genius of Christianity. We all believe that we shall have them ultimately to enjoy, unless like the rich man in the parable we have "had our good things in this life" at the expense of the "durable riches and life evermore" which are the product of practical love to the Lord, and to our neighbor. E. H. W.

Freegift Wells, a worthy member of our Community, deceased on Saturday, the 15th of April (1871), aged 85 years 10 months and 25 days. He was the youngest of a family of 11 children—all now dead, save one, whose present age is over 93 years.

The remarkable longevity of this family is worthy of notice.

Thomas and Abigail Wells, the parents of said family of children, were each, respectively, 80 and 85 years of age at death. The names and ages of the ten children, who lived to mature years, were as follows, viz.:

Seth Y. Wells,	deceased, aged 80 y.	2 m. 11 d.
Thomas " Jr.,	" " 74	9 16
Benjamin " "	" " 81	2 19
Calvin " "	" " 81	1 8
Luther " "	" " 86	5 4
Stephen " "	" " 88	10 5

The mother and 10 children have been firm believers in the testimony of Christ's Second Appearing, all but one having died in the faith of Mother Ann Lee.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Teachings of Ann Lee.

21. Eliab Harlow records Mother Ann as commenting on the indifference with which Americans involved themselves in debt: "You will run in debt, not only bringing yourself into bondage, but your family; and then, you distress your creditors. Such evil management will ever be a spiritual loss to the soul, until the creditors are paid, and the soul repents of having become indebted."

22. "If I owned the whole world, I would turn it into joyfulness. I would not say to the poor: be ye warmed and be ye clothed, without giving them the wherewith to help them."

23. "Be diligent in business—hands to work and hearts to God. Godliness leads to industry. The devil is a tempter; but an idle person tempts the devil. When doing your duty in the love of God, the devil can have no power over you; there is no room for temptations."

24. "I have taught you the way of God; you must keep it. I am one, called to keep it with you; I must do my work, you must do yours; I can help you; so can the heavenly spirits, but they cannot do your work. You have a day and privilege which many others have desired, but did not obtain. If you take up your crosses against the lusts of the flesh, as Jesus did, while you have the ability to gratify these, you will be the brightest souls in heaven; there are glorious crowns prepared for all such; honor and glory that none can obtain, who live in the indulgences that are darkening, and death to the soul."

25. "Taking up the cross of Christ will be compulsory in the future world, brought about by sufferings; but those who voluntarily take up the cross now, and live as Christ lived, will be more glorious than the Angels—yea, as kings and priests unto God!"

26. "The marriage of the flesh is a covenant with death, and an agreement with hell! the Christ life is eternal life; who would enjoy this, must forsake that."

27. One day there came a poor man to Mother Ann, complaining of his brother, who was rich and able to help him, but would not. She replied: "That is the way of the world; the rich are covetous and will not help the poor; and the poor, instead of crying to God, to soften the hearts of the rich, will envy and hate them; therefore both are wicked."

28. Of one of her disciples, Mother Ann asked: "Do you believe I can forgive sins?" "I believe," said Hannah Cogswell, "that the spirit of Christ that is in you, can forgive my sins." "That is the right faith," said Mother Ann. *

1. Toiling brother or sister, do you grow faint in the pursuit of the treasures of immortal life? Give your heart in prayer to God, our Heavenly Father and Mother, and supplicate their guidance.

2. Life would lose much of its unpleasantness, if each one would seek, by acts of condescension, to brighten the pathway and cheer the hearts of dear companions.

A. E. II.

"Ten men fall from defect in morals, where one falls from defect in intellect."

Let us strive to make this untrue. Integrity and intelligence are natural allies.

Prayer.

Most prominent among all the subjects engrossing the minds of professing Christians is that of prayer. What is it? Whence its origin? What the benefits to be derived from it? Prayer has been defined as the heart's sincere desire, uttered, or unexpressed; the motion of a hidden fire that burns within the breast. Jesus advised, for prayer, to enter into the closet, and shut the door; and one of his disciples said: "Pray without ceasing." If these injunctions were literally obeyed, the closet would be our abiding place, and prayer our constant employ; in which case, somebody would soon be hungry, with nothing in the larder to appease that hunger. But, if prayer be the heart's sincere desire, we may pray constantly and work perpetually; for it is action, at last, that gives vitality to our desires. The grocer who called out to his clerk to sand the sugar and water the vinegar, and come up to prayers, might make money, and use words, but could hardly be said to pray, within the meaning of either Jesus or his disciple. The hosts of professing Christians who enter their synagogues, or places of worship for prayer, enrobed in gorgeous apparel of silks and satins, to pour forth in studied language a form of words, grammatical and rhetorical, agreeing with the gold, diamonds and rubies that adorn their persons, occupying the first seats, have their prayers hindered by the strong contrast presented by the rear ranks of the same congregation—the soiled and threadbare vestments, the haggard and toil-worn countenances of the widow and fatherless, who are suffering for the common necessities of life! Should the spirit of God give form to the prayers uttered, and render it into actions, this unchristian inequality would end in brothers and sisters loving each other as themselves; if prayer is desire, if what we desire, we will; and what we will, we do.

If by the closet, the Saviour meant the heart; and by the door, the mouth, heart-felt silent prayer would be the result; then we should enter our hearts, and shut our mouths. If we pray, "Our Father and Mother, God, who art in Heaven, thy Kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is done in Heaven," how great the thought! how often it is lightly considered and conveniently passed over. Query upon query crowds upon the mind: Are there "in Heaven" manufactories of fire-arms and all the implements and horrid machinery of war, demonism incarnate? Are there arsenals, wherein to store them? Do they manufacture powder? and have they magazines for the storage of the same? Have they military academies "in heaven," where all the latest and most improved styles, plans, and tactics of popular murder are taught? Are there colleges for a privileged few to be educated and fitly prepared as hireling priests to bear the testimony of Jesus, enjoining his disciples to love each other, and to lives of virgin purity and spotless innocence as was his own? Do they have distilleries there, to produce "the ardent" with all its varied "compounds?" Is there smoking in heaven, among the saints, and angels, seraphs, and spirits of just men and women made perfect?

Do the shining hosts worship and chew, expectorate and sing psalms together? Do they raise the filthy swine, free-soilers, to roam at large and root up the golden pavements, or to spoil the rich verdure of those "pastures ever green," that the saints may be enriched by the sale of their dead carcasses? It is said that they neither marry nor are given in marriage in heaven, and that the rich do not there oppress the poor! This may be called an external view of heaven; but what, or where is the external, that has not its origin with the internal? The pharisee said: "Go, and be thou clothed, fed, and comforted;" but that prayer did not exist in his heart; neither did it manifest itself in any outward act. Again, we are enjoined to pray: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." How is this prayer practically carried out in this our Christian(?) country? Is there not far more of the eye for an eye, and tooth for a tooth system exercised, than that of turning the other cheek when one is smitten; or, of rendering good for evil in our every day practice—which?

Recurring to the invocation, "When thou prayest," etc., we may remark, that every person, having had experience as a Christian, knows that there are "times and seasons" when the soul feels especially drawn out in prayer—when terrestrial things become matters insignificant, and unworthy of a place in the heart's affections—when, lost to things of time, the troubled soul finds rest in prayer, and that solace which thoughts of God alone can give. Sweet and precious are those blissful seasons, when in the closet of the heart we can breathe forth the gushings of a sorrow-stricken spirit. And very pleasant are the seasons set apart for our assembling together in prayer, blending and commingling our spirits in our united capacities. How comforting then, to be baptized by the divine unction, and to have our united body magnetized, so to speak, by the electric current as it flows from the divine fountain, and unites us soul to soul.

Father, Mother—God—grant us more of this blessed spirit—the power and essence of prayer—that we may know and do thy holy will as it is done in Heaven!

E. E. F., Wv., O.

Maxims.

A knowledge of our own weakness creates in us, charity for others.

The imperfections we see and despise in others, we sometimes possess ourselves.

A Christian will never despise the poor, unfortunate, nor fallen; but will strive to reclaim them by their love of God.

We may despise sin, but not the sinner.

The most powerful lens is a humble spirit; it enables us to see ourselves.

Make thy heart an abode for angels, not a reservoir for sin.

What we gain by our own exertions we value; while gifts bestowed are frequently squandered.

E. F. II.

This whole life is but one great school, from the cradle to the grave. We are all scholars; the voices of those we love, the wisdom of past ages, and our own experience are our teachers. Afflictions give us discipline; the spirits of departed saints whisper to us, "come up higher."

M. P.

Humility—No. 1.

Every virtue has its foundation in the truth and reason of things; and Humility, with all other graces, must rest on this immutable basis.

A certain divine being asked which was the most excellent of the Christian graces, answered "Humility." Being further interrogated which was the next, again replied "Humility;" and being a third time pressed with the question, still answered "Humility." Intending thus to intimate that humility must be the constant temper and mental condition of the Christian; and that without it, all other graces are incomplete.

Humility arises from a true sense of our own condition and the real relation we stand in to God and our fellow beings; and as it admits of no assumptions of excellence we do not possess, neither does it consist in any degradation of ourselves below what is strictly true.

All degradation below what is real and sincere, is mere mock-humility. It is pride in disguise desiring to be considered a paragon of that lowly virtue of which it is destitute.

In vain shall we search the scriptures for one self-degrading expression that Jesus ever made, though he declared himself to be meek and lowly in heart; his humility arose from the perception and acknowledgment of the great truth, that of himself he could do nothing.

It has been thought by some, that humility arises from a proper sense and acknowledgment of our sins; but this cannot be true, since the most glorious and perfect natures are always the most humble.

Jesus, though the most perfect of men, was the most humble, and his humility arose from a clear perception of his entire dependence upon God, and a cheerful submission to the divine will.

If humility be predicated on a sinful state, then can this divine virtue have no place in the hearts of the just; the saints must be destitute of it; it can have no place in heaven.

If humility be an immortal virtue, and of perpetual obligation, based on the entire dependence of all created intelligences on their Creator, then may saints and the highest archangels will be humble, and eternally so.

All aping of simplicity or pretensions to a childish state, which it is impossible we should really possess, is so far either from simplicity or humility, that it is downright duplicity.

To perceive the propriety of humility in the intellect without desiring it in the heart, is like mentally perceiving the necessity of food without having an appetite for it.

By boasting of our deserts we intrench upon our humility.

The being unjustly disgraced is not exactly humiliated, but it may assist us to be humble.

Seeing it is our duty to do all the good we can, we cannot merit praise; we have but done our duty. Praise belongs to God.

How foolish is pride! How vain is ambition! How absurd for nothings to contend which shall be the greatest!

Praise may do for children, and all who seek it may be counted such. Men know that it neither belongs to them nor becomes them.

Men may condemn and condemn, but he that has a pure conscience will not be disturbed, unless he be still under the influence of that vile affection which cannot be satisfied with "the honor that cometh from God only," but earnestly craves the honor of mortal worms like himself.

In proportion as any one is dead to self, and to the desire of the honors of men, in the same proportion is he regardless of the unjust censures of mortals.

He that is greatly disturbed at the reproaches of men, will, if he examine deeply into his own heart, find that he is either more or less obnoxious to censure, or too much alive to self, and eagerly coveting the applause of creatures, rather than the approbation of God, in his own conscience.

Seek no greatness but to be great in thy conceptions and love of the one only Infinite and Eternal Good.

It is a greater blessing to be censured when innocent than to be praised when undeserving.

You say you was equally faithful with your brother, yet he was praised, while you was neglected. Be thankful it was so. You desire to be humble. Praise might puff you up. How happy was your escape!

What have you to complain of? Did you act from a sense of duty and to please God? If so, your consciousness of having done your duty is a sufficient reward. If you are not satisfied with that, you may detect in yourself the sordid motive of working for human applause.

If you act from the base motive of obtaining the praise of men, disappointment is the best thing that could befall you. "How can you believe, who receive honor one of another?"

All the blessings I enjoy flow from the all-bountiful giver of every good, unmerited by me. This must be so, unless I can make it appear that my talents are self-created—self-derived, and not the gift of God the Creator.

Of what can I boast? What can I claim for my services? When I have done all that is commanded, what can I say, but that I am an unprofitable servant? I have only occupied the talents that were given me.

How fond we are of fame, and yet what is it? A mere modification of air, so articulated as to inflate us with the notion that we are, what we are not.

A good character is not merely a good name in the mouths of others, but a good nature in ourselves.

He that has the peace of God in his soul cannot be rendered unhappy, though all men call him a demon; but he that is unreconciled in heart will be wretched, though all men call him a saint. R. W. P., U. V., Ohio.

There is all that is noble in living a life of self-denial—denying to ourselves affections of wrong; and all that is lovely in the cultivation of something better—the beautiful, the good.

Hard-feelings are the elements of worldly hatred. Worldly hatred derives its origin, often, from a wrong committed by those who hate, towards the object of their hatred.

That which we love best, will form the subject of our happiest thoughts; we will give it the preference of all other themes in our conversation; it will have the largest influence in forming our resolutions, and of putting them into execution.

Plain Talks—No. 3.

Evading the Cross.

As Christian people, we should be as far from acting falsehoods, as believing them. As followers of the Christ Spirit, we should not be guided so readily by the interpretations of apostolic teachings, as by the lives of Jesus, and those true Apostles, who lived as did their master. Life is the exponent of an individual's creed, no matter what peculiarity is noticeable in his prayer. The world at large hate self-denial; they know that Jesus practiced this exceedingly; therefore the teachings of the Apostles are studiously canvassed, not to evidence the necessity of a full cross, but how individuals may shun the cross, and yet maintain their Christian fellowship! It is noticeable to every reader of Scripture, that the popular Christianity of to-day will bear little or no comparison to the life of Jesus; that there is no unchristian practice, but finds its apologists in some of the popular pulpits.

First, look at marriage: a sacred institution, so-called; but what a breach it immediately causes, between the life of the goodly exemplar, and him who professes loyalty, but who departs thus from Christian practice. How can Christians follow, where Jesus did not go? Had Jesus married a wife, reared up a family, gained to himself a property, and maintained these at the expense of his neighbors, then would the popular Christians of to-day be his genuine followers!

Take war: where was there a popular pulpit, but took sides with the combatants in our late war, and justified it, on one side or the other; yet where, in our Exemplar's life, did they get their authority? Had Jesus been a warrior; had he led hosts on to battle and been successful as a wholesale butcher of humanity, then no fault could be found with popular Christians, nor their pastors, for following these in the life of Jesus. But who can wonder that lust is rampant; that war is respectable; that private property is endeared, when the people, generally, eager to evade the crucifixion of their unchristian loves, will spend millions of dollars in educating ministers to interpret to them what Scripture does not mean? to hide the beautiful, self-denying life of Christ behind an ambush of unmeaning words, and secure to them the license of living the very reverse of him whose honorable name they prostitute?

The light of the Spirit is making these things plain to the hitherto hoodwinked and blindly led, but would-be honest followers; and this light will increase until he who dares preach any evasion of the cross that Jesus practiced, will blush all over at his hypocrisy, and sleeplessly lament his heaven-daring attitude. We honor the Romans for demanding of their teachers, that they shall represent one prominent feature of our Lord's life—Virginity; while we claim that no cross that Jesus applied to himself, can be evaded by clergy or laity without a denial of the profession of Christianity. "Follow me," said Jesus.

We bear witness to the progress of the age. Once, and not many years ago, we would have been as our spiritual relatives were, imprisoned, impaled, crucified and burned, for utterances not so plain, yet only as true.

Communication.

Editor of The Shaker:

While numberless charges are being made against the Shakers, because of their depopulative life, I propose to own up to these charges, and include Jesus as one of our number who pleads guilty to the same.

Speaking of the natural order, Jesus said: "They twain shall be one flesh," and only flesh; and his apostle says, "nevertheless, if they marry, they will fight!" (1 Cor. 7:28) and the relations of marriage furnish abundant corroboration to-day. The life of Christ puts an end to generations; whose practices under the ordinance of marriage of the flesh, knows nothing of Christ's Spirit, and such would do well to look after their laurels as Jews; for they are not Christians, and if they are not Jews, then are they willing to own up to the charge of "carnal Corinthians?" Man is a progressive being, capable of ascension above the culminating point of animal nature—a superior state into which he may enter while yet upon the earth—"thy will be done on earth, as 'tis in heaven." Is this a romance? Man was made in the image of God; we propose, by leaving the animal works of generation, living temperately in that which sustains life as Jesus did, to rise with him, above the image into a oneness with the Father. The mission of Jesus was to awaken us to a knowledge of our spiritual natures, apart, and superior to our earthly beings; to our earthly, generative lives—and the spirit of Christ wars against every feature of the flesh; not merely brings it to temperance, but puts it to death; and thus he run the world out in himself—"I have overcome (destroyed) the world." Jesus was called "the harvest man;" what was he to reap, but human souls from earthly conditions, and present to them a spiritual life?

In man's haste to fulfill the great command, he does not stop to read of the work of subduing attached thereto; showing, that as a natural, earthly being, there should be a check to the extravagant abuses of his animal desires. But is man "fruitful?" We deny the assertion. We positively state that "the unfruitful works of darkness" is the rule; and instead of fruit, worthy of the handiwork of God, we witness a bundle of perversions, disease and death, that moans from the cradle to the grave! If being "fruitful" implies the works of the flesh according to perverted desires, regardless of moral law, setting at nought times and seasons, quantity and quality, then humanity stands acquitted—hold, we err in the remark—there are multitudes of professedly Christian people, according to John Todd, and "Satan in Society," who will not be fruitful in anything but spasmodic lusts—but, dear Editor, I do not mean to rob you of your "Plain Talks." Mankind generally claim the right to use the command of God for the peopling of the earth, for the most debasing indulgences—such as would cut the brutes off from the face of the earth; and is fast "running the world out!" Why the dominion of man over woman? I tell you, kind Editor, it is to crush in the bud, the voice that would speak in the Councils of the nation, deciding how far and how long woman shall be a common prostitute! Whoever will keep the laws of nature strictly in his generations, will be more wonderstruck at his surroundings, and of the threatened "end of the world," than any now are at the lives the Shakers are living. Now, provided the Shakers took no higher ground than to operate as a balance to the populative principle, would this not be an exemplary improvement upon the embryotic murders; the infantile deaths; inherited and acquired diseases; wars, or wholesale murders; legions of suicidal practices, that spring from the unfruitful works, and which strew along the road allotted to life, myriads of human wrecks? Bury the victim of self-murder at the cross-roads as of yore, and you would multiply Greenwoods and Auburns incalculably; and truthful tombstones would declare: "Died under the age of twenty, a victim to the violation of physiological law!" There is no extravagance in saying that the sins of our first parents, compared with those of to-day, are as ant-heaps to Andes! Let there be no misunderstanding: The Shakers are running the world out—the world of sin; and they are as a testimony of salt to the generating animals of the earthly order, predicting a running out of the world's inhabitants, numerically, if they continue in the unfruitful practices of the present day.

Let him who is perfectly fulfilling the Mosaic injunctions in his generations, ask: "What lack I yet?" and the answer will be returned from the Christ heavens:—"You have learned the song of Moses, now learn the divine life-song of the Lamb!" and the result will be, a flight upward, from earthly practices into Angelic livelihood; and there, a similar order of life is in vogue, that the Shakers are seen to practice. The natural man willingly gives up the earthly for the heavenly; the lusts of the animal, for the loves and joys of the heavenly host. The earth, losing its attraction for him, his aspirations and polarity will be toward heaven; and then, if he have any regrets, it will be that he did not put an end to the world, flesh and devil sooner, and ere then have lived, as well as professed the Christian!

E. MYRICK.

A living people will have a live religion; this religion will resurrect them into life eternal; life eternal is a condition that is obtained by denial unto ourselves of practices we know the Angels of God do not, would not engage in.

How can we better make "living sacrifices unto God," than by so living, that evil in its every form is sacrificed, and the pure and lovely only, shine forth in their Christian splendor? Humanity are getting thoroughly awake to the fact, that much that has been considered pleasure, is illegal for Christians to practice; is corroding and corrupting to both body and soul.

The name Christian signifies a follower of Christ. "Who would be my disciple, must do as I do." We will have no controversy with any; but while we ask none to be Shakers, we ask them, for their eternal welfare, to live like him whom they profess to adore.

"Only introduce marriage into your institution, and we will become Shakers immediately," is the most common of observations. "Come down from that cross and all men will believe on you," was remarked some time ago.

"Do the Shakers want accessions?" However this may be, we do not, nor ever will want accessions badly enough to recede from any principle in life, maintained by our great exemplar—Christ.

Should we admit any, who would not confess and depart their sins—then there would be a humiliating spectacle—the Shakers joining the world.

Answers to Correspondents.

Editor of The Shaker:

"Some things I would like to know. Do you have revelations from the spirit world, as of old, or at all? and, if not, what is the cause?"

"Second: What do you think is to be the ultimate of the orthodox churches? Will they grow to a spiritual life? or will they 'wax worse and worse?'"

"Please answer through 'The Shaker.'"

"E. F. CURTIS."

Answer.

We have just such kind of communications as we desire and labor for, whether rapping, table-tipping, moving of matter, or the deepest spiritual inspiration.

Second: The ultimate of the orthodox churches will be,—a part will remain in their dead materialism; retrograde into infidelity to their orthodox theologies; or will settle down in pantheistic atheism. A large part will progress into Spiritualism; and the coming conflict will be between these two classes—materialists and spiritualists. The latter will ultimately prevail, progressing out of the rudimental—the generative—into the Angel order, in this life, keeping the higher law of celibacy.

POETICAL.

The Backsliding Christian.

TO THE RESCUE.

Unbidden views before mine eyes appear,
Of wasting dignity, and shameless fear;
My vision pains, with slinking vital fires,
And quailing firmness that strong hope inspires.
My throbbing heart is chilled, I've pallid cheek,
My nerves the influence catch, and seem all weak;
My bosom heaves convulsively, to find
A cowering courage and demented mind.

Integrity seems palsied by the woeful shock
Offaith's abettor, stranded on a rock;
Those patriotic fires that steel the brow,
Seem faintly burning, or but smouldering now;
And resolution, ousted from her fortress goal,
Leaves her shorn Sampson, a Delilah's fool;
Bereft of strength and blinded by the foe,
The pillars of the temple now, are razed low.

The temple lost, no living sacrifice
Is now presented, and no incense rise;
No altar consecrated to the sacred vow—
No service dedicated to the God of Heaven now.
And love to God, that searching, heavenly flame,
Seems evanescent, cool, or meanly tame,
The doors of inspiration snugly shut and barred,
The soul, a famished visage, deeply marred!

Now, low ambition's regnant in the soul,
Fan and refresh the devastating coals;
And worldly flames the holy life destroy;
And lust of pelf, the meaner powers deploy;
Ignoble motives steal the halcyon hours,
And rob the soul of her angelic powers;
And now, degraded by the world's pursuit,
She doffs the Angel form, and dons the brute.

And, wretched outcast from the tree of life,
Divorced from God, man seeks a sensual life;
And now to pleasure gives the wasting strength
'Till ruin summons him as her's, at length;
Oh, horrid destiny! replete with woe,
A Heaven lost and earthly blessings too,
Life spent, the naked, wretched, beastly man
Of ruin's army, leads the horrid van!

In this most woeful state of fell despair,
Time, and its treasures vanish into air;
The soul is warned eternity to meet,
And there, in judgment, read life's soiled sheet;
Then, oh, the anguish pouring on the soul,
Whom sin hath crippled, and whose life controlled—
In judgment lone, she meets the direful lot,
"Depart, ye cursed, for I know you not!"

No sophists here, the dread decree may thwart;
No analeptic give, to ease the smart;
Who, on the rock, might there been broken found,
Lies now beneath it, and "to powder ground!"
Now, what availeth infidel belief?
Now, what philosopher can give relief?
Now, where the charm in worldly pleasures' dye,
To woo the soul and captivate its eye?

Dread moment! Lord, be merciful, we pray!
And may e'en justice, now, thy love display—
And, when by sufferings all the debt is paid,
Lord, grant the famished soul some heavenly aid—
O gather home, this desolated flock,
And give them water, from thy living rock;
And when, by judgment's fires, they're pure and free,
Some Angel send, and gather them to thee.

Not for thy honor, but, for mercy's weal,
Impart thy love, these bruised reeds to heal;
And though of glory, they're entire bereft,
For Heaven's sake, O let not one be left
To chill the nerves of heavenly minstrelsy
Or blight the record of humanity!
A ransom give to all this babel throng—
So shall our love, our thanks, and praise, to thee be—
G. B. A., Mt. L.

Sweet Innocence.

Sweet Innocence, of beauty rare!
What virtue can with thee compare!
Who can behold thy glory bright,
And not embrace thee with delight?
O blessed virtue—richest grace!
How brilliant shines thy lovely face!
O could vain mortals know thy worth,
And seek thee, in the days of youth.

Through every stage of human life,
Thou canst appear for man's relief,
And greatly wilt thou beautify
The soul, that dost on thee rely.
We view thee oft in infant state,
In child-hood—and, on youth to wait,—
But, as wild nature bears the sway
We see thee drawing far away.

Too oft, in social life, we find
A stranger thou, to youthful mind;
And as in years they ripen grow,
Thy kind address they scarcely know.
Oh, sad mistake! Oh, blinded youth!
How little dost thou sense the worth
Of this most precious gift of heaven,
Which, to the child of grace is given.

No ornament of nature's birth
Can e'er compare with thee, in worth:
And where thou gainest full control,
Thy glory bright will crown the whole.
In thee, all other virtues bloom,
Diffusing round their rich perfume,
Which intermingle with thy own,
As in a child of grace is shown.

Oh Innocence! Thou sweetest charm;—
Thou canst the cruel tyrant calm!—
The proud, the haughty, and the wild
Must bow to thee, thou lovely child:
Yea, monarchs, kings and princes, all
Must reverence thee—before thee, fall;—
And, as thy Christ-like hand is sought,
All worldly charms are brought to naught.

Tattling.

Like thistle seeds, as light as air,
And floats upon the atmosphere
And plants its noxious presence, where
The choicest fruits are growing;
Just so the idle tattler's tongue,
Doth work its impious way among
The pleasant walks of old and young,
And vilest seeds are sowing.

The man who has no higher aim,
Than that which satisfies the beast,
Must, as a man, be very tame,
And pitiable, to say the least.

Virtue and Truth are the beauties of youth,
While malice and rage are disgraceful to age.

Shakerism and Spiritualism in their Moral Aspects.

All religions that have attained great proportions, if perhaps we except the Confucian system of China, have had their original base in some sort of spiritual manifestations. Both profane and ecclesiastical history sustain us in this position.

Believers have had experiences relating to Spiritualism extending over more than a century; for our visible founder, Mother Ann Lec, was a visionist, and wonderfully endowed with spiritual gifts.

Studying the histories of nations and religions, it becomes clear to us, that communicating spirits were, in the past, as in the present, good and bad, orderly, disorderly, and even demoniac. This with us has been a matter of prayerful consideration. As a body of people, we have never exercised these gifts for idle curiosity or worldly gain. Spirits, entrancing, or otherwise controlling certain of our brethren and sisters, in several of our Societies, many years before the famous Rochester disturbances, distinctly informed us that the spiritual manifestations which we had enjoyed (during a period of seven years), would go out into the world, even to the outer court of the Temple of Humanity! These heavenly intelligences further prophesied what the result of this wide-spread, promiscuous spirit-intercourse in the world would be; and these prophecies are being continually verified.

Under the providence of God, by the law of cycles, prophecy is allied to cause and effect. And having, for several years, been anxiously expecting the breaking-out of those spiritual manifestations, we, upon the first hearing of the Rochester rappings, appointed a committee to visit the Fox girls in New York city, paying our dollar a-piece for admission. This committee at once recognized the presence of spirits, and believed it to be the prelude to extensive manifestations of different kinds, and so reported upon their return. Subsequently, we witnessed the astounding manifestations then occurring in the family of Dr. Phelps. In brief, for the last twenty years and more, we have seen very much of these manifestations in the outer court; have been attentive readers of the spiritualistic journals and books; and were visited by the late Secretary Stanton, Dr. Grey and Judge Edmonds, of New York, and many others of the most distinguished spiritualists in the country. Therefore, when we read of spiritualists failing to organize—of their disintegrating elements and tendencies, and their frequent descent into the “snare of the pit,” we are in no way surprised, knowing that there will yet be greater and more fiery discussions in the camp; and many ambitions will meet with a worse than a Sedan defeat. The angels are separating the “chaff from the wheat.” The three unclean, amphibious spirits (“like frogs”) which issued from the mouths of the three great powers—Paganism, Catholicism, and Protestantism—are already in the land. Selfish, disorderly Spiritualism is the parent of Free-loveism, of inordinate, unclean affections and carnal relations, under the instigation of demons—“spirits of devils.” Comparatively, few spiritualists seem to understand the situation; some, however, are seeking a higher plane, and a more religious life; and quite unknown to themselves, are affiliating with the purer principles and practices which characterize our Shaker Communities.

In a late anniversary address, delivered in New York, on the 31st of March, by Judge Edmonds, we find this significant paragraph:

“From us, the physical manifestations which once so powerfully excited our wonder have almost entirely departed. Their office was to establish the reality of a spiritual life, and the fact of communion with it. That office with us has been performed. That work is done; and henceforth the appeal is not to our senses, but to our intellects and our hearts; to the reason which God has given us, and to the spirit of devotion—at once the attribute and the badge of our immortality—which He has implanted in us.

“Our duty is plain and simple. It is to receive, to digest, and to comprehend the revelations which are proffered to us of the existence and the actualities of the future life; to receive and realize the great principles which are to fit us for that life, and which can make it to us a source of happiness, or otherwise.”

That Spiritualism as an organic movement is making no progress, but rather declining, is as evident to Spiritualists as to ourselves. There are various reasons for this: In the majority of places the management of spiritualistic institutions (Spiritualists themselves being authority), is in the hands of self-seekers; and Spiritualism has fallen into questionable company. Pretension, noise, and confusion, are the stars in the ascendancy. As the tree is known by its fruit, may we ask what these twenty-three years of Spiritualism have done for the world? Has it discovered a single new truth capable of demonstration as such? Has it initiated and carried out any new reform movement? Have mediums excelled all others in the purity of their lives? Have rich Spiritualists built homes for orphans, retreats for the aged, asylums for the deaf, dumb, and blind; and Bethels for the destitute? Has their morality, generally, excelled that of their neighbors who profess the various sectarian religions?

That “free-love” passion prevails extensively among mediums is proven often by the testimony of mediums themselves. Go to New York, Boston, Chicago—any of the cities—and ask the leading Spiritualists to give you, according to their best knowledge and belief, the moral standing, as regards purity, chastity, and celibacy, of the mediums in their immediate vicinity. Are they truthful, temperate, and chaste? is the first inquiry of the good man and the philanthropist. What is the moral influence of Spiritualism—how does it affect character? how have controlling spirits affected the mediums long under their influence? These are practical inquiries.

Believers have but little sympathy with many of the doctrines published in the spiritualistic papers. They are sometimes unreasonable, and often untrue, besides being expressed in a manner coarse, dogmatic, and irreligious; some are glaringly atheistic. The editor of the “Religio Philosophical Journal,” a spiritualistic weekly, printed in Chicago, in writing up his “Search after God,” flatly denies the existence of any Supreme Being. These are his words:

“*Man, and not God, was connected with the organization of matter into worlds and systems of worlds. A large portion of mankind attributes the creation of this earth and the other planets to an infinite, omniscient, omnipotent, God. They have no foundation whatever upon which to predicate such a supposition. * * * What! Man make a planet; launch into the regions of space a comet; or organize a system of worlds for the unfoldment of other races of human beings? Yes; we say, emphatically, Yes, and care not a straw for the denial of others. Worlds and systems of worlds bow to the nod of man. Point me to anything in Nature that was made by God. Individualized man is the moving cause of creation. Do we declare that man conceived, made, and launched the earth into the regions of space? Most assuredly we do. We propose to prove that an infinite God is an impossibility. All the Gods we have found, are myths. No omnipresent God made this earth.*”

“Man make a planet! Yes—we say emphatically, Yes,” writes this editor. As it is generally admitted that the heathen gods were once athletic men, we wonder that the writer, considering how fearfully the world is given to “wine and women,” did not tell us that this planet was created by Bacchus, the drunken, free-love hero of antiquity. Such verbose dogmatism, and arrant atheism, as make up the warp of these wordy articles is deplorable. These atheistic Spiritualists would do well to remember that Plato, Socrates, Jesus, Kepler, Newton, Locke,

Accounting for the creation of man the R. P. Journal of May 22, 1869, says:

“Within man is the action of Nature's forces. In nature there are sixty-eight primal elements—thirty-four positive, and thirty-four negative; or thirty-four female, and thirty-four male, which, after courting for millions of years in the mammoth, in fishes, in reptiles, and various other animals, were brought together in harmonious action or were wedded together, and the result was ‘man.’”

This explanation disposes of not only all Bible accounts, but also Darwin's “Origin of Species.” Sixty-eight male and female elements “courting” a few millions of years in the stomachs of “mammoths” and slimy “reptiles,” were finally “wedded,” and “man” was.

Hereafter, let all scientists hold their peace.

Not mentioning the doctrine of “Whatever is, is Right,” so common among Spiritualists, many of the teachings which appear in their journals, are positively demoralizing, giving those so inclined a plausible pretext for indulging in sensualism and all kinds of Free-love gratifications. In the copy of February 20, 1869, of the above-named journal, the editor teaches, that “Virtue, serene and happy, one of God's most beautiful flowers, blushes when she hears her Father traduced and vilified; and though her eyes are brilliant, and her countenance all aglow with innocence, she has sense enough to know that Vice, traduced, vilified, scorned, looked at with supreme contempt, spat upon, is her sister, and she loves her, recognizing that she, too, is a jewel in that beautiful casket which God himself created. She does not scorn her—no, she would not—she dare not. She loves her. Pure affection, unsullied innocence, a part of the GREAT I AM, loving her sister, Vice. Strange, bewildering conclusion! Within, without, all around, we feel the presence of angelic influence. Virtue, pure, angelic, noble; Vice, diseased, unclean, and repulsive—they meet and caress; they love each other. * * * Virtue is one condition; Vice another; both equally commendable in the sight of God, when he considers the cause that created both respectively; yet one not as lovely or beautiful as the other. * * * In licentiousness we find an outcropping of the God element in man, not for the gratification of that element. Oh, no! but for the purpose thereby of inducing certain conditions that would place it in harmonious relations. Scout the idea as you may; deem it absurd, if you wish; say, ‘Fanaticism run wild,’ if you choose; still the God element in man will constantly work for conditions suitable for its nature, whether in the field of Virtue or Vice.”

The term “God element” plainly implies Materialism; hence it would be more proper to term the “Harmonial Philosophy” the Material Philosophy; but what is the tendency of this spiritualistic teaching, that “Virtue is the sister of Vice?” that Virtue and Vice meet and caress? that they love each other? and are “both equally commendable in the sight of God?” and, further, that “licentiousness is an outcropping of the God element in man?”

Saying nothing of the celibacy of Believers, who "stand on Mount Zion." in the Resurrection life, it seems strange to us, that clean people anywhere can encourage such teaching; and stranger, that the "Banner of Light" could endorse and extravagantly praise this R. P. Journal, and personally laud the editor.

The following occurs in the R. P. Journal of March 6, 1869:

"In the inebriate, in the licentious, the essence of the 'God is love,' glistens beautifully, though only seen by angels' eyes; and the day is not far distant when its rough exterior shall be washed away, and its heavenly brilliance will be visible even to our eyes. Man does not stand in the relation of a subject to God; but as a part and parcel of him; owing no allegiance but to the God element of his nature, and worshipping no God except by obeying the promptings within."

In the paragraph quoted above this, the editor tells us, that "We find an out-cropping of the God element in the licentious;" and, in this last paragraph, he assures us that "Man owes no allegiance but to the God element of his nature." We have only to say, that we hope this class of Spiritualists practises better than these journals preach.

As a body of Believers, seeking to live as Jesus lived, by dying to the earthly, that we may live the heavenly life, we make but little pretension to mere literary or scientific accuracy; but, be it far from us to ever publish, as original, such matter as is contained in the above-quoted paragraphs.

With this kind of Spiritualism, Believers cannot have the least fellowship. It is from beneath, "earthly and sensual:" the life lived is the test.

Some Spiritualists, however, are among the excellent of the earth; they are not far from the kingdom of heaven—not far from becoming Shakers, though calling themselves Spiritualists. We speak of the masses of Spiritualists, and ask, in all sincerity and humility, if their lives are as pure and godly as those of Believers; or even as pure and orderly as those of Swedenborgians and Unitarians? Does not irreligion and a scoffing spirit prevail extensively among the devotees of Spiritualism? "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit."

In our view, then, Spiritualism is one of the elements of Babylon—Christendom; and belongs to the image of the beast—Protestantism. It is the "Angel of Light" re-establishing the communication between this earth and the general spirit world; which, for reasons set forth in previous articles, the early Protestants, as a matter of protection, had broken off.

The Shaker Order, standing in the name, i. e., character, of Jesus and Ann, on the foundation of spiritual celibacy, has power with God to govern all spiritual manifestations, and to incorporate Spiritualism as one of its elements, assigning it its proper place—the Church of God in its day of manifestation; and to its right use—the saving of human beings from causes of unhappiness, and leading them to a joyful recognition of, and baptism into, all Scientific, Moral, and Spiritual Truth.

God, My Father and Mother.

The perversion of the social organism in humanity, renders it a difficult task for any to form complete ideas of the social relations in the heavenly world. Physical reproduction, even in its most exalted conditions, now forms only a very imperfect type of the heavenly reality, wherein souls are begotten and born into Godliness; and to feel the truth that "we must be born again," evidences the process of the true resurrection. Our earthly affections are strong; but these are gross when compared with the felicity of that harmony in which Angels dwell. That God is our Father and Mother, is a truth advancing upon, and supplanting much ancient theology. Thoughts that the social relation is maintained in the heavens, leads us to feel that there is nought on the earth, but would be a vulgar expression of God's paternal and maternal solicitude. Man was imperfect when existing in nature without his helpmeet, woman; for only a part of Deity was represented. As in the physical world, so in the spiritual heavens and earth; the Godhead must be fully represented—male and female—angelic man and woman..

Yet, there is a peculiar philosophy in many existing theologies that recognizes God only as Father, and then, blindly trusts Omnipotence, to balance the incongruity of a home without a Mother, as well it may! Here we have the reason of female misrepresentation in the nations; and the denial of her individual rights, other than being subordinate to whatever desires prompted her lord, master, husband. The knowledge that woman is represented in Deity, will yet place her in the true position upon the earth, in the natural family; even as she enjoys it now, with those who have chosen to live on earth as the Angels do in heaven. When man was formed, his model was in the heavens; as really so was woman's; "let us make man in our image," and male and female were the results. And now, were not "the invisible things of God, clearly seen by the things that are made, even the eternal power and Godhead," still we feel the heavenly influences of a Mother's love descending from the throne of Deity, while the wise counsels of the Father are ever attendant upon those who "seek that wisdom that cometh from above." CHAUNCY. (Shakers, N. Y.)

As the cause of dishonor is often very small, while the effect is beyond expression; therefore be guarded in little things; even in conversation we might drop words that are unwise. We seldom repent of saying too little. "'Tis the little foxes that destroy the vines."

Wherefore, professedly Christian friends, are there rich members and poor members of any Church—Brethren and Sisters (!) and yet sharing so unequally? Poor Christianity!

Life in God—No. 2.

In the innumerable objects which meet our senses, the best exponent, or representative of the Supreme Being, is THE SUN. It is a ruling physical power, around which other bodies of less magnitude circulate and congregate; seemingly dependent on him, for their periods and places in the heavens.

Without the permeating influence of light and heat, human beings and the lower orders of creation could not exist; and they are equally dependent on the same source for the vegetable products on which they subsist.

Thus on the sun there is a necessary dependence for life, and the continuance of being for animal and vegetable life, whether in the atmosphere, water, or on the earth.

Taken as a whole, as far as our observation extends, there is a perfect adaptation between the Sun, and the beings and products of earth.

In the structure of the human organization, how wonderful and beautiful are the adaptation of light to the structure of the eye—the most marvelous piece of mechanism—through which, man is made acquainted with the surrounding concomitants of earth; the sun itself; the solar system; and lastly, with its companions of the universe. Continuing the concatenation, by induction, we are carried through the universe, the workshop of the Great Workman, to the Supreme Architect. For, there can be no design without a designer, whose wonderful intelligence and creative power have planned, and put into successful operation, these astonishing combinations of mind and matter! For there can be no design or adaptation, for specific purposes, without intelligence.

Nothing in vain: A complete whole!

Having taken a superficial glance at the wonders, let us take a more specific view of the astonishing connection between the sun and the human organ of light: The rays of light coming in straight lines pass into the eye, after coming many millions of miles, through a transparent medium; bringing with them the sun himself, together with his innumerable blessings! For, whether the sun accompanies the rays of light and heat, or remains in his place, in the center of the solar system, the effect comes down to us in his majesty; and the influences and grand design are accomplished!

We see the sun, feel his genial influence, and know that he is present with us, giving and sustaining life, in his deputed agency!

But of the eye, how admirable, beautiful and efficient the contrivance; a living mirror to admit the creation of God!

The images of surrounding objects come with imperceptible speed, in the pencils of light, which far surpass electricity!

Yet, we know the goods have come, for they are safely stored in the warehouse of the human mind; but without the discriminating influence, at the entrance of the port, in the form of a lens, all the merchandise brought to us, would be stored in utter confusion! We should be unable to distinguish the moon from a star, a man from a horse, etc.; but this lens makes every object show itself, and pay duty before passing into the warehouse of the human sensorium.

But to speak more scientifically: the lens has the power of separating the colors by refraction, leaving only enough to represent the animal or tree, and reflecting these colors on the animal or tree, so as to make it specific, and give identity; then the object passes upon the optic nerve, or retina—the white black-board—and there is a positive horse, and oak tree, to the human understanding. We recognize these objects, but are utterly unable to see the hand, brush, or pallet impainting the wonders of nature!

We may now consider the office and structure of the organ of hearing, or, rather, make a guess at the miraculous performances connected with the human ear!

Passing in, by the orifice of the ear, we find at the end a thin, clear membrane, in the shape of a watch crystal, and looking like one, with the round to the portal; under it there is a nerve called the auditory nerve; it is about the size of a babe's little finger, reaching out of the brain, and nearly touching the crystal drum; sound presses the drum down on the auditory nerve; the nerve conveys the impression to the brain, and the mysteries of thought are formed or elaborated in the human mind!

Between the ear and the surrounding atmosphere, there is an inseparable connection: like light, the atmosphere comes full freighted with innumerable objects in the form of sound, and passing in at the orifice of the ear, form in the mind all the complicated ideas of the living, outward world of want, pleasure or pain, and myriads of ideas, which can come in no other way at the time. The inspired Orator, in the dark, may pour into our souls a volume of sound, which will make every fibre in our bodies tremble like a leaf. After the blindness of St. Paul, he heard the sound of his Saviour's voice, which renovated his soul, and made him a new man! And the voice of Ananias gave him more pleasure, and heartfelt satisfaction, than all his previous knowledge: he had heard the voice; it was enough!

But of the marvelous and inscrutable contrivance, for the separation of sounds, so as to give the innumerable sensations of music their different chords and parts, we may not pretend to a discrimination; much less to give an idea of the intonations of the human voice in all the vicissitudes of changing life, infused into the tympanum, the nerve of sound in connection, and it again with the brain, and the brain with the mind, thought and intelligence.

The living voice of human beings, of beasts, birds and insects, all come to the human intelligence, on the undulations of the atmosphere, all riding on the wind into the human port, and knock for entrance, and the porter receives their cards or device, and reports to his Lord, as the case may be. But the question arises, how does the discrimination of the living auditory know each succeeding new-comer and his intentions?

The mysteries of feeling, tasting and smelling are equally inscrutable!

Now, let man pass into himself, by any of the senses, and tell his fellows how this complicated machinery operates to give man all his knowledge of physics, metaphysics; including the knowledge he has obtained or conceived of the Great Prototype, and his revelation to his children.

Is it possible that nonentity, or no cause, should be the cause of all these wonders! If we are to suppose, in the precincts of eternity, an epoch without mind or intelligence, it is to deny intelligence altogether.

Matter, whether created or eternal, is without intelligence; it can have no design; no organization; neither wisdom nor power inherent, for any rational creation.

"The fool saith there is no God." Men, who have denied the Eternal, and groping in worse than Egyptian darkness, talk to us of the first great principles coming into congruity, adaptation, and organization: But principles are nothing, only as they are the inherent emanations of a being of intelligence and design.

Computation, or the combination of numbers, cannot obtain without the mathematician; he combines numbers, and gives them their utility and powers, here in time. But where is the man of elementary and chaotic combinations, for the production of divine intelligence, and the wonders of the universe? Let him produce some of the wonder-working machinery, under the illuminations of his phosphorescent chandelier!

VERITAS.

Humility—No. 2.

Why art thou displeased with the censures of men, or elated with their praise? Thou art just what thou art; praise makes thee no better, nor can censure make thee worse.

Oh Flattery! base flattery! Thou art universally despised in word; but deep down in the hidden recesses of the heart, every one secretly cherisheth thee: Yea, thou art swallowed with avidity and goeth down like oil.

Strange that a worm should like to hear himself pronounced an Angel!

He that speaks degradingly of himself and of his performances is quite likely fishing for praise; and they that are wise will not catch at the bait.

There are many who are well pleased with offices and titles of distinction, but those who eschew them, do not wish to be thought incapable or unworthy.

However mean we may feel in ourselves, we do not like to have others think us so.

It is a great Christian attainment to become so dear to self, as to love to be contemned, and to rejoice when all men speak evil of us.

If thou hast an enemy, consider diligently his reproaches, and thou mayest be much instructed; he will search out thy faults more faithfully than many friends.

Thou livest very abstemiously and on coarse fare. Dost thou therefore think thou deservest extra reward? Verily such as thou hast is quite as good as thou deservest—should a dependent, a pauper, talk of compensation.

A very common motive for speaking of the demerits of others, is to set one's self forth to greater advantage. How selfish and contemptible!

Who so desires to be delivered from pride, must avoid every means of indulging it.

Antiochus Epiphanes boasting himself against God, and assuming to himself divine honors, was smitten with a noisome disease which terminated in his death. Before he expired, he was brought so far to his senses, as to exclaim: "It is meet to be subject to God; and man, who is mortal, should not think of himself proudly as if he were God."

O when shall I see the great and wonderful work of God on the earth? just as soon as thou canst apprehend that His work consists in little things.

Will nothing satisfy you but converting worlds? You shall be content to plait straws.

A wise man said, "An empty spirit God will fill." We cannot be filled with God till emptied of self; we cannot be emptied of self, till we deny self, and in deep humility and self-abnegation find a complete death to a selfish nature.

We need not be deceived and think self is dead when it is not; for as long as we can perceive within us an aspiring disposition, self-will, self-seeking or the least movement contrary to the will and order of God, we may be assured that self is yet alive. That which hath in it the power of motion undoubtedly hath life.

"The cup that my Father hath given me," said Jesus, "shall I not drink it?" Again he said to Pilate, "Thou couldst have no power at all against me, unless it had been given thee from above. Thus showing his full faith that his heavenly Father was the source of all power—the controller of all wants, and that he must humbly and patiently submit.

"Though Jesus was a son, yet learned he obedience by the things he suffered." Shall the servant be greater than his master? Nay, verily; yet every one that is perfect shall be as his master. O when shall I learn to rejoice in tribulation and to take joyfully every thing that goes to break up and destroy the kingdom of self within me, and make room for him to reign whose right it is!

The kingdom of self, is opposed to the kingdom of God; and His reign cannot be perfected within me till self is completely subjugated; let the word be given: "Joshua, arise and begin to contend with him in battle."

O that the true Joshua may arise in my soul and drive out the old inhabitants of the land, that the kingdom may be the Lord's.

If we truly desire humility we must at least abstain from all occasions of pride and ostentation.

Should a woman dress herself in all the trappings of fashion, and then go through divers bodily gestures to shake off pride, who would believe in her sincerity?

How inconsistent to dress in fine and costly apparel and then get on bended knees to pray for humility.

The ancients, when they desired to humble themselves, rent their garments, put on sack-cloth and sometimes strewed themselves with ashes.

Fine houses, costly equipage, and fine dress, all tend to destroy humility, exalt the sense, and bring the owners into unison of feeling with Nebuchadnezzar when in the pride of his heart he exclaimed: "Is not this Great Babylon that I have builded?"

O that I were wholly released from desiring the praise or dreading the dispraise of men; then I would be truly devoted to do the will of God.

By how much thou lovest the honor of men, by so much thou art the veriest slave; a slave to the most inexorable tyrant.

Because thou hast found the honor that cometh of men to be capricious, and not worth seeking, thou shouldst not therefore become reckless to virtuous actions, but shouldst the more diligently seek that honor which comes from God only. It would be unjust as well as unreasonable to forsake God and virtue on account of the faults and frailties of men.

So far as thou discoverest in thyself a feeling of disregard to the way of righteousness, when stung with the ingratitude and unjust censures of men, from whom thou hast expected esteem and approbation, so far thou mayest be certain that thy motives have been selfish and impure.

He that freely gives up all, that he may enjoy God alone, having nothing left that men desire or can take from him—nothing for which to contend—will have abundance of peace.

O Heavenly Father my soul is blessed! I feel satisfied with thy goodness! yet suffer me not to indulge in any self-complacency. I know that if I am full, it is out of thy fullness; if I am strong, it is in thy strength; if I am rich, it is in the enjoyment of thy bounty; of myself I continually tend to nothing. My strength is weakness; my fullness is but an efflux of vanity, and my riches but a store of diversified evils.

He that seeks to honor God in all he does, will be satisfied with an approving conscience though all men rise up against him and cast his name out as evil.

As diamonds, gold, and all the precious stones and metals, are the slow and gradual formations of nature in the most secret recesses of her retired operations; so the most glorious and excellent virtues are wrought by divine influence in the silent abstraction and stillness of the soul, while it shuts out the rude influences of all external things; and is wholly concealed from the curious gaze of "outward observation."

However deep and clear have been my own convictions at any time of my own degraded and sinful state, yet I have never ceased to implore for myself the mercy of God; and shall I censure and be inexorable to the faults of others? Shall I ask the mercy of God for myself, and expect him to be so partial as to grant it, and join with me in despising and rejecting my poor offending brother? If I love my brother as myself, this cannot be; and if I do not, then am I a rebel against God who has commanded me thus to do, and, as such, cannot justly hope for his mercy. "Forgive," said Christ, "and thou shalt be forgiven."

When one of my brethren offends and wrongs another, how easily can I forgive him! But if he has injured me how is the case altered! How it sticks in the mind! Why is this? If I loved my brother as myself this could not be. Nay; if I loved God with all my heart I could not thus feel; I should only be sorry that my brother had sinned against the good spirit of our Heavenly Father, and thus injured himself. I should be more grieved for the sin of the offender than for the offence of the sinner.

If when one brother offends another, I am comparatively but little excited, and the same offence committed against myself highly agitates me; will not this show my want of humility—my great self-importance, and that I esteem myself far above my brother?

Things esteemed of the highest importance necessarily excite the deepest interest, and that in very exact proportion. How very important then, is my character in comparison with my brother's, when I can quietly hear him traduced, while the least thing derogatory to myself, arouses all my indignation?

Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. O teach me the truth respecting myself! Humble me; prostrate me in the dust, that I may depend no more on self, or on any mere human sagacity, but on the power and gift of God.

If I were only a worm, I might well crawl in the dust; but I am by nature a corrupt and sinful worm, and should, like Job, "abhor my selfish nature in dust and ashes," and submit it to the just abhorrence of all intelligences.

Who am I, that I should resent reproach and scorn, or complain of injustice? Is it possible that injustice can be done to such a lawless nature, except it be by suffering it to escape merited contempt!

Away with complaints; I have ever been blest more than I deserved; and if there were not an infinite fountain of goodness—unmerited goodness, a measure of which is extended to me—I should now be most destitute.

We should never consider ourselves sufficiently humble, till we can hear ourselves traduced and slandered without being agitated and losing our serenity of mind.

How completely ineffectual and abortive are all the efforts of men to destroy the peace of that soul, who, redeemed from the earth, and dead to self, desires neither the honor of men nor the pleasures of sense; who, disregarding all censure, "rejoices to have his name cast out as evil for Christ's sake," and places his whole confidence in the gift of God and his whole happiness in doing the Divine will!

Some men exhort others to humility, that they may the better serve themselves of them; yet is the humble man infinitely more happy than his proud oppressor.

Flee honor, and she will pursue you; seek her and she will conceal herself from your search.

When blind Bartimeus heard that Jesus called him, such was his eagerness to receive sight, that he cast away his mantle, that he might hasten to Christ! O that I may thus cast away whatever would in the least hinder my coming to the Saviour; that, poor, blind and naked, I may prostrate myself wholly at his feet, and receive the true inward light of his Spirit; that being thus enlightened I may "follow him in the way," till I become fully imbued with his "meek and lowly" temper and disposition of soul. Thus I shall be enlightened by the Truth; enriched with Love, and clothed with Humility.

"Learn of me," said Jesus, "for I am meek and lowly, and ye shall find rest to your souls." Then, as Humility gives peace and rest to the soul, he enjoys most happiness from it that is the most humble.

Eternal Life.

Shakerism is Christianity to us; and Christianity is eternal life. Jesus, as really enjoyed eternal life before his crucifixion, as afterwards. The same is the truth with his disciples, regardless in what age they live.

Love may be a veritable mark of discipleship; but the grand feature of a Christian is the ever-present possession of eternal life! death they never will experience. "If any one will keep my sayings, he never shall see death." Death is the wages of sin; there is no sin in Christ, nor in good Christians. "To be carnally minded is death," but this belongs not to the Christian's life. The elements of the world, are death to the Christian's soul; but these are supplanted by the life Christ lived, and this was eternal life.

The lusts of the flesh and of the mind deny us the life the Angels are living—eternal life; but, crucified unto the world, as Jesus was ere he ascended the scaffold on Calvary, we become possessors of a new life, Angel life; and Angels on earth, are already Angels in heaven. The true followers of Christ flinch not at the cross that crucifies their fleshly lusts, knowing "these are not of the Father, but of the world." Christ invites us to eternal life; his life was a renunciation of those practices that cannot be engaged in by those who would enjoy life—eternal life.

What is eternal life? It is a heavenly, unchangeable, unending condition. The glory of those, not of Christ, is to save the life that must needs change, before eternal life can be experienced; and while many are aware of this truth, they are unable, unwilling to renounce the world, flesh and devil, to be sharers of eternal life.

In eternal life there are no husbands nor wives; no private property nor selfish relations; no war, poverty nor slavery; but the eternal life of the heavens puts these into oblivion. What was there in the virgin life of Christ that needed to change to be eternal, or what is there in any purely virgin character? Let the world of humanity plead for fleshly indulgences; let them solemnize their marriages of the flesh, and direct their churches to wink at their private indulgences (of which, it would be a shame to speak), we declare the same to be the works of darkness and of death, abominable in the sight of God for professing Christians to practice—disgraceful for the heathen! The acceptance of eternal life will be forced work by-the-bye; for, when the opportunities of physical indulgences are cut short by the mortuary process, the mind, writhing in the pain of past incontinence, will accept the situation; but can never be in possession of those sweets of eternal life, rightly belonging to those who have made willing sacrifices of themselves, unto a life of sin and death.

Thoughts on True Love.

"In Christ are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." Col. 2:3.

Jesus, who was baptized with the Christ Spirit, was our Exemplar. He ministered to his disciples True Love. He taught them how to love and what to love, and what not to love. He said, "Love your enemies. If ye love them which love you, what thank have ye?" Worldly lovers—those who do not profess the Christian name—can love when their love is reciprocated; this is Policy. But to love our enemies, those who would return cursing for blessing, and learn to pray for those who would thus use us—this is Principle. The one is natural, the other spiritual—the world versus Christianity. The principle of self-denial runs through all the teachings of Jesus; and the love which worketh no ill to neighbor, friend, or foe, whatever provocation may be given, will fulfill the whole Gospel law; it will cause its possessor to depart from the iniquity of loving falsely, for the sake of emolument, or pleasure, as well as for all unrighteous doings. If our love is centered in God, then we have a basis to rest upon. True love is self-sustained; it is free from guile, and is not mixed with fear, lest some adverse wind or storm should arise that would sweep away its foundation; but perfect love is devoid of fear. We can trust it, for it is unselfish; it is not precarious nor circumstantial, like the perverted passion called love. If we are well grounded in the principle of love, we shall never be distressed nor unhappy because we think our friends grow cold-hearted towards us; but, if we feel the tide of love ebbing, then it is well for us to examine our characters, and see if we cannot make ourselves more attractive and lovely, by being more virtuous, striving more to have the image of Christ formed in us. For, if we become his true sons and daughters, he will open his treasures unto us; we may draw therefrom; and the same virtuous principles which made him the chief object of beauty and loveliness among ten thousand, if practiced by us, will produce the same beauty in us.

Notwithstanding we are admonished to "love our enemies, to bless and curse not," we must not love indiscriminately. We are as expressly commanded to hate, as to love. But we should learn to both love and hate understandingly, and from a good conscience; to love whatever is virtuous, that is healthy for soul and body. Sin is hateful in the sight of God, because it deforms the soul, and destroys its noblest faculties; leads it away from truth, from God, its home. He is the Source, and should be the center of all souls. We should never love nor hate from momentary impulse. Charity should ever be the handmaid of love. If we would judge righteously of others, we must take into consideration conditions of birth, fortune, education. We cannot justly measure all by one rule; the same degree of abstract truth, if applied to some persons, would blight and destroy; while to others, who are prepared by previous culture and growth, it would be a great blessing. Charity would teach us to be gentle to others; not to magnify faults in them, by evil thinking nor speaking; but to be more lenient to the faults of others, than to our own. And if a brother or sister errs, according to our conceptions of right, if we possess true love, guided by charity, we will, in many cases, see that the cause of their failure is the result of false educations, which they had not yet outgrown, rather than willful neglect. Then, how much better to take them kindly by the hand and lift them up into more progressed conditions; show them by example and word, a more excellent way, than to denounce and say, "stand off; I am more holy than thou!" "Love is the fulfilling of the law." "Whatsoever we sow we shall reap." If we sow Love, Peace and Charity, we will thereby increase our capacity to love, by enlarging the sphere of our affections; and as we love better, ourselves become objects more worthy to be loved, and thus we shall attract the good and the pure unto us, and from them reap the desired harvest.

Declaration and Caution to the Public.

BY THE UNITED SOCIETIES CALLED SHAKERS.

Whereas, circumstances have occurred and may again occur whereby the public are liable to be imposed upon by persons professing to act as authorized Agents for the Society of Shakers in some of its branches or families, who presume to make contracts, and obtain money, or other property on credit, from persons, or companies who may suppose the Society to be responsible for the fulfillment of such contracts.

Therefore, the duly constituted Authorities of the several Shaker Societies, throughout the land, do hereby give notice to all whom it may concern, that, in accordance with principles taught by the first founders of this Society called Shakers, the members thereof shall owe no man anything but love and good will, and pay this debt as often as the slightest opportunity serves.

This principle is comprised in the written Covenant of the Institution, and confirmed and established by the agreement and signature of all its members; by which no individual is authorized to contract any debt, in the name of the Institution, or any business connection which can, by any means, render the Society responsible for their transactions. Nor will the Society be under obligations to liquidate any demands, of Notes, Bonds, or any other security or obligation given in its name, incurring debt for value received, either by the trustees thereof or of any other individual; but such individual or individuals shall be held responsible for their own transactions.

Notices of these principles have been several times published, in the name and by the authorities of the several branches of the United Society called "Shakers." But, it appears they are not so extensively known as they ought to be, to prevent frauds, and impositions of that nature.

It is therefore expedient again to give this public Notice, in the name, and by the Authorities of the United Societies, with a request that it may be extensively published, for the information of all, who may, at any time, be concerned in dealing with Members, or professed members of this Community. Subscribed to by

May 23, 1871.

NOTE.—Any debts which may have heretofore been incurred by any official Agents of the United Society in any of its branches, the benefits whereof have been received and acknowledged by any family or Society of this Institution, if paid at all, as a matter of justice to the creditor or creditors who may have been ignorant of the laws of the Institution at the time such debt was contracted; or in lenity to the contractors of such debt, will be paid only under the protest of the United Society, through its Authorities, as in contravention of its laws and constitution.

Ministry of New Lebanon, N. Y.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

DEAR SHAKER:—I wish to say a few words to some one, whomsoever it may concern; but hope it may be one, who is not over 20 years of age,—on the subject of human advancement to better and higher conditions. I hope, also, hereby to elicit a kind response from any one of youthful years, who may deem this worthy the notice of a reply.

I think there is a natural and irrepressible desire in every one, regardless how wicked and degraded, to better their conditions, in some way, physically, mentally or spiritually.

Indeed, most persons in their moments of sober reflection, wish they were, or could be improved in all directions. Perhaps, there is no human being in existence, who does not possess this instinctive desire to progress.

It is more than probable that, upon this little spark of deific goodness in the soul, depends the only hope of salvation; that is, an ultimate development in perfect holiness.

Some persons of a very low, and unfortunate organization, may pass many years without discovering to themselves, or others, this instinct of progress; but it is no less in existence, and only needs to have its lips touched by a coal from the altar of heaven's inspiration, to resurrect it into palpable consciousness and activity.

How this was brought about in my case, while I was quite young, I will try to describe in this article. I was neither very good, nor very bad, in my youthful days; but frequently my attention was called to some particular virtue, trait, or characteristic of progress and improvement, in some person, which I felt I was in want of. If such persons had a sweet, pleasant way of inculcating the advantages of possessing such good quality, or trait, I immediately fell in love with the beauty and propriety thereof; and if they still further exemplified the sweetness, and heavenly worth, of such good virtue, then I was quite captivated thereby, and would resolve immediately to adopt into my practical life, such valuable and soul-renovating treasure!

I remember of reading the life of Francis Lewis Carnaro, an Italian nobleman, who excelled in the virtue of Temperance, as well as many other excellent qualities of character: O how I was charmed and delighted with his experience! and how strongly I resolved to be temperate! He had a beautiful way of showing up the advantages of a temperate, peaceful life.

I read Dr. Franklin's inimitable "Biography," and how I wished I could follow along in his footsteps of industry and economical ways.

Again, I recollect, once, when about 14 years of age, and although so young, under many heavy trials and temptations to a sinful life, of unmanly passion and pleasure, that I chanced to go to one of the families of Believers, more advanced than the one I lived in, on some little errand. As I approached, I saw a Brother stirring hay, in the dooryard. I passed at some distance from him, and without speaking; but I distinctly recollect what were my thoughts, at the time: "This good Brother has fought the good fight, and the conflict is over! The evening of his days is being spent in peaceful meditations upon all those earlier trials, sorrows and victories of youth, which, though bitter to bear, are so sweet to remember! He can now safely and serenely repose on the green shore of the sea of life, and listen to the far-off booming of the thunder, and the roar of the billows, and fearful surges of sorrow and temptation, which with him are over, and gone forever! How sweet! How peaceful! What a good thing it was that he made the passage safely. He is now at rest, while I am so tossed and terrified by the storms and tempests of passions unhallowed, and constant temptation to sin, that I am more than three-fourths of my time in uncontrollable sorrow and tears, and constant struggles to ward off the terrible catastrophe of a final surrender to actual, hopeless perdition!"

These were my solemn reflections; but notwithstanding the dreadful weight of tribulation I was then under, the sight of this good old veteran, in his clean shirt, dark pants and blue satin vest, filled me for the time, and for a considerable period after, with a great calm; his sphere, and serene spirit psychologized me for several days—nerving me to still greater exertions, if possible, to make my calling and election sure; and culminate, as I felt he had done, in complete victory and peace!

And, my young friend, though I do by no means feel boastful, nor egotistical, yet for your encouragement and comfort, allow me to announce to you, that I am now occupying the same position, on the same green, peaceful shore, that my veteran exemplar occupied, when I passed in sight of him, forty years ago. And if these thoughts, and these little reminiscences of my past actual experience, will do you any good, I shall be glad of it.

Remember, I am praying for you all the time, that beyond and above all other considerations, you may somehow find ample ability to live a pure, sinless life; and that your solemn journey toward a higher, holier plane, may culminate in Everlasting Peace!

Yours affectionately,

O. C. HAMPTON.

Henry C. Blinn to the Young.

Accepting the kind offer of "THE SHAKER," we have joined company with those who are interested in the "Juvenile Department." Kindly thank you, dear Editor, for bearing us in remembrance. We find our spirit closely conjoined to yours, in the hope that our little paper may be a home educator; hence the necessity of a department for the young, one where the children and youth will be as well represented as are the theologians in other sections of the paper.

A thorough understanding of the elementary principles, is the securing of a good foundation upon which to build a permanent superstructure. While our superiors are earnestly contending for the faith and devotedly advocating their religious views, we may be as acceptably engaged on the subject of good behavior and moral deportment.

We should not only be interested in these for our own especial benefit, but at the same time for the blessing it confers upon others. "Suffer little children to come unto me," is the voice of parental care. The spirit of this should indelibly form its impression upon the mind. Good children. Virtuous youth. With what satisfaction we are led to express these titles of affectionate regard. We are influenced to this, in part, from the manifestation of the good spirit that dwells with you at the present time, and also, from the anxious hope of what you may be in more mature years.

Now, the question arises, whose names shall we write under the above titles? Shall it be the boy or girl who does not use vulgar or improper language? Shall we write the names of those who "never told a lie," or of those who have never taken anything from father, mother, brother or sister, without their consent? Poor children! we fear the names would be few, indeed, if you submitted to this examination. What shall we do?

Well, all my young friends may consider themselves as the ones addressed. Not only those who have been called good and virtuous, but we will also include that class who may not have earned a public expression of this title. The "best boy" or girl may have done wrong, a few times, while the "worst boy" or girl have no doubt been credited with one or more kind and generous acts. A close self-examination into the motives which influenced you to do, or not to do, can be the only test of your goodness.

Do as well as you have learned, and you will find many willing friends to assist you. When we say that it is easier to be good, than it is to be wicked; that it is easier to tell the truth, than to tell a falsehood; that it requires no greater effort to speak a kind word, than it does to speak an unkind word, we simply tell you what experience has taught many who have gone before you. Try it. Be kind to the aged, and be respectful to all. Always speak the truth! No matter what you may have done! Never conceal it under false stories. Speak the truth! One misrepresentation will lead the way to another, and every false word carries you farther and farther from a correct statement, and you are less able to acknowledge the truth by an honest confession. By all means, speak the truth! In connection with the above, we find this, generally, to be the case. Those who tell falsehoods will steal! If you would sustain a good character, never take that which does not belong to you. If you wish to possess it, ask for it. If your request is not granted, you may be disappointed, but if you have any respect for yourself, or love for your friends, do not steal! False and wicked stories will grow from it, which may not only injure you for the society of the good, but may at the same time bring hours of sorrow to those who have taken a deep interest in your welfare. If you have ever told that which is untrue, honestly confess it before your father or mother, or before those who are acting as your guardians. If you have ever taken that which did not belong to you, return it to the owner, if possible, and then make an honest confession of it, and promise never to do so again. Be very careful of your words and actions, lest you acquire these bad habits and lose the honor of a good name. Beware, young friends, of the first temptations to do wrong. They may lead to a ruinous practice.

AGRICULTURAL.

By some, it is thought, a few columns of our paper can be profitably devoted to Agriculture, Horticulture, Mechanics, etc., though we are not among the number, we open to those who are anxious, and ask future writers to send only good, practical hints in the fewest possible words.

Stirring the Soil Essential to Plant Growth.

The season of preparing soils for the growth of plants, and putting the seed into the ground being passed, the prospective crop must now depend not merely on the season (though a good season is essential to a good crop), but largely on the cultivation of the plants.

When a boy we worked in the garden, and nine summers of our minority were devoted to the culture, principally of culinary vegetables, medicinal plants, and roots; grape vines, and the seeds of culinary vegetables! Our leader was a reader and admirer of William Cobbett (the English gardener, farmer, lawyer, author and statesman), and we were constantly taught to betrying Cobbett's plans of gardening, as well as to devise originals to excell Cobbett if possible; and, sometimes we did excell him; and sometimes we found; by experience, that we were ignoramuses, relative to the economy of plant growth. But we succeeded in learning how to raise some plants, to say the least of it, to excellence, if not perfection; among these, we will name cabbages, onions, cucumbers and many others.

Brigham Young makes it a first lesson in Mormon religion when the Believer has migrated to Utah, to learn to raise a cabbage. The lesson is a good one, and we will give our version of it. Premising, that all plants derive most of their nourishment from the atmosphere, until they begin to perfect their seeds, then they draw from the soil. But to our lesson: How to raise a cabbage and an onion.

First, The plants should be sown in a bed of fine, rich loam; after coming up, thinned to at least one inch apart; second, before transplanting, which should not be done until the plants are six inches high, and stocky, water the plants until the soil is quite wet; select a moist atmosphere to remove the plants in; having, in all cases freshly and deeply stirred the soil with plough or spade, take up the plants with a trowel or shingle, lifting them carefully with as much earth as possible clinging to their rootlets; dig a hole with the tool, much larger than the root is to occupy and set in the plant, filling around the root with fine fresh earth; press lightly around the roots; after a few days' standing, hoe the ground about the plants; if the weather is very dry, every morning, when the dew is on the plant, as the roots drink in aerial nourishment as well as the broad leaves.

We have known the finest cabbages raised in this way, even in very dry seasons, when cabbages not thus treated, but hoed only three or four times during the season, made no heads at all! Never hoe cabbages, in very hot and dry weather, after the dew is gone!

Dig around a cabbage deeply; but never stir deeply the soil about an onion; simply scrape the surface of the soil, and keep clean of weeds. Of course, if you are no novice, you will never sow onions on coarse, hard, lumpy, wet soil; nor on any soil which is not very rich; as well plant beans in lake Erie!

The very frequent stirring of the soil is also essential to raising good vines, as cucumbers and melons; and the best crops are raised on a heavily manured sod, inverted just before planting, and thoroughly pulverized with the harrow.

As the seed of plants draws most of its nutriment from the soil, good, full, plump seeds cannot be grown without strong soil, or much manure; thrifty plants may be produced, but not good seed!

The gist of this lesson is, first, that soils, like the leaves of plants, drink in plant nutrition from the atmosphere, if stirred frequently and kept loose and friable; second, that the mouths of the rootlets drink up this nourishment from the atmosphere under these circumstances, as the leaves do the dews.

Beans.—Never hoe them when the dew or rain is upon them nor when the soil is wet; it burns them like a fire. Stir the soil often when the soil and plants are dry. A field of beans last summer planted on poor soil without manure, had no hoeing, excepting one row; the crop was small, but double on the hoed row, than on either side. What was the cause?

Somebody ought to tell us this in coming numbers of the paper; and, dear Editor, they should tell us too, that each and all kinds of manure are not equally well adapted to each and all kinds of plants; they should tell us, that, while horse manure, and the droppings of fowls are good for corn and cucumbers, they are not so good for Asparagus, as the manure from horned cattle, and why.

There is much dear Editor that "THE SHAKER" might teach on agriculture, and agricultural chemistry, the adaptation of soils and manures to plants; the preparation of soils for plants; the management of manures. This article though it breaks the ground in the Agricultural field of "THE SHAKER" is not written as a model, but to open the field for better and more work.

Agriculture.

The important and exhaustless subject of agriculture necessarily has large claims on our attention. Though one man may not exactly follow the plans of another, to achieve success as the conditions are rarely alike. A slight difference in climate, soil, markets, etc., determine to a certain extent our varied modes of operations. And perhaps, more than all, the knowledge, the executive ability, and means, wanting to secure the desired end.

Therefore, may we not with profit make suggestions and experiments, and give practical results, and thus add to the store already acquired and stimulate farther inquiry? Since "he who makes two spears of grass grow where only one grew before is a public benefactor;" let us all strive to that end and profit by the best experience and bring to our aid a ready and willing ally—Science.

Suppose we discuss the question of large farms and careless culture versus small farms and high cultivation? Let us contrast "Farmer Slack with Farmer Thrift." An interchange of thought and experience will be of great benefit to the agricultural interests.

The law of gravitation confirms the all pervading declaration, that as mortals our duty is upon the earth to which we are wonderfully adapted; though the fountains whence we draw our spirit is from above. And besides the command, not in the Bible alone, but in that other and more audible scripture, the objective and silent teachings legibly written on every living thing, to "multiply and replenish and subdue the earth" into usefulness and beauty. Then let us study the most feasible and effectual means to "multiply" vegetation and "replenish" the worn-out earth with renewed vigor and "subdue" its spontaneous productions to comfort, convenience and use.

Since we take our domestic animals from their native climate to serve us in a forced artificial mode of living, should it not become our duty to provide for their comfort as well as our interest and profit?

A reply to a few leading questions may interest and benefit all.

No one objects to the fair exchange of knowledge. "I willingly exchange my ignorance for knowledge."

I trust that at least one well filled column will be devoted to this subject of primary and vital importance.

May we have the pleasure of hearing from all, from Maine to Kentucky.

E. MYRICK.

It is expected F. W. Evans will leave this country for London, on the 1st proximo. His tour will be of a strictly evangelical nature. He will be accompanied by J. M. Peebles.

ERRATA.—In June number, first page, third column, eighth line omit the word "not" to get the author's meaning. Also, in the same column, read "dog-rose" for primrose. It is needless to say, these were not the mistakes of "F. W. E."

We furnish THE SHAKER at something less than cost. All subscriptions, received during 1871, will date from January of present year.

Particular attention is called to the "Declaration and Warning" issued by Ministry of Mount Lebanon.

When we pray "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth," do we realize whether there is a distinction or not, between our lives and those we believe are living in heaven? Are we sincere in our prayer? *

Christian Success.

Christ's mission to the world was the salvation of souls—to save souls from the transgression of God's laws, and consequently from the punishment of sin. The mission is a success. Whoever looks to Christianity for salvation from the punishment of sin, while living in sin, mistakes the mission of the Christ spirit, and is doomed either to a change of opinion and life, or to the sorest disappointment.—Whoso commits sin, does not experience Christian success. We believe Christ to have appeared, just as we firmly believe in the existence of gold; but until we experience the value of gold, by real possession and the benefits of its exchange, of how much worth is our belief? Until we experience the salvation from the commission of sin, which Christ's mission promised, of what avail is Christianity to us? "He shall save his people from their sins," by teaching a life that is free from sin. Christ teaches freedom from war—a Christian peace. Christians never did, never can fight. Christians are peacemakers, and realize that there never was a Christian cause worth fighting for with weapons that kill the body or hurt the soul! This Christianity will exclude the majority of professing Christians. Christ taught a virgin life, pure and chaste as the angels. Jesus practiced virginity; so did his immediate disciples; so practice all who attain to a Christian success. Paul lived like the author of Christianity, but permitted a license to the heathen that finds no sanction in the life and teachings of Christ; whoso indulges in any practice of life, heathen to Christianity, can lay no claim to Christian success.

The Christ spirit organized the most beautiful church-pattern among the primitive Christians. To this, genuine Christians gathered, gave up their selfish individualities, and laid down at the apostles' feet their wealth and their poverty, their burdens and their indifferences, and with these the apostles built up a successful Christian Church. The wealthy became less wealthy in worldly goods; the poor were elevated by the condescension of the rich; all enjoyed a comfortable equality as brethren and sisters. Whoso would attach to this church any mutual or social relations, not comprehended by the terms brethren and sisters in Christ, aims at the prostitution of the true church into a community of ill-fame.

We find human nature, undisciplined by the Christ spirit, opposed to the demands of Christianity. However loud its professions of love for Christ, it prefers, that spirit would not press too closely the subject of self-denial. Under the Christian name it prefers to live worse than the Jews, and whoever would restrict it is made the object of persecution and crucifixion.

It wants, and will have, the pleasures of the flesh, of private property and war, unless converted to the Christ life. It marries and then transcends, to beastly extent, the boundaries of Jewish discipline, screening itself behind the name of Christ from the mortifying penances and purifications that Jewish laws demanded. Christ was the end of the law of generation and of the "unfruitful works of darkness;" and who would achieve success in a Christian life must discontinue these, seeking an excuse and refuge in Christ! "If this is Christianity," cries the majority of professing Christians, "then we prefer not to be Christians." Regardless of their preferences, the truth stands alto relievo, and will not down at the bidding of popular desires. Refusing the discipline of the law, all cut themselves off from the enjoyment of its advantages; and by practicing that which the life of Christ will not sanction, but condemns, such cannot have the gospel, nor attain to a genuine Christian profession. "The Shakers," says a noted writer, "have certainly struck at the root of all evil; but, in our opinion, they have struck a little too deeply."

The Shakers, we say, experience genuine Christian success, when obedient to the voice of their principles, and this demands our striking at the root of evil very much deeper than our contemporaries have; yet none too deeply to experience salvation from the ills our contemporaries suffer. We know what it is to experience Christian success—salvation from sin. Our success has not been in the congregation of vast numbers; never will be; at least we do not look for this. There has been, as may occur again and again, a falling away from the purity of our principles, which inevitably degrades the individualities so falling—as "the stars of heaven falling to earth;" but this in no manner affects our Christian success. Our numbers are not so large, as in periods that are past; we fearlessly admit this fact; but our principles are firmer than ever, in our faithful hearts, and in the estimation of the truly religious minds of the day. We mean to maintain these principles inviolate, while living in happy anticipation of the approach of a blessed season, when mankind will become convicted of the need of Christian success, and gather to the principles that alone can satisfy the demand. "For the love of the primitive Christians," says one who is not far from the kingdom of heaven, "we need not expect to find in the churches of Brooklyn nor in surrounding cities; but in a community life, where so much self-denial is in exercise, that but few individuals will be willing to submit to its demands." *

Christian Communism,

Is nothing more nor less than "the Kingdom of Heaven," of which so much has been prophesied. And that kingdom is described by the simile of a net, which fishermen had cast into the sea, and drawn, filled with (not all good fish that would answer the expectation of the fishermen, but) a promiscuous multitude of such as the sea contains. Well trained, experienced fishermen know where to go, and in what waters to ply their vocation, to secure the greatest proportion of the fish they want, and the fewest and least dangerous of those which are of no profit. And as often as the net is cast, follows the selecting, separating process, which returns back into the sea the not-wanted, undesirable result of the haul.

The best of fish are unfit for use until death has occurred, and a cleansing process has been passed through, after which, their former life in the ocean is an impossibility; they are on land, and landmen appropriate and use them up. They at least will never again multiply, nor replenish the waste waters of the great sea, in which they had their origin, and where in they experienced their former life.

Signs of life in the fish, upon a supper table, would be no more horrible and disgusting to the invited guests, than are manifestations of generative life in young, or old men and women in a Christian Community. Whilst, "blessed are the pure in heart who therein see God."

Much as the more progressed minds of the world desire community life, having failed to actualize it in seventy-six attempts during the last fifty years (see Noyes), there is "no form or comeliness in a Christian Community that they should desire it." It excludes and takes the life of the natural, procreative man and woman, which they find in "the waters, or sea, where the whore sitteth, and which are peoples, and multitudes, and nations and tongues,"—all the human inhabitants of this earth being by the Spirit included under one gigantic figure.

There is latent in the soul of every man and woman a spiritual or angel man or woman. Like Paul, the whole race, as a race, have been pressing on, "if by any means they might attain to the Resurrection" from the "dead sea" of generation; and ever and anon this spiritual yearning has cropped out a Reformer, a Philosopher, a Prophet or Prophetess, with their dream of a "good time coming" in the distant future, their felicitous Arcadia, or unattainable Utopia, or their vision of a Millenium; indistinct and undefined glimpses of a spiritual state and life on this earth—the Resurrection Order as an answer to the God-inspired prayer of "Thy kingdom come," wherein their daily bread and water would "be sure," without the daily drudgery and degradation to which the great mass of humanity are subject, and only to be escaped by self-denial in the new life to be attained in "Christian Communities," as schools, which are educating immortal souls for a life that is eternal. F. W. EVANS.

Labor is Worship.

PART FIRST.

It is supposed by many who seem to be superficial readers of the New Testament, that the founders of the Order introduced hand labor as something new into the Christian Church as a principle of duty for all.

Others believe that we carry out rigidly for worldly gain, members being subjects of toil and leaders standing exempt. We will endeavor to show that in diligence we strictly follow the example of Jesus, the Apostles and the Primitive Church, who established the principle, that work is Christian worship.

The argument is to be scriptural and nothing more.

The Parents of Jesus were laboring Jews.

When he was entering the field of labor as an inspired teacher, the inquiry was raised by those who heard him, "Is not this the carpenter's son?" &c.

Jesus required by law to learn a trade.

Under the statute of Moses, tradition says, every father rich, or poor, was required to see that his sons learned a trade. After the affair with the doctors at the temple, "He came to Nazareth and was subject to his parents," till thirty years of age; in which time Joseph evidently instructed Jesus in his own occupation, for when he began to preach they inquired, "Is not this the carpenter?" &c.

The habitation of Jesus.

The day after John baptized him, he was passing, and the Baptist exclaimed: "Behold the Lamb of God!" &c. Again, the next day he stood with two of his disciples, and calling their attention to him, uttered the same sentiment, and the two followed him. He turned and asked "What seek ye?" They asked, "Where dwellest thou?" He answered, "Come and see." They obeyed and followed him and abode with him that day.

Others were invited to his dwelling, who became his disciples. Here evidently Nicodemus came to him by night. Now, by what means was this simple home supplied with its daily needs? This was the starting of the first Christian community; the outgrowth from it was the calling of the twelve, the gathering at Pentecost, the Church at Jerusalem and those among the Gentiles.

So the latter Church started under Mother Ann. A powerful inspiration attracted deeply religious inquirers to her; the outgrowths from this are the present Churches in America.

The Disciples when called were working men.

Their industries were fishing, gathering taxes and other labors. A Church that is to live by its own industry should have such pioneers to start with. For the scriptures show positively that this requirement was laid upon all the Christian ministers, even upon Paul, who was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel the most learned of the Apostles. The first American believers in this Order were out of just such society.

All ordained Apostles required to labor for their daily bread.

After the crucifixion, Jesus appeared to them at the sea of Galilee while toiling at their nets.

After they had advanced far into their ministry, Paul declared, "God hath set forth us the Apostles (he excepts none) a spectacle to the world, angels and men. Even to this present hour we hunger, thirst, have no certain dwelling place, and labor, working with our hands," &c.

He does not say that they chose this condition, nor that poverty drove them to it, but that God (through Jesus) laid it upon them, that as a pattern, they might be set forth a spectacle to be looked upon by the heavenly orders, the Church and the world. The same life of honest toil was exacted of all ministers, elders and people in gathering and starting the Church of Christ's Second Appearing, Mother Ann setting the example, living up to her own motto at all times—"hands to work and hearts to God."

They required the same of their Churches.

Paul held it as a principle and proved it by his works, that he who opposed honest labor was an enemy to the Christian faith. He says, "When we were among you, we commanded if any would not work neither should he eat. Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought, but wrought with labor and travail night and day that we might not be chargeable to any of you: not because we had not power, but to make ourselves an example to you to follow us."

How could Paul preach down indolence and ease to others, if he refused to labor himself? They had affectionate brethren and sisters, quite wealthy, which they could lean upon and could receive donations for support, but they prized a Christ-like example above all this. Like their Master they never required of others what they were unwilling to do themselves. Notice the reproof of Jesus to the Jewish Priesthood against shirking the duties of life they well understood. He said: "The Scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat; they bind heavy burdens upon men's shoulders, grievous to be borne, which they will not move themselves with one of their fingers." Paul and the twelve had seen and heard this. Now would Jesus cry out against an evil which he practiced himself? From the time that this Church was established our leaders have taught members to follow them as they followed the leaders of both dispensations of the gospel, in honest labor.

Hand labor introduced into the Gentile Churches.

When Paul came to Corinth he was impressed to tarry there, sow the seed of faith and reap a harvest of souls. It was not his first business to seek out some place of ease in some metropolitan hotel, but true to his faith he sought some humble workshop where he could go to work with his hands. "When Paul came to Corinth he found a certain Jew named Aquila, with his wife Priscilla, and he came to them; and because he was of the same craft, he abode with them and worked, for by occupation they were tent makers."

Paul had now entered his field of labor right, and could pray for others; he toiled on through the week, "and reasoned in the Synagogue every Sabbath day."

"Being in the way, the Lord blessed him and delivered him from persecution. He converted Crispus, the chief ruler of the Synagogue, with all his house, and many of the Corinthians hearing, believed." All came out true, "For he continued there a year and six months."

By following strictly the example of Jesus, Paul was clothed with great power to control and admonish his followers. He found they were wealthy and worldly, sunk deeply in the sins of the Gentiles, and he walked among them with great self-denial, charity and circumspection. When his labors in the spirit became so extended that his own hands failed to supply his wants he said: "When I was with you and wanted, I was chargeable to no man, for that which was lacking the brethren from Macedonia supplied."

Thus in times of need Ministers of Christ divided the proceeds of their labor with each other.

The first Believers in Shaker faith provided a home to which others gathered: they preached to them the gospel, and united with them in toil and labor, and imparted to them their substance.

Gentile Churches follow the example of the Church at Jerusalem in hand labor.

When the Apostles established the Church at Jerusalem, they followed strictly the teachings and example of Jesus, that when the gospel spread among the Gentiles, they could present to them his true life and doctrines. In exhorting the Thessalonians to a strict Christian course, Paul says: "Ye remember, brethren, our travail; we would not be chargeable to any of you. Ye become the followers of the Churches, which in Judea are in Christ Jesus." Thus the Apostles appeared among them as Christian teachers, toiling for their daily bread just as they did in the Churches at Jerusalem, and these stood in the very life and testimony of Christ Jesus. It has been so with the Shaker Church from the beginning. When their Missionaries have planted other Churches, the same spirit of honest toil which exists in the Church at New Lebanon has ever been required of all, as an important part of the Christian faith. Progress.

With old and young, the questions often arise: What constitutes a state of blessedness? What character is the most acceptable to the Great Originator of human souls, and the most conducive to the happiness of sentient beings endowed with intelligence, and possessing the germs of an immortal life?

The Apostle Paul gave many wholesome instructions, some commandments, and some permissions. His mission was to the people; and he strove to meet all classes—the Jew under the law, and those who were without law; to the weak he adapted his teachings, fed them with milk; for they could not digest the strong meat which he gave to those who were more spiritually progressed; his object was to benefit all. Shall we be willing to take our place with the weak, and hide beneath the permissions which the Apostle gave to the Gentile Christians of his day, instead of girding ourselves about with every truth, and making haste in the upward path of progression, though it may take us away from every earthly idol? Progress is stamped upon everything; knowledge is constantly increasing in things pertaining to the earth-life. If we possess an innate power to add to our knowledge in natural science, why should there be a limit to spiritual growth and development? Why is it that so many give tacit assent to the stereotyped proprietor of the pulpit, and unmistakable support to the style of architecture expressed in steeples? to the artistically-stained glass through which to dimly light the Church? indicating the status of those who say, Lord, Lord, but whose soul language is, "Subdue the light; let it not shine too vividly for the weak vision, and let the Word be tempered with scholastic platitude, and fall on us as the snow-flake on the running water-stream, so as not to interrupt our course in securing earthly emoluments and delight;" though, oft, deep tones from each neighboring cemetery are heard, How short lived! how corruptible!

But few minds, comparatively, have been exercised upon the subject of Regeneration versus Perpetuity of the Race. The generative plane, when under the guidance of wisdom, and subject to the highest reason, may be viewed as the rudimental, or natural, having in view its use—replenishing the earth. But, as J. M.

Peebles has said, "There should be a mount of ascension—a spiritual birth to each brain-organ—a heavenly polarity—before physical death." H. W. Beecher says, "It is better to be born right the first time, than to depend upon some spasmodic revival—an occasional wave of spiritual life, for the better regulation of the being, feeble, and often transient, in its descent." And, as the Swedenborgian, Dr. Giles, says, "Try to work through the misty, shadowy veil of the flesh." Malthus, by mathematical and geometrical conclusions, makes out, that "it is impossible for the earth always to contain and afford subsistence to its inhabitants, if they so abnormally continue to increase." And many are brought to look favorably, and even kindly on war, disease, infanticide, etc., as means by which an ungodly race may continue to exist, and find room to come to, and go from the surface of mother earth.

A. J. Davis says "procreation is not compatible with spirituality." From his high, intellectual stand-point, the progressive spirit would become absorbed and incorporated with an element of light and knowledge wherein the animal or procreative life could not exist; and he invites men and women to "come out of their little enclosures of pigs, potatoes, progeny and pence, and take a flight to the mount or summit wherefrom they could behold the harmony and beauty of God's creation, which in a lower altitude can not be seen. The knowledge of this higher life will test the stamina of all applicants for progress. Should this process prevail, the earth will cease to satisfy or supply the spirits thereon. Doubtless, millions of years may roll by, ere this condition will become universal; but, as progressionists, we should approximate thereto; for we are destined to exist in another sphere; therefore, let that sphere be one of superior delights and loves. Let us, from this exalted position, aim for the higher life, where the sphere is more universal, and the element more genial; where we can behold the passing away of the sublunary orb itself, which will cease to exist as a separate body in the planetary system actually passing away; attracted to and by stronger bodies, it will ultimately be absorbed and incorporated into another system, and in a way and manner not understood by the orthodox theologian. Earth shall be no more!"

"Science, by the aid of revelation from the spirit spheres, has opened a more philosophical and peaceable way of disposing of and settling this matter, than the old oft-repeated pitiless story of burning and annihilation; thus exterminating mother earth and her inhabitants."

"The spiritual aspirations, and soul wants of the age, call for a broader, a more liberal view of Heaven; a more expansive and profound idea of intelligences above and around us, and of their mission to the earth sphere." Such are the thoughts of many; and we are happy to announce to them, that there is a heavenly order established on earth—a second Pentecostal Church—where the character of Jesus is not only admired, but imitated. As he was holy, harmless and undefiled, so are they in the Second Christian Church who follow him in the regeneration.

White-robed Angels are again seen on the mountain of purity, and again is heard, in accents of love, "Come up higher." Angelic beings, male and female, sound forth the heavenly invitation from the immortal spheres, "Come all who will: the wine, milk and honey are free. Come and buy unalloyed, pure gold without money and without price."

JANE D. KNIGHT.

Do Good.

This should be the aim of every human being—to make the world better for their having lived. No one can be a reformer unless they first become reformed—made better. Jesus struggled to make life principles effective in himself, rather than to proclaim new theories. He never urged the acceptance of his principles until, by a living illustration, he proved them efficacious. With weighty truths in his possession, he yet was humble; accepting neither the kingly crown, nor the purple robe. Baptized by the power of redemption, drinking deeply at the springs of eternal life, he imparted the same to others. In lonely places he would gather the afflicted—tell them of the heavenly joys of the Divine life. A few honest fishermen heard his teachings, and made their lives conformably to them, gathering others to the beautiful way of the cross. The "few" who laid the foundations of the Shaker Church were equally zealous in disciplining their lives according to their honest convictions of right. Under the most scorching testimony against pride, lust, war, etc., they stood firm. They incurred the hatred and envy of those whom they sought to improve, while giving expressions of the most Christian love—laying down a life of sinful pleasure in behalf of the souls of their neighbors. They were poor, but willingly shared their all with sin-sick souls, wherever met. They were rich in spiritual things, and from their abundance built the structure that is a beacon to the afflicted of all nations, having come out and separated themselves from the works of darkness into the glorious light and life of Christ—they stripped themselves of any base disguise, showed their past deeds, and earnestly began a life of true repentance, leaving off what they confessed as wrong. In struggling for their salvation they used extreme measures to meet their cases. The heads of families would sometimes, under the deepest conviction for their sins, and of their responsibility as parents, call their children around them and impress upon them the necessity of a godly life, not by the relation of mythical stories of fire and brimstone, but, giving expression to their sorrow for their own missteps in life, warn their children to flee from the same condemnation; and with such fervor were these communications made, that the stony hearts of their children melted, and, as the baptized parents baptized their children into the newness of life, society received a force of the proper material for the maintenance of the true gospel of Christ. May the same truths enter the hearts of many natural parents, while we all sing the song, "We Live to do Good."

BIOGRAPHICAL.

As we have received the most authentic records of Jesus from the writings of his daily companions, we would give evidence of Ann Lee's life and character from those who knew her personally, and suffered with her in the promulgation of her unpopular faith. —ED.

Testimony of John Farrington.

In consequence of an extraordinary revival of religion, which took place at New Lebanon in the summer of 1779, and extended through the neighboring towns, I was brought into a deep labor of mind concerning my own salvation. In this revival I diligently attended the meetings, and was much engaged in religious exercises, by which I was greatly awakened to pray earnestly to God for deliverance from sin, and from the nature of evil; but no deliverance could I find.

I closely observed the operations of this revival, but could not find that it wrought any abiding effect upon its subjects. I therefore diligently searched the scriptures, prayed to God, and confessed my sins to Him alone in secret places. But all this produced no abiding comfort, for I found that in all my labors and struggles I could not obtain any victory over sin, nor could I see any among the subjects of the revival that appeared in any better situation, as to religion, than myself. Notwithstanding all my experience in the illuminations of the Divine spirit, and all the flattering encouragements of many old professors, who earnestly endeavored to persuade me that I was a Christian, and an heir of salvation, my feelings were not satisfied. I felt myself unworthy of the name of a Christian, and had no confidence in making a public profession of religion, unless I could live according to my profession; and therefore determined not to assume the name of Christ till I could depart from iniquity, nor call myself a Christian without being convinced that I was such in reality.

In the spring of the year 1780, I received intelligence of a singular sect of Christians who had come from England, and lived near Albany, and who attracted much attention on account of the singularity of their religion, and the remarkable power and operations which attended it. This intelligence made me very anxious to see the people for my own satisfaction, feeling myself fully prepared by my late experience and my knowledge of the scriptures, to receive an understanding, and to judge of the virtue and efficacy of their religion. In agreement with my parents I went to see them (being then in the 20th year of my age), and was among the first in this country who visited these remarkable strangers. I found them indeed a very singular people, and after critical inquiry and observation, I had sufficient evidence to satisfy me that they possessed the power of God beyond any other people I had ever seen. Instead of asking me to tell my religious experience, and inviting me to join the Church, as my former teachers had done, Mother Ann Lee, the leader of this little community, taught me the necessity of confessing my sins in the presence of God's witnesses, and showed me the propriety of bringing my deeds to the light, and of being joined to the Lord in one spirit. I saw and acknowledged this to be right. I tarried several days, and saw with much admiration the wonderful displays of Divine power among these people.

When I was about to take my leave of them, to return home, Mother Ann told me I might confess my sins if I desired, before I returned home. I said I believed it to be right to confess my sins, but I had thought to return home and labor for a deeper sense of sin, and try to mend my life a little. Mother replied, "That is very good, but you can gain a deeper sense of sin after you have confessed them than before, and be better able to mend your life." Being fully convinced by what I had heard and seen that this was the real requirement of God, I undertook it, and made as honest a confession as I was able at that time. Afterward, Mother said, "You have done well so far, but you have not confessed all." She then told me of a number of secret sins that I had committed, which I had not recollected, and which I well knew was before unknown to any living mortal but myself: and I was fully convinced that she could not have known these things but by the revelation of God. I therefore felt able to return home and say, as the woman of Samaria did of Jesus Christ, I have seen a woman who was able to tell me all that I ever did in my life.

Here I received that holy unction from Christ, through Mother Ann, that fully enabled me to cease from sin. Here I found boldness and confidence before God and all men, and felt my adoption into the family of Christ, and among the sons of God. Here I found an entrance into the pure and peaceable Kingdom of Christ, and felt my soul united to the invisible, heavenly host, and filled with the quickening power of God, which gave me strength to resist all evil, and to keep every sinful propensity in subjection to the law of Christ. And I felt a full assurance that by continuing in obedience to the testimony I had then embraced, I should gain a complete dominion over the powers of darkness, and reign triumphant with Christ in purity and holiness. In this I have not been deceived, for I have found my faith fully verified. Indeed, it is impossible it should be otherwise, for the testimony that I received, and with which I united, was like a two-edged sword against all ungodliness and every appearance of evil; therefore all who are obedient to it must certainly be saved from all ungodliness. This grace I have obtained, and this power I have received, through the special ministration of Mother Ann Lee, whose piercing testimony awakened the inmost feelings of my soul, and roused the sleeping faculties of my mind, which had long been bound in nature's darkness.

Thus did my soul receive a special manifestation of the healing power of God, as really as the impotent man at the beautiful gate of the temple received the miraculous cure from Peter and John. I can testify before all men that it was through faith in Mother Ann, whom God raised up and endowed with the spirit of Christ, that I was healed of the infirmities of my spirit; even through Christ manifested in that woman, who was shamefully persecuted, abused and slandered by a lawless and wicked generation, because she zealously maintained the principles of purity and holiness, and boldly testified, by precept and example, against all the abominations of the wicked.

It must appear evident to every reasonable mind that had she not possessed the spirit and power of Christ she could not have communicated it to others. And had she been laden with iniquity, and fraught with evil and unclean spirits, she could not have purged those things from other souls. The nature of evil is directly opposed to godliness, and if ever subdued it must be done by the spirit and power of goodness, or it never can be done at all. And had not Mother Ann brought forth the genuine fruits of righteousness in her own life and example, she never could have wrought in souls such conviction of sin, and turned so many from the ways of iniquity into the pure paths of peace and righteousness as she has done; and that this was truly the fruit of her labors, many living witnesses can testify from their own personal knowledge and experience.

I was well acquainted with Mother Ann, and had many opportunities with her during her ministration in this country. Being a free man, and feeling a powerful religious attachment to her and the elders with her, I embraced every suitable opportunity to visit them, and to be in their company at the different places where they ministered the gospel. I often visited them at Watervliet, and was with them in prison at Albany—I was with them at Harvard, Shirley, Woburn, Ashfield, Richmond and Hancock, in Massachusetts, at Enfield in Connecticut, and at New Lebanon. I have seen and heard them in many meetings, and was knowing to their deportment in public and private, and was well acquainted with their manners at home and abroad, and, therefore, feel fully able to give a true statement of their lives and characters. And I feel it justly my duty to contradict the false reports which have been spread abroad by the tongue of slander concerning them: for in all my acquaintance with them, I have ever observed the same uniform example of temperance, chastity, righteousness and every gospel virtue. Their lives and characters were in strict conformity to the doctrine and example of Christ; and they constantly taught the same to others.

Although many malicious and abusive charges have been published abroad in the world, for the purpose of criminating the character of this Society and its first founders, yet all that can be said in the spirit of slander, is unworthy of the credit or attention of any rational person. Those who have little or no acquaintance with the Society, are not qualified to give any correct information concerning it. Many unfaithful members have vainly pretended to hold relation for a season; but their ungodliness has justly brought them under reproof; and instead of reforming, they have thereby taken occasion to indulge themselves in resentment and falsehood, and to deny the faith which they had once embraced, and become as traitors to those who honestly maintain the cross of Christ. Such apostates have often palmed upon the Society and its leaders the crimes which they themselves had committed, while pretending to hold relation with us.

I can truly testify, from my own personal acquaintance, that the character and example of Mother and the elders were altogether the reverse of any excess, and that they invariably taught the same sobriety and temperance to others. I have been a witness of many instances in which Mother admonished intemperance in those whom she taught; but in no way did she do it more effectually than by the godly example which she continually displayed, during the whole of her life, among us. Ever faithful in good works, she often deprived herself of comforts, that she might be able to comfort others. She spared not her life in promoting the cause of God, in strengthening the feeble, comforting the afflicted, reproving the careless, correcting disorders, purging out sin, and zealously striving, at all times, to build up righteousness and peace in all who embraced her testimony.

I once was young but now I am old, and through my life have been an attentive observer of the ways and actions of men, but I have never seen the persecutor prosper, nor the vile slanderer rise to honor. When the gospel first opened in New Lebanon, the little despised flock who first embraced it, were mostly people of small property, and in low circumstances; many among us were indeed very poor; and all of us, like the rest of mankind, were bound in sin and iniquity, possessing our full share of all the evil propensities of a fallen nature, and sunk in slothfulness, filthiness, intemperance and a multitude of other evil habits. These were our inward enemies with which we had to contend; while without we had the prejudices, jealousies, slanders and persecutions of an unbelieving world to encounter, who spared no pains in trying to impede the work of God among us, and discourage us in our undertaking, crying out, delusion! fanaticism! witchcraft! the work of the devil!

But what has been the result? I bless the God of Heaven that I have lived to see the fulfillment of those blessed promises, given us by the faithful messengers of truth, who first administered the gospel to us, "That if we would yield a faithful obedience to the law of Christ, now made manifest, we should be blessed in our outgoings and incomings—in our basket and in our store; and above all that we should enjoy the blessings of peace and salvation, which Christ had promised to the faithful." As the fruits of their precepts and examples of industry, neatness, prudence, temperance and godliness, I have seen a Society of people spring up, and grow and increase in order, beauty and harmony, till it is, in my view, the glory of the earth—a city of refuge—a shining light and a tree of life to the nations.

On the other hand, I have seen the false accuser, the vile slanderer and proud persecutor, who gladly would have trampled under foot the meek and lowly followers of Christ, either left to become a shame and a reproach to civil society, outcasts among men and vagabonds in the earth; or if their rank and standing in society has preserved them from these disgraces, they have not escaped the stains of dishonor, nor the stings of a guilty conscience. Numbers have lingered out their days under evident guilt and condemnation, and left this mortal stage with "a fearful looking," knowing that the day of reckoning must come. What became of those proud and malicious persecutors who vainly strove against the work of God in New Lebanon and its vicinity, in the early days of our faith? Behold, they were scattered to the four winds! But few remained in this town as the sad relics of a dishonored gang—a once haughty, riotous, cruel and unfeeling band of intolerant persecutors. Many of them were swept from the earth by untimely deaths and retributive judgments, till nothing but an empty name is left to their forlorn remembrance. They have received the reward of their doings, and shared the fate of persecutors in every age of the world. Hence it is a point of wisdom for all who know not this gospel to beware how they treat it; for whether they believe it or not, it is a serious reality, that the God of Heaven has laid the foundation; Christ has set up a kingdom on earth which shall never have an end. And those who bless this work will be blessed, and those who curse it will be cursed.

Knowing and feeling a sense of these things, and standing in the fear of God, I solemnly warn all to be careful that they touch not the Lord's anointed, and do his people no harm. Remember the counsel of Gamaliel to the Jewish high priest and his council: "Refrain from these men and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God." JOHN FARRINGTON.

Branches or Root?

A short time since, in a religious and scientific magazine, we observed this or a similar expression: "Have we not been at work on branches, and neglected to strike the axe at the root of evil?" Surely this imputation cannot be laid to the little "Shaker," which has dealt such vigorous and persistent blows at the very root of all existing evils.

One benevolent-hearted class of people hack away most industriously at the giant sin of intemperance, but with little headway, for when they verily believed it dead, life from the root and trunk sends forth more branches, and in another form the work must be repeated again and again. And so of every evil: all have their mortal enemies in humanity who nobly work at their destruction, but still the tree of evil holds its head aloft, and seems not likely to succumb.

When Jesus commenced his mission, he said, now is the axe laid at the root of the tree. The now seems to be the remarkable word in the expression, and to inaugurate a new mode of attack. The prunings and trimmings were to be exchanged for a work more effectual.

If the farmer would rid himself of an obnoxious tree, he puts his energies at the destruction of the root and trunk, by cutting it down at once, not by cutting off any prominent limbs or branches, however much they may have seeded his garden or otherwise annoyed him.

The Apostle said, "from whence come wars and fightings? come they not hence of your lusts which war in your members?" Then to rid the earth of wars, and all the consequent evils, the most effectual way would be to destroy the selfish and sensual principle in each human being which "craves that it may consume upon its lusts."

Christ commenced on the new plan, ignoring marriage, private property, rank and title, war and retaliation; and declared that the tree that bore the evil fruit was to be hewn down and cast into the fire—the fire of truth and self-denial. Fire is a purifier as well as a destroyer. "Who can dwell with devouring flames," etc.? "He that hath clean hands and a pure heart."

ELIZABETH H. WEBSTER.

To the Afflicted.

Child of adversity! we who are saved from the miseries and uncertainties of the outer life, would speak to you words of hope; would say to you, "Fear not the rough surge which bears your frail bark along the dark waters of sorrow! Every stormy tide, and every sterile path over which you journey has some fertile margins on which may grow a few plants of virtue. There is some good in every heart, and that good the angels will never forsake. Look for it, cherish it, and in its measure it will be like the arm of God to sustain you. Friends may depart to join the invisible host; you are not bereft; they still guard you. Loved ones may turn traitors, yet blessed is the heart that can say in the spirit of true forgiveness, 'They were not always false; it is human to err. I am not perfect.'"

The soul that thus receives sorrow is not blighted, but chastened; its tears are drawn from the pool of humility, whose waters are purifying; and that soul will not waste the dawn of the day in recalling the night-dream of grief; but it will awake to hope and energy. Its wounds will be healed, and beauties will appear instead of scars.

Thus God helps those who help themselves. The sorrowing are not forgotten; their afflictions are known, their prayers are heard, and relief is sent most directly through their own co-operation with the ministering powers. It is never too late for effort. The change that we call death, which is certain to every human being, will afford opportunity to finish whatever may be left undone here, or to turn into a new course. However winding may be the stream of adversity, it has its source in sin; and sin is only abolished by self-denial. Sin is the element of Babylon, and the voice of the spirit is constantly calling to all suffering hearts that are seeking truth, "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not contaminated with her wickedness, and that ye receive not of her punishments!" and your days of bitterness will end in bliss, for there is no adversity in Heaven. H. R. AGNEW.

"Those who fix their eyes on the sermon on the Mount, or rather on the naked propositions it contains, and disregard Christ's life, his cross and his resurrection, commit the same mistake in studying Christianity, that the student of Socratic philosophy would commit if he studied only the dramatic story of his death. Both Socrates and Christ uttered remarkable thoughts and lived remarkable lives. But Socrates holds his place in history by his thoughts and not by his life; Christ, by his life, rather than by his thoughts."—Ecce Homo.

Future Existence and Eternal Happiness.

As mankind in this life have a real existence without enjoying perfect happiness, so, in the future world, man will find himself in the same condition. Future existence, therefore, does not imply future happiness; this is attained by a certain process, and man, being a free agent, is left to determine for himself how long he will put off that process which leads to eternal life and happiness. Man's present and future, then, is dependent on his own agency; but this future existence is the feat of God. Dunlavy observes, that "God's decrees are to be known by His works of creation and providence." When God purposed or decreed to create animated beings, such as inhabit our globe, he also decreed that they should all require sustenance for bodily support, and formed every one of them with appetites and a digestive apparatus.

After thus decreeing and thus forming them, if he had left them all without food adapted to their appetites and digestive organs—without anything to sustain their lives—and so left them to linger and perish with hunger, would any intelligent being fail to see that such a being was either malignant or impotent and shortsighted? On the contrary, when we see that ample provision is made for food, and all the means of subsistence for the thousands of varied wants and appetites, all exactly adapted to each and every species of being, we see not only infinite wisdom, but a boundless munificence displayed; and thus nature teaches us that God is infinitely wise and good. Does she teach us truth? Shall we rely on her testimony?

Among the vast variety of these creatures there is one species called man, of which there are more than a billion of individuals now on the globe. These all have the common wants of other animals with regard to food, and possess in common with them an appetite and digestive organs, and, like the rest, the Creator has made ample provision, adapted to all their bodily wants of food, clothing and shelter. But this species of being have also intelligent spirits, which have their peculiar wants, among which is an intense desire for future and immortal existence. Yet, notwithstanding this, some of this species say that the Creator has made no provision to satisfy this craving appetite of the intelligent spirit, but that every individual of the race is doomed to perish and become extinct, because no means exist to supply this life-long innate cravings of the soul. Nature contradicts the ungenerous charge against this, a munificent Creator, and testifies that there exists a provision for this want as well as others, because God the great Author of nature cannot be inconsistent, providing for all minor wants, even those of insects, and neglecting any provision for the most important of all. Revelation harmonizes with nature and declares that the God and Father of all, who provides for "sparrows," will surely, therefore, provide for the spiritual, as well as the physical, wants of his rational creatures.

But in the case of our temporal wants, God does not cook our food, make our garments, nor build our houses, but furnishes us with the material and the faculties to do it ourselves—"reaching," as one says, "these necessities to us through our own hands." This makes labor and toil a necessity in providing for our bodily wants; so with the wants of our spiritual nature, God furnishes the knowledge and necessary means, but requires us to "work out our salvation." "Seek and ye shall find." "Ask, ye shall receive." Strive [agonisthe] agonize, exert every nerve that ye may enter into life. Thus it is made quite as necessary that we should exert our own faculties to gain spiritual sustenance and life, as it is to labor for our temporal wants. It may be observed here that the word life is often used in scripture in contrast, not with extinction, but with distinction and want; the same as was used by the Romans, "Dum vivimus vivamus"—While we live, let us live; that is, let us enjoy ourselves. Thus it is said to those who had improved their talents—"Enter into the joy of thy Lord"—into the enjoyment of his glorious and heavenly life. "Narrow is the way that leadeth to life"—to true enjoyment—"and few there be that find it" in this state of existence. Yet it exists and can be found—is found—and those few who have it proclaim, "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come! come, for all things are ready!"

RICHARD W. PELHAM.

Regeneration.

Progress, as applied to man, is a movement from a lower to a higher, from a bad to a better condition.

As to the manner or means by which progress is effected, there is perhaps some difference of opinion. One class of persons, for instance, supposes that in order to progress to a higher and better condition, it is necessary to kill and utterly annihilate certain inherent qualities, passions and powers of the human mind and body, so that what remains may be pure and good. This presupposes the aforesaid qualities and passions to have been evil, and a necessity for their destruction.

Another class thinks that every faculty of man is eternal; that no part of his nature can be annihilated, only at the risk of destroying his identity, and endangering his future existence in the ratio of such destruction. I belong to this class. I think the progress of man consists, not in accretions from without, but by a process of eternal refinement from within of all that can be refined as it stands; and a transmutation into higher uses of all that can not be thus refined: viz., all those fugitive passions and powers, whose uses are apparent only in this rudimental state, and mainly subservient thereto. Among these passions, powers, &c., are anger, the productive principle, acquisitiveness, &c. Let us consider the procreative faculty alone, as from the treatment of this one faculty, with reference to the point at issue, the theory, as applicable to all the others, may easily be inferred. Procreation, a word embodying a sufficient definition, requires for its successful fulfilment certain secretions from the blood, deposited and secreted by the wonderful economy of the physical system. If the laws of this economy had never been violated, how might the whole creation of man have been blest, and universal peace, purity and personal righteousness might have sweetly smiled over the silent gloom of the fearful past! But by sin, misdirection, ignorance, or whatever name you may call it, the integrity of this physical law of procreation is almost completely lost; most ruthlessly and devilishly violated in this our day, till there is scarcely one in a hundred thousand who is not unnaturally or precociously developed in animal lust; and we are constantly driven to hear the recital of such orgies of social or solitary amateness as often to make us writhe in sickness and horror. This being the case, many in all ages have chosen to renounce all relation in life to this powerful passion, and to live pure celibate lives.

The Shakers of the present day have even adopted the celibate life as the most important tenet of their doctrine, without which, as they believe, their community and their theological system would both fail. The question, then, is: How are we free from the imputation of destroying and crushing out certain faculties and proclivities furnished us by our Creator for beneficial purposes, thereby blaspheming the Great and All-Wise Power which has bestowed them? This question would come with a better grace from those not of our Order, if there was now, or ever had been a time in man's history when the abuse of this faculty did not produce a hundred thousand fold more misery and ruin of soul and body than its total disuse.

We believe that the Evangels of Jesus and Ann were predicated principally upon the terrible fact that the human race were fast nearing the awful maelstrom of irrecoverable ruin, mainly through the instrumentality of sexual abuse, and there was need of an institution into which could enter those who desired an asylum of perfect seclusion and protection from "the lusts of the flesh;" and which would also be a standing rebuke and perpetual testimony against the frightful orgies of crime, carried on through the abuse of the sexual principle.

Now, as before stated, the pabulum creating secretions necessary for procreation, if not used in that way, is by no means wasted, but re-absorbed by the blood, and goes to form the very best material for the vitalization of the brain, and consequent evolution of the purest material for thought, and the most transparent medium through which to transmit the highest inspirations from Heaven. In this sublime and heavenly condition we feel drawn out in love towards the whole world, and would gladly propagate them through our faith and living inspirations from the flesh into the spirit, from the power of lower, baser influences, to the higher and holier!

This, as we understand it, when fully acquiesced in and seconded by those on whom it is brought to bear, is the true regeneration; and when faithfully and understandingly entered upon, with a full determination never to yield the struggle, must inevitably eventuate in "the second birth." And we have learned by long experience that so sure as "he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption," so sure will "he that soweth to the spirit reap life everlasting;" yea, and peace beyond all power of human language to express. But this high ground is not to be gained without a struggle. Indeed, to come into and through this regeneration and new birth, and completely rise into this hazy newness of life, everything below it, all former elements, have to be melted with fervent heat, and the whole re-cast in the crucible of deep sorrow and tribulation, until the spiritual transmutation is effected.

This requires days, months, and years, and great wisdom and vigilance are requisite, that collateral agencies be not allowed so far to affect the results as to distort and mutilate the whole character and features of the child of God that is to be! If, for instance, a person holds a constant check upon one mean proclivity, say lust, and yet indulges all the time in the use of spirits, opium, tea, coffee, tobacco, pork, &c., he may possibly attain to a regenerate state on that one line; but, alas, what a distorted, swollen, ill-natured child of God he must inevitably come out! Another regenerating process will be necessary to make him presentable, under any circumstances. This is not the worst. Every atom of nervous force he allows to be wasted, in the pleasurable excitements of the aforesaid animal indulgences and intoxications, subtract directly from that unreplaceable stamina of body and mind by which he is to effect his final exaltation to a higher plane. Davis, and many other eminent writers, even declare that "opium and tobacco stimulate the sexual propensities, and generate unhealthy desires." Therefore, would any man or woman set out on the solemn journey to eternal peace with God, let him, or her, if they have felt a Divine call from their interior consciousness, and conviction thereto, abandon at once and forever all indulgence of the "flesh with the affections and lusts;" all anger and ill-will against all fellow beings; all use of tobacco, tea, coffee, spirits, opium, etc., and commence immediately the development of regeneration.

When you have made the most earnest and persevering struggles in this new life, and find yourselves overcome in spite of your best efforts, until you are in utter despair, then come, if unwilling to before, to the Shakers; confess every known sin ever committed, yield yourselves in unequivocal obedience to their instruction, and if you are ever after faithful to your convictions, you cannot fail of the mansions of peace, eternal in the heavens, and a crown of everlasting joy and glory, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest!"

We know this to be true; we have tried it from ten to seventy years, yea, even to eighty years, and it has never failed in a single instance.

The reasons why you will succeed better here than in isolated conditions of the world may be easily understood. For the amount of love, sympathy and affection which you as an individual may be able to bestow, you receive back the love, sympathy and affection, and consequent moral and spiritual strength of hundreds of your dear brethren and sisters, laborers in the same good cause. This advantage is possible in a Community only, and this is the reason you will be far more liable to succeed among the Shakers.

O. C. H., Union Village, O.

Unity, the Bond of Peace.

We'll cling to each other in friendship,
In purity, peace, and true love;
We'll imitate Jesus' example,
And live like the angels above.
Jesus said, "Ye must love one another,
By this your discipleship's known;"
So all other tokens are useless,
Where this blessed mark is not shown.

We'll move ever onward and upward,
Away, far away from the earth,
Together seek heavenly treasures
Of eternal substance and worth.
The spirit is calling us loudly,
To work with more earnest desire;
True action is living to purpose,
And draws us to God ever higher.

We'll live—live by love and good actions,
The cross, self-denial and right;
Time is fleeting, earth's joys are transient,
But heaven hath endless delight.
'Tis only the faithful are crowned,
So let us work on with a zeal,
Not weary, but labor in earnest,
And God will His treasures reveal.
(Hancock.)

Light.

Father of Light, in thee we trust,
From thee all blessings flow;
Thy ways are ever true and just,
And thou all hearts doth know.
O, may we walk with humble fear,
Each day within thy sight;
And may our constant, fervent prayer
Be, "Father, give us light!"

O, grant to us thy mercy, Lord,
To save us from our loss;
Thy power, and thy quickening word,
With faith to bear the cross,—
O, leave us not, when storms arise,
Dark clouds heave up in sight;
But guide us in thy way so wise,
To light, more perfect light.

If we should err, or go astray,
Or thy least law forget,
O, point us to the narrow way,
Thy truth hath wisely set.
Then, in thy temple, while we've breath,
We'll praise thee with delight;
That thou hast raised our souls from death,
To light, effulgent light.

POLLY LEWIS, Mt. L.

Happiness is a very common plant, a native of every soil, yet, some skill is required in gathering it; for many poisonous weeds look like it, and deceive the unwary to their ruin.

Amid the tears of grief, peace keeps her silent place like the rainbow upon the spray of the cataract; nor can it be disturbed so long as Jehovah's sunshine rests upon the soul.

Duties lazily and lifelessly performed; half-hearted prayers; a deportment blameless enough, perhaps, but tame and unexpressive, and therefore not influential; words well and wisely spoken, perhaps, but without depth and intensity, therefore without weight. These are things which God cannot tolerate in a saint.

In judging of others, let us always think the best, and employ the spirit of charity and candor; but in judging of ourselves we ought to be exact and severe.

He that cannot live well to-day, will be less qualified to live well to-morrow.

To be wise in our own eyes, in the opinion of the world, and in the sight of our Creator, are three things so very different as rarely to coincide.

Charity, like the sun, brightens every object on which it shines.

Christianity did not come from heaven to be the amusement of an idle hour; to be the food of mere imagination; to be as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice. It is intended to be the guide, the companion of all our hours, the serious occupation of our whole existence.

ENFIELD, Conn.

It is pleasing to us, when those not of our order encourage us in disseminating our doctrinal views; and when we receive words of cheer, as the following bespeak, we are reminded that we toil not in vain.—
ED.

"Adam, the first, was created a natural man of the earth. Adam, the second, was born a spiritual man from the heavens."

Here we have two distinct orders of beings, each belonging to its respective head or parentage. As it is written: "That which is first was not spiritual, but natural, and afterward that which was spiritual," it is reasonable to suppose, had not Adam transgressed and fallen in his generative order, there would have been a necessity for him to have progressed into a spiritual order; and it is fair to suppose that, as a natural, rational being, the transition from a generative to a regenerative life would have been easy to what it is now, as a poor, blinded, fallen being. Then, if there was a necessity for man, before the fall, to progress to a higher state of manhood, out of one order to another, how much greater necessity now that man is unnatural, irrational and fallen.

"You must be born again," is the language of Christ to Nicodemus, and "you must be born again," is the language of fallen humanity repeated to itself daily, as it wallows in its own corrupt blood, or lingers in constant pain. Then Christian regeneration, as we understand it, is the coming out of the old generative order—putting off the old man with his deeds, which are ever corrupt after the flesh, and by putting on the new man who is spiritual—even the Christ from the heavens.

Jesus calls all men to follow him (not Adam, nor Moses), in the regeneration, and become new creatures, by the washing or cleansing process of a Christian life, as it is in Himself, the Christ—the Lord from heaven.

E. BUSHNELL, Calhoun, Mo.

"I feel the Divine hand has guided my way; and though the full hour has not arrived for the opening of your door to me, yet some day it will open, and angel hands will guide the way, and Mother Ann will lead me in the paths of wisdom and love. * * * 'The Shaker' blesses me; I rejoice in its advent to the world; it will do good, for those who read it cannot fail of feeling its heavenly mission."

C. S. L., Ohio.

How can I better praise my God than by loving him with a heart sincere?

How better can I show it, than by giving love to those who need his love through me? In gentle words, in kindly acts, in pleasant smiles or sympathetic tears, as the occasion best requires.

J. WHITELEY.

"As each particle of gold possesses every one of the chemical properties of all the gold on earth, so does each human being possess all the elements and properties of humanity in aggregate. The same process that would separate the dross from one ounce of gold, would also separate the dross from all the gold in existence."

F. W. E.

"Every Christian should begin to doubt himself, if he finds after ten years, that self-denial is as hard in the same things as it was at first."

"You are to accept as a Christian every one whose life and disposition are Christ-like, no matter how heretical the denomination may be to which he belongs"—Beecher.

"According to Your Works."

In the "Book of Common Prayer," we read, at the close of the "Lord's Prayer," the following addendum:—Minister: "O Lord, deal not with us according to our sins!" Congregation: "Neither reward us according to our iniquities!" This is a first class representation of the lesson human nature has learned from the text, "Thou shalt not surely die." Pleasure, regardless of its character, depraved human nature will have; but the just reward of iniquitous doings it shrinks from; to escape pay-day is very desirable. Rather, slay the Lamb, use his skin, or character, for a covering; his blood for an atonement; and thus disguised, run the gauntlet of justice, and look for the reward of heaven, unearned, gratuitously! Poor human nature! "Behold, I come quickly." * * * *

Should we, in the employ of one government, look to another for our compensation? Why should we look to God for reward, if our services have been engaged in the works of the Devil? If we have the reward of the righteous, we must live the life of the righteous. If we sin, we shall reap the reward of sin—death. If we sow to the flesh, we shall reap the opposite of peace, purity; and our abode here, and hereafter, will be where those who "sow to the spirit, and walk not after the flesh with its affections and lusts," would not, could not dwell. May the good God not depart from the holiness of his promise, but "reward us according to our works;" and may we so live as to expect, and joyfully meet the consequences. The best way to escape the punishment of sin, is to stop sinning. ISAAC ANSTATT.

Society Record.

Mt. Lebanon stands improved by an ornamental iron fence on either side of the road passing through the Church family. New roofs are noticed on some of the buildings. "The North" are testifying their love for future adherents by repainting all their buildings. One of the most beautiful and affecting seasons was at the farewell gathering to bid adieu to Elder F. W. Evans.

Dwight Hinckley, a most worthy and estimable brother, dropped dead while at work on the Church's fence, on Monday, 3rd July. He was brother of Barnabas, who, in the height of his career as a surgeon, dropped dead a few years ago in the same family.

Watervliet chronicles one death recently—Mercy Harwood, of the "Church," aged nearly 79. Immense crowds are attendant on Sabbath services, and of a very intelligent and appreciative type.

Groveland reports "no great loss without some small gain," by rebuilding finer buildings than those destroyed by fire.

Hancock has been improving her Meeting House. No deaths, but general health reported. Fruit a failure here.

Tyringham: Crops looking well, corn excepted. Grass, nearly a medium crop. General health.

Harvard reports one death, Maria Barrett, aged 88. A large and commodious barn has been built at the "North." "If we have any monotony, it is broken once a month by the appearance of the ever-welcome 'Shaker.'"

Shirley reports many deaths of prominent individuals in their vicinity, but have not been afflicted themselves. The substitution of cement aqueduct for the lead pipes of old, has much improved the quality of their water. The Hospital took fire from a defect in the chimney; damage slight; but now the same stands greatly improved.

Union Village, O., is enjoying a refreshing season of spiritual things in some portions of its domain, the effect of sincere prayer on the part of its good people.

THE NEW CREATION is a new monthly, published at Omaha. We are unable, as yet, to know its true intent, but, judging from its remarks upon the Shaker Church, in the July No., we are inclined to believe that it means to experience what persecution is, by upholding the true issues of life; by despising the shame of the popular masses, and inculcating the necessity of a purer life than orthodox Christians, so-called, now live. Its life is useless unless it strikes deeply.

"We declare as by the spirit of the Lord, among the seven representative churches of Asia, which are made manifest at Christ's second coming in the hearts of his elect, all of which the spirit rebuked for their sins, while commending their graces, save two, one of which was called the "Church of Philadelphia," that the order of Shakers represents this church, which by name signifies (Phila-Delphi) the love of brother, or brotherly love, as distinguished from sexual love or the love of kindred, of which Christ demanded a full and complete sacrifice. We declare that the Shakers alone have fulfilled as an order or church, in the lead of woman, this full condition, fulfilling the words of Christ, "Who is my mother and who are my brethren? He that doeth the will of my Father in Heaven, the same is my mother, my sister and my brother." They have left houses and lands, fathers and mothers, brothers, sisters and children, husbands and wives, for the kingdom of heaven's sake. They alone as an order have laid the ax at the root of sexual corruptions, or at the roots of the corrupt trees which have sprung therefrom. They alone have sacrificed the strongest impulses of a corrupt and lustful nature, as did their mother Ann. They have made themselves a sign to this lustful and adulterous generation, the generation of the flesh, sacrificing fleshly love and taking in its place brotherly love. They alone have therefore gained the character of the Church of Brotherly Love, the Church of Philadelphia."—New Creation.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

THE SHAKER is the name of a new monthly, issued by and devoted to these faithful and honest devotees of their Christ. The first number issued for January, 1871, is a well got up and well filled sheet of respectable size, and cheap at fifty cents a year, and issued in Albany, N. Y., and edited by G. A. Lomas. We are glad these good people are now speaking to the public for themselves, and hope their paper will be largely patronized, that they may be better known and more appreciated thereby. They certainly have many virtues not common to Christians, and not appreciated as they deserve to be by other societies. It is not strange that there should be much sympathy with them among Spiritualists, since they had much of phenomenal Spiritualism among them, and most of them became convinced that spirits communicate before it gained much popularity among Infidels and other Christians.—Banner of Light.

THE SHAKER, published at Albany, N. Y., is a monthly sheet, filled with words of love and wisdom. Its weapons of warfare are spiritual and mighty.—New Era, Cleveland.

"The Universal Test."

It falls in the way of the little paper called THE SHAKER, to define its ism in a nut-shell; and it says, "the kernel when reached is: Confess and forsake sin; live purely, and you are a Shaker without knowing it, regardless of your theology."

How unerringly all sincere religionists of every name and nation come to this one result at last! The great end and aim of the truly religious man is to "live purely"—to throw off the yoke of sin. The attainment of this is the Great Salvation. The best religion is that which, tried by its results, is best adapted to this end.

Ought not this self-evident truth to discredit the prevalent a priori tests by which we are ever trying our respective theologies? And does it not suggest, too, the cheering thought, that inasmuch as we have the Divine assurance that "in every nation, he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted of him;" the field of God's mercy is wider than our fears have allowed? That wherever (even among the heathen) the sincere effort is put forth, however mistakenly as to means, for the attainment of holiness, the Divine Love shall surely, one day, bring the consummation so devoutly wished? Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled.—Christian Union, N. Y.

However pleasing it may be at present to follow our inclinations, nothing will give peace in the end but righteousness; and nothing is righteous but to deny ourselves and do the will of God.

If our gratitude keeps pace with the blessings we receive from God, we must begin very early in the morning to exercise it; for His protecting care and tender love is extended to us all the time we are sleeping.

Defend the character of the absent, even of those that are bad, as far as truth will permit; the rest conceal, unless duty requires its exposure.

Every love is impure in proportion as it has self for its end, and dangerous in the degree that it ministers impure gratification.

O, how foolish is he who defiles his spirit, sacrifices a pure conscience, and the love of God, for the sake of gaining the love of creatures.

Private and internal devotion improves the affections; reading and reflection the understanding.

And should my brother me offend,
Seventy-times-seven in a day,
I will forgive him at the end,
And for his reformation pray.

I seek not selfish ends, but greatly desire the end of self. R. W. PELHAM.

SHAKERS, ALBANY CO., N. Y., SEPTEMBER, 1871.

No. 9.

Which shall we worship—Person or Principles?

Was Jesus a Shaker?

The people called Shakers do not confine their conduct of life within the circle of extreme self-denial, because any individual preceding them has chosen so to live; nor because any individual has taught self-denial as salvation. Their lives are the results of active principles, being thoroughly wrought out, regardless of who has declared them right, or who may proclaim them erroneous. If satisfactory results are reached, it is a matter of small consequence to us, whether John the Baptist failed, or Jesus succeeded.

Among hero-worshippers, the Shakers will never be classed, for they are guided in their conduct by no man nor woman that ever lived; considering every man as good as Jesus, who lives as obediently to the Christ principles as he did; and honoring, equally well with Mother Ann Lee, she who as thoroughly lives to righteousness and dies to sinfulness as did the founder of the Shaker fraternity. We believe in the multiplicity of Christs; are individually aiming to be Christs; and have full faith in the possibility of becoming as good as Jesus was, and as perfect as he is in the home of his Father.

We love the principles that made him the Anointed, or Christ; and believing that "like causes produce like effects" in religious life, as truly as in worldly philosophy, we have clothed our lives with these principles, and are successfully achieving the regenerative, Christian transformation—and we find that it pays, to some five, to others ten, and to many one hundred-fold of superior joys to those it cuts off by self-denial.

We call ourselves Christians, and rightfully too, because we have chosen as our pattern, the principles that made Jesus, the Christ—"the first-born of many brethren" yet to be born; and not because of any personal attachment to the man Jesus, for some particular act of courtesy on his part. Jesus never did us a personal favor that we know of; while the Spirit Christ has blessed him with salvation and redemption, and will do—is doing the same for us. This Spirit we worship; this Spirit is an emanation from our Father and Mother—GOD! This same Spirit visited Ann Lee, and transformed her Gentile nature into Christian sainthood, the same as it had regenerated a Jewish disposition in Jesus, making it a pioneer in Christianity!

We love Jesus, for his faithfulness to principles he believed to be true; for dying in their defense, rather than saving his physical and sensual life, which was in his power to do, by truculently proving false to the principles that were his salvation; and faithfulness to which, will alone be the salvation of the race. Had Jesus proved false to his commission, he would have merited our religious reprobation, as consistently as Benedict Arnold deserved political denunciation from the American people. The people of the United States mistakenly revere the name of George Washington—it is to the principles that guided him, they mean to do political homage. Had Washington proved a traitor, the principles would have sought out another, who would have been the agent through whom freedom from political and religious thralldom would have been effected. While rational Christians will ever have cause for respecting Jesus, they will not be Christians because he became one, but because of their deep love for the principles by which he overcame the world; and through which active principles they may all "go and do likewise." Were there any consistency in the theory of the vicarious atonement; if the blood of Jesus' physical body was any more powerful for salvation than that of any other being—Jew or Gentile—in this degree only, would we be warranted in substituting the person, for the heavenly principles of Christianity, in our devotional worship. The medicine which made Jesus, the Christ, is the panacea for all the ills the soul has inherited or may contract; and will make of each and all, Christs, as truly as Jesus became so, by their taking the same prescription—being obedient to the same beautiful, resurrecting principles. And until the fact (?) is made apparent, that Jesus took the medicine, and we are saved in consequence, let our standard of worship be the principles of a godly life, while the personalities who carry them out, come in for our secondary respect. Jesus, having carried out the soul-elevating principles of the Christ Spirit, became thereby the ensample by which others might learn of the principles, and how they can be successfully prosecuted for the redemption of human loss. As Jesus became a Christian by obedience to principles of the heavenly world, so we may safely take Jesus for our guide in making our Christian progress. By substituting the person for the true principles worthy of worship, the majority of mankind have become professional idolaters, forgetful, or indifferent of their duty as true Christians. They worship the man Jesus, while they hate the principles of self-denial by which he became the Christ! They worship the medium of the good Spirit operating two thousand years ago, while they are disgusted with the motive power that made that medium then, and similar mediums to-day! That motive power was and is, the principles of SELF-DENIAL. They made Jesus what he became; they have made the Shakers what they are; and will the lives of Jesus and the Shakers bear comparison?

Jesus was a Jew; and, unvisited by the progressive Christ, would have engaged in Jewish life, and followed Jewish customs. He would have married him a wife, or many of them, as was the practice. He abstained—he lived a virgin life. Herein, have the Shakers followed the guidance of the same principles. Has popular Christianity? The Jews revelled in the bloody exploits of war—Jesus refrained entirely from war—so have, and do the Shakers. Have popular Christians? The Jews were emulous of each other in worldly honor and riches; Jesus, as a Jew, would have attempted to have been the richest, just as the majority of professional Christians do to-day; but he could not, while obedient to the Christ principle of equality. His counsels on this subject were the very reverse of Jewish customs, and of present popular Christianity. "My Church has neither rich nor poor—all are equally comfortable," is the testimony of Jesus—was the practice of Jesus—and the Shakers engage in the same laudable enterprise. There has ever been wealth enough in the world to make all very comfortable; and whoso indulges in the least extravagance, is amenable before the law of Christ, of robbing his neighbor and adding to the miseries of life! Truly, it will be worth a journey to the Spirit land, to see the Dives and the Lazarus principles meet; to see the kings and beggars; the tyrants and down-trodden; Bacchuses and Father Matthews; libertines and virgins, all presenting themselves for reward, “according as their works have been.” And now, will Shaker testimony, principles and life, compare with the same that governed Jesus? If so, was Jesus a Shaker? Or, are the Shakers Christians? In the degree that there is comparison between the principles of the Primitive Christian Church and the Modern Shaker Church, is not one as worthy of encomiums as the other? And yet, while millions are worshipping Jesus, they are as truly ignoring Christian principles! And did Jesus live upon the earth to-day, preach the same gospel that he did two thousand years ago, there would be a popular falling off of worshipful masks; and if the times would not permit popular Christians to crucify him, as they would desire to do, he would be shunned and ridiculed by them, and as he walked the streets, fingers would rise, and tongues exclaim, “THERE GOES A SHAKER!” *

Labor is Worship.

PART SECOND.

The testimony handed down from Jesus regulates labor in all Christian Churches.

Paul says to the Thessalonians, “We hear that there are some among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busy bodies. Now such we command by our Lord Jesus Christ (by his authority), that with quietness they work and eat their own bread.”

Paul was a regular member of the Church at Jerusalem; he knew the order which Jesus had revealed to the twelve to regulate temporal and spiritual things. What he had learned there he taught as true Christian theology. If work was not required of all able to perform it, would Paul have dared place Jesus as the author of it, and pronounce those disorderly who did not practice it? If it were not so, would he have ordered the Church to cut off those who refused to practice it, rich or poor? How could there have been equity in that Church more than in the Shaker Church without such a rule for all? With them as with us, the quiet were busy bodies and mischief makers; authors of strife and discord.

Industry enjoined as a means to extend Charity.

Paul on labor was universal; to the Roman brotherhood he writes: “Be affectionate one to another with brotherly love; in honor preferring one another. Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit, serving the Lord; distributing to the necessities of the saints; given to hospitality.” Taking the above as the test, can an indolent professor serve the Lord? Can he be fervent in spirit? From his own industry he can neither distribute to the necessities of the saints nor perform true hospitality. The Shaker Order proves that as self-denial of spirit, works the soul gradually into the heavenly state, just so, by consecrated physical labor we accumulate means to help support the Church and perform all deeds of Christian liberality and charity.

The primitive Church commanded to secure means by labor, to pay all just debts.

Paul says to the Church, “We beseech you, brethren, that ye study to be quiet, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you, that ye walk honestly toward them that are without, that ye lack nothing.”

The apostle here instructs the Christian to peaceably mind his own business; be honest in his dealings; pay all his just debts; to be industrious and diligent to enable him to do so and stand independent. Mother Ann and her successors said, “Do not overreach in business; right all wrongs, and pay all just debts.” This is the true believer’s ground; his theology on the virgin life; confession; restitution; penitence and consecrated inheritance; and a Church thus cut off from the world, must have the great principle of honest toil and joint labor to carry out these, and other Christian principles, and exist in competency.

Paul parting with his Gentile Brethren.

The time arrived that Paul was to bid farewell to the Gentile Churches. He was followed by many leading Elders and others, to the place where he was to take passage. He went to Ephesus and called the Elders of that Church also, to exchange the last friendly greetings. These pillars of the faith had seen him from the commencement of his labors among them, had witnessed his patience in persecution, trials among the false-hearted, and his long-suffering among weaker members of his flock. He met them at the celebrated city Miletus, which lay twelve or fifteen leagues from Ephesus. Here, with many warnings, he showed them the probability that after his return to Jerusalem they would see his face no more. They knew that without price or being a burden, he had committed the gospel to their trust, for which they were to be responsible.

In recalling the fruits of his labor he said: “I have coveted no man’s silver, gold, nor apparel. Ye know that these hands have ministered to my necessities; I have showed you that so laboring, ye ought to support the weak; and remember the words of the Lord Jesus, ‘It is more blessed to give than to receive.’” The apostle was in an enviable condition to balance accounts.

His poverty and hand labor, connected with his gospel life and ministry, clothed him in raiment clean and white. If any could present a Christ-like standing, and feel his dignity of it, it was Paul at Miletus in the presence of his brethren. How tender must have been the parting scene, “when they all wept and fell on his neck and kissed him, sorrowing most of all for the words, that they should see his face no more.” Scenes like this we have witnessed when the faithful have been taken away; their just life, virtues, and consecrated toil have so long proved to all their devotion, that like Paul’s brethren we have sorrowed most of all, that in this world we should see their faces no more.

The Restoration of Dorcas.

The restoring to life of Dorcas, by Peter, was his greatest gift. This honor was not reserved for some great teacher or renowned apostle, but for an obscure Sister of Charity, who appears to have purchased material and made garments with her own hands for the destitute. When Peter arrived at that house of mourning, many stood by weeping; and pointed to the works of her hands. The restoration of this disinterested saint, to her labors, sets the broad seal of God’s approbation upon consecrated labor in the most beautiful form it could have been handed down through centuries.

Conclusion.

We are not informed who fabricated the story that poverty caused the hand labor of the apostles; that when the Churches became wealthy, salaries were substituted for toil. But we do know that the foregoing statements of the first Christian teachers, emphatically contradict it.

Their example in this matter was indispensable, as clearly as any other in the Christian faith. This duty carried out, removes want, poverty, indolence; and fills the Church with peace and plenty. It is the great roller, which levels all ranks and distinctions, to one condition. It is the parent of honesty, justice and charity; it opens wide the door to contentment, health and happiness.

WM. LEONARD.

What is Man, as a Christian?

A lucid answer to the interrogatory, necessarily requires a knowledge of the Christian character, as illustrated by acknowledged and legitimate authority. The teachings of the founder of the Christian religion, or rather the doctrines of Him who was the exponent of that religion, should be correctly understood.

In Christ’s sermon on the mount, are to be found truths, unmistakable and instructive; elucidating Christian life and duty. It is explicitly declared in that discourse, that man is commended to God, only by his good works—his righteousness; which must exceed the righteousness of the Pharisees, who were the strictest and most religious sect of the Jews, God’s peculiar people, or he shall in no case enter the kingdom of heaven; that by the merits of any being but himself only, can he be saved.

To the world, the Christian’s light must be the strongest; a light that will shine before all men; and that he shall both do and teach the commandments of God, which lead men to be perfect, even as our Father in heaven is perfect; that is, to be true to conscience and faithful to convictions of right; to be self-sacrificing, self-denying to all ungodliness; under no circumstances to lose control of himself, or to cease the restraint of his passions; never reviling nor speaking evil of another; and however another may differ from him in opinion or in caste, never tolerating in his heart the action of a spirit of persecution.

The Christian man is meek, merciful, pure in heart, a peacemaker with all, loving all, even his enemies; praying for all, even for those who despitefully use him; doing to others whatsoever he would they should do unto him, thereby becoming to the earth, salt which hath not lost its savor.

By the language and spirit of the sermon, man, as a Christian, has not the right to take the life of his fellow, neither to be angry with him. It is not his prerogative to reproach him with hard words, to call him fool, or say to him Raca, a term of contempt. He shall not commit an unchaste act, or indulge in his heart a sensation of lust, and stand guiltless before God; and rather than be offended by any member of his body, however dear, as the eye or the hand, and perish by its retention, it would be better to cast it from him.

The same authority that calls upon man to purify his imaginations, the thoughts of his heart, demands the purification of his language. The tongue is an unruly member, requiring a strict watch to prevent vulgarisms and profanity. The spirit which takes hold of language, bears equally upon the habits and manners of man; it takes cognizance of his life, in toto. His office is to watch and pray, and that continually. If he would be forgiven of his trespasses, he must first forgive those who trespass against him; if he would have others love, bless and do good to him, he must first love, bless and do good to them. Of others, it is not his province to judge; all men are known by the fruit of human life.

Therefore we have before us a standard, a criterion simple and unclouded, whereby all may know how much they are in possession of the baptism of the spirit of Christ. And let him who is in sympathy with the evils of the present, adulterous generation, who fosters worldly relations and caters to self; who gives encouragement to the gross passions and animal desires of an uncircumcised heart, no more name the name of Christ, or look to Him for atonement, until he finds repentance, and submits to the payment of the utmost farthing, for every willful transgression against known light.

Reason.

It is perfectly legitimate for any person to declare a belief—to say I believe thus or so; but this is a very different thing from reasoning to prove such belief to be true.

No person should enter the precincts of reason for the sole purpose of proving a belief to be true, but they may reason to ascertain whether the belief be true or false, or whether it contains anything false.

Nothing is more dangerous than the pride of self-opinion; “under this influence men seek applause instead of truth.”

It has been said, and I believe truly, that “man on earth lives three lives [or has three planes of being], the first, Animal; second, Intellectual; third, Spiritual. The first, nurtured by the sun; the second, by books, and the thoughts of others; the third, by the beams of Deity, ever present in the mind,” or, as Pope more properly states it, “God in the mind.”

There are specific laws by which each should be governed. Of the first, physiologists have given abundant instruction; of the second, philosophers, logicians and orthoepists have spread before us a sea of information, beyond our means and power or necessity to fully explore. In these two fields we cannot lead, “for the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light.” But of the third, and by far the most important, I do not hesitate to declare that Believers, or Shakers, stand in the foreground to-day of the whole world, and this is said in no boasting spirit. In support of this declaration, but one evidence will I offer in the words of Christ: “By their fruits shall ye know them.” Of the two first, however, the world are in advance of the “children of light,” who may well stand, “cap in hand,” and take lessons on the laws of health, and laws governing reason on the intellectual plane. But the “children of light” being in the ascendant in spiritual life, should “let their light so shine, that the world seeing their good works may glorify their Father and Mother in heaven.”

As we proceed on the spiritual plane, we more and more take cognizance of the field of inspiration and revelation, which is the arcana from whence proceeds all soul sustenance. But all inspirations or revelations are not reliable; hence, says Locke: “If reason must not examine the truth of revelation or persuasion by something extrinsic to the persuasions themselves, truth and falsehood will have the same measure, and will not be possible to be distinguished.” But he confesses the fallacy of this test, by the following admission: “I gratefully receive, and rejoice in the light of revelation, which sets me at rest in many things, the manner whereof my poor reason can by no means make out for me;” thus admitting some inspirations to be self-poised, above and out of the reach of reason’s inquiry, whilst others are of a metaphorical character.

For light, knowledge, progress and growth on this spiritual plane, Christ, in his first and second appearing, in his living body, is the pole-star, the magnet to which the needle of every compass should tremblingly point, and every soul submit. For these lofty and sublime inspirations the mediums are not accountable; but it is inadmissible for the uninspired to postulate conditions above reason’s inquiry, which it is as contradictory to affirm as to deny—thus adhering to the exploded doctrine, “that I know, without knowing what I know.” Such postulates are considered chimerical or fanciful; of such, Hume very pertinently remarks, “nothing is more dangerous to reason than the flights of imagination, and nothing has been more the occasion of mistakes among philosophers.” “But,” says Hamilton, “the most complex web of thought can be reduced to syllogisms, and when this is done their truth or falsehood, in a logical relation, flashes at once into view.” So we may reason logically or illogically from true or false premises. Logic does not pretend to unveil the truth of the proposition, but it tells with unerring certainty whether the reasoning is sound or unsound.

But, descending from the spiritual to the intellectual life and plane of being, and of pure reason, we should rigidly conform to the laws by which minds in the intellectual world are governed, because, if we do not, they will apply them, and will not admit, as they should not, anything that does not conform to them; hence on such our labors would be entirely lost.

As a caution, and for the sake of some who may not be familiar with them, I will here take the liberty to enumerate some of the rules which philosophers include under what they term “The Law of Parcimony,” none of which can in safety be overlooked or neglected by the correct reasoner, viz.:

1. In pure reason, we should take nothing for granted but what is self-evident.

2. If a known cause is sufficient, we must not postulate an unknown.

3. Introduce nothing occult into the question.

4. Use no term of varied or doubtful meaning in the same thesis, without defining it.

5. All reasoning depends on two things, viz., analysis and synthesis.

6. We should never rest so long as there is aught vague or indefinite in our reasonings; so long as we have not analyzed every notion in its elements, and excluded the possibility of all lurking ambiguity in our expressions. Although we may not arrive at truth, with care we can always avoid self-contradiction.

7. An induction which does not proceed upon a competent analysis, or enumeration of particulars, is either doubtful, improbable or null; for all synthesis depends upon a foregone analysis for whatever degree of certainty it may pretend to.

8. All parts of the predicate must be parts of the subject, and every element rejected as hypothetical which the analysis does not spontaneously afford.

9. An hypothesis to be legitimate is, that the facts in explanation of which it is devised be ascertained really to exist, and be not themselves hypothetical.

10. The fact which a legitimate hypothesis explains must be within the sphere of experience.

11. The phenomenon in question must, by analysis, be reduced to its simplest elements; and no phenomenon be assumed as elementary which can be reduced to simpler principles, and no elementary phenomenon overlooked, and no foreign or imaginary element interpolated.

12. If the analysis is incomplete, the synthesis will be incomplete also, and the conclusion unreliable.

13. No conclusion must contain more than the premises analyzed.

14. If one cause is sufficient to explain the phenomenon, we should not postulate a second.

15. A legitimate hypothesis must save the phenomenon which it is invented to explain, without exclusion, distortion or diminution.

The foregoing rules and selections, if strictly adhered to, are sufficient to secure any reasoner from the shafts of a rational criticism; but if they are ignored and lightly set aside by any, such may be made to feel the power of any capable critic, who may think their productions worthy of a rigid scrutiny.

Bread.

The following article from the conservative Scientific American, is valuable from the source of its origin, as showing a steady growth of common sense on that very common subject — Bread.

Something about Bread.

"A subject that interests everybody is that of bread-making, and as a general thing there is too much popular ignorance respecting it. In the process of grinding wheat for superfine flour, the outer shell, composed chiefly of gluten, being tenacious and adhesive, comes from the mill in flakes with the bran, and is sifted out, while the starch is pulverized and constitutes the fine flour. Thus the starch, which is the chief element in fine flour, is saved, which contains no food for brain and muscle; and the gluten, containing phosphates and nitrates which furnish support for brain, bone and muscle, is cast away with the bran, and is fed to horses, cattle and pigs. And this is the kind of flour that makes nine-tenths of the bread in the American cities, besides all that is used in cakes, puddings and pastry.

A method of making bread from whole wheat, without previously grinding it into flour, has been devised by a Frenchman named Sezile.

A Healthy Bread.

The most economical and best bread, especially in cold weather, when a hot fire is constantly kept, is what is sometimes called gems, or unleavened biscuits. For this purpose a group of cast iron pans or cups two and a half by three and a half inches each, all made in one casting, is used. These pans are set on the top of a hot stove and allowed to become almost smoking hot when buttered for use. Then with cold water and milk, half-and-half, or with cold water alone, and the colder the better, mix and stir quickly, with a stiff spoon, as much Graham or unbolted wheat-meal as will make a thick batter or thinish mush; and when the pans are hot, fill them quickly with the thin dough, and let them stand a minute on the stove before putting into a very hot oven, where they should remain twenty or twenty-five minutes until done. If the mixture be neither too thin nor too stiff, and the pans and the oven be hot, you will have twelve as light and wholesome biscuits as any epicure could wish to eat. They may be eaten smoking warm from the oven, as they contain no poisonous chemical elements like yeast bread, which requires cooling to be rid of. They are good cold, or may be warmed in a steam kettle. Anybody, however unskilled in cooking, can learn to make these, light and nice every time. Nice, fresh wheat-meal, very cold wetting quickly done, with a very hot place to bake them, will insure the best of "luck" always. These, like all other Graham bread, should be fresh every day.

For growing children, and those people who work or think, and especially students and sedentary persons, there is no other bread, and scarcely any other single article of food, that equals it. Let the poor who cannot afford to lose fourteen per cent of the grain in the cast-off bran; let those whose bones and muscles are small, tending to rickets and spinal curvature; let invalids and dyspeptics try it, and they will never go back to superfine bread simply because it looks white and nice, and, when dry, is more pleasant to the mouth than the brown."

We have been in the constant use of whole wheat flour for some thirty years, and have but just attained to a satisfactory mode of making bread from it. Many amongst us eat none but unleavened coarse meal-flour bread; and as they think, with a decided advantage to their health.

HISTORICAL.

It will, no doubt, be interesting to many to know of some of the personal trials to which Mother Ann, and her immediate followers, were necessarily subjected. It becomes the faithful historian not to neglect a chapter like the present one. While the Shakers are somewhat noted for their well-loaded tables, choice viands, comfortable buildings, etc., it will do none of us harm to reflect upon the fortitude of those who, "for their faith, endured all things."

In 1788, being the first year I lived at Watervliet, we were brought under great sufferings respecting our temporal concerns. As money was scarce, Believers in general were brought under sufferings; being in poor circumstances, and not being allowed to run in debt, rendered the procuring of subsistence, for the early part of the season, very precarious. Our principal food was rice and milk; sometimes we went to the river to procure fish. Sturgeon, and a few other kinds of fish, were everything of meat kind we obtained for a number of months. We had but little and sometimes no bread, butter, nor cheese, but upon this simple fare we subsisted during the spring and summer. Our employments were principally planting, sowing grain, haymaking and harvesting. All our work was very laborious, and at the end of the season we looked more like skeletons than laboring men, being greatly depreciated in weight. We were so faint for some length of time, that, although we could work, we could not run the distance of twenty rods. Our breakfast consisted of a small bowl of porridge; supper the same; dinner, a small bit of cake, about two-and-a-half inches square, which Aaron Wood cut up and gave to us; this we ate during the days of labor; on Sabbath we ate very little, if anything.

One day, Joseph Preston, and another brother, went to the river to catch herring, and Joseph stated that he was so hungry, that he ate two raw fish as soon as they came out of the water! Many times, in the course of the summer, I thought that if I could only get to my mother's swill pail, I would have skimmed it immediately, and thereby appeased my hunger.

We had but little house room, and, of course, had to lie upon the floor, having no convenience for lodging. Fifteen of us laid upon the floor in one room; some had one blanket to cover them, while others had none, and nought for a pillow but a handkerchief, or a chair turned down so as to recline upon its back. In this way we lodged during that season. When our crops began to ripen, and potatoes were eatable, we began to live better, having a supply of milk to eat with our potatoes, boiled or roasted.

The same year there was a famine in the vicinity of Lake George, and large donations of flour, grain, beef and pork, with other necessities of life, were sent to the sufferers by the citizens of Albany; myself with others were hired to convey those donations to Crown Point. One day, when we had almost reached our destination, we stopped at a small hut in the woods to obtain a little refreshment. On arriving at the door, we found it was inhabited by a woman and three little children. Making known our business, she replied: "I have not had a mouthful of bread, meat nor potatoes in my house for three months." We asked her what she did subsist upon? She replied: "When the briar leaves began to grow in the spring, I boiled them and eat them with milk, for we have one cow to support us; and this is the way that we have lived for three months past."

When we had finished our journey, and returned with the products of our labors, we bought grain and flour, which was the first of any consequence we had been able to obtain during that season. The blessing of God began to smile upon us, and our labors yielded more plentifully than we had expected. We began to prosper in temporal things; to increase in strength of body, and were more able to praise God for his goodness. Father Joseph Meacham would often exhort believers to bear sufferings with patience and fortitude, encouraging, that the time would come, if they were faithful and industrious, that they and their children would have a plenty, and some to give to those who were more needy. These words have been verified in a wonderful and striking manner.

JONATHAN CLARK, Harvard.

I Think,

The world demands a gospel of salvation, that will comprehend and meet its present conditions, physically and spiritually. No reliance can be placed on any faith in religion that will not bear the severest scientific investigation. No human soul ought to believe in any system of theology that will yield itself subserviently to the demands of human nature depraved; or which can be bought or sold as the commonest merchandise. Let the whole world have a thorough knowledge of the true Christian faith, that will bring both body and soul up to the highest state of excellence; and may God speed the day.

A Young Vegetarian.

Grace Bowers, aged eight years, having eaten no meat nor butter for five years, is healthy and intelligent, always waking up in the morning laughing—an infallible test of good temper.

Grace was sent to the Office upon an errand, when one of the Sisters kindly offered her a piece of white bread and butter, with some sugar upon it (not knowing her vegetarianism). "I do not eat white bread nor butter," said Grace. "Well, Grace, what do you eat?" "I eat brown, unleavened bread; but I do not need anything now, for I have just eaten a good dinner."

Any boy or girl who will thus subject appetite to a principle, is laying a solid foundation for a useful character.

F. W. EVANS.

An Address.

BY ANTOINETTE DOOLITTLE.

My loved gospel kindred, I am happy to meet you in this beautiful, shady grove. We have not met here merely as friends; we hold a nearer relation to each other. We claim to be brethren and sisters in Christ, helping to form a spiritual household, honoring our heavenly parents, the great Head of the family, who have raised a standard around which we gather, and under which we cheerfully serve. Purity, peace and liberty is written thereon, and the Prince of all princes has especial charge of it. To those who have not gathered to it, and found protection under its folds, it does not appear beautiful nor symbolical of liberty. But those who have been led by the spirit of truth, and schooled in spiritual philosophy, feel that it signifies to them liberty in its fullest, broadest sense.

While the Prince of Peace guards this banner, and those who dwell under it, the war cry, "to arms," and the doleful sound that comes to many desolate homes, and pierces the hearts of surviving friends, because of the demoniac war forces, which send the arrows of death alike into the palace and cottage, until the whole land is draped in mourning for the loss of loved ones, cannot reach us.

I have not many words for this occasion, but I want to make you, my dear brethren and sisters, feel that my heart beats with deep emotions of love for you all; and I hope this may be a season of rejoicing to every one present. Let us take comfort—have an intellectual and social feast, under the direction of the higher law; and it will be like clusters of grapes from the immortal summer land, and wine well refined from dregs; a foretaste of the pure wine which we, if faithful to our high calling, shall drink with Christ and the redeemed of all kindreds and nations, in the perfected kingdom of God. Let us all, by one united effort, raise the standard of Gospel purity a little higher to-day, that it may wave in the pure breezes over us as it has never done before, that our joy may be enhanced and our peace flow like a river.

There seems to be something very congenial in the atmosphere in and around this place. Our annual gatherings here, probably, make us feel a little like some of the ancients, who sought out some quiet retreat in the glens, or on the mountains, that they might the more effectually consecrate themselves to devotional life and religious fervor; to perform their sacred vows, and drink in the inspiration of the Almighty! So interblended became their feelings with the scenery surrounding them, the sods upon which they had knelt in solemn prayer, and rested their bodies when the curtains of night were drawn around them, the trees that had sheltered them, and even the rocks whereon they had sat in silent meditation, had become so sacred to them, that it was something like parting soul and body when they left those places, so strongly were they attached to them. One is said to have expressed his feelings thus: "O, king of mountains, rich in purifying streams, adieu! I have passed happy days upon thy heights. I have nourished myself with the delicious fruits thou hast produced, and have quenched my thirst with the clear waters that flow from thy summit. Oh, mountain, free from sin! Like unto a living child, happy on the breast of his father (mother), have I enjoyed myself upon thy bosom."

There is something peculiar in meetings in the open air—in God's great temple. As far back as our history reaches, religionists in an especial manner, from time to time, have sought some spot under the blue arched canopy where they could breathe freely, and commune with higher intelligences. And as we look over Bible history, we find recorded upon its pages that God, when He was about to reveal some new truth, or give some new commandment to his servants, and desired to draw near unto them, and draw them nigh unto himself for that purpose, He called them to some secluded place in the vale, or on the mountain, away from the multitudinous throng and busy hum of life, that they might the more easily hear the voices of messengers which He sent unto them, and receive their ministrations of love. For, as God is love, there can nothing emanate from Him but what will eventuate in love, and, in the final issue, be to the soul as the dews of the morning from the everlasting hills. By this, it would seem that there may be clearer perceptions of Divine truth, and the spiritual senses be unfolded and intensified to a greater degree in the vast temple which God hath made, than within the walls of any house built by human hands.

When he was about to teach Abraham lessons of faith and obedience, He called him to ascend a mountain, apart from his kindred and country, and there He communed with him, and put his fidelity to the severest test. Not for himself alone, was Abraham's faith tried, but for the race. He was a representative man. He passed through that severe ordeal unscathed, and for his unflinching fidelity to the right he was called Abraham the Faithful. And, to-day he stands as a beacon light upon that mountain, and as a reproof to this disobedient and faithless generation.

Again, when God raised up his servant Moses, through whom He gave a new code of laws to the ancient Jews, instituted a high school of learning, and appointed Moses the principal, He brought him to Mount Sinai, and led him up thither, and, through appointed agencies, poured out his spirit upon him, and Moses there received such manifestations of the Divine presence that the mountain shook, and himself and people quaked with fear and reverential awe. He became a medium of the greatest manifestation of spiritual power upon material things—the most complete blending of spirit and matter—of any upon record, and was the greatest minister of physical truth. We will not tarry longer with the more ancient people, who sought the open temple to make their strongest vows of consecration, and to receive new hopes, new impulses, and new aspirations; we will pass by the prophetic seers, and only, as we journey along, take note that the spiritual waters gradually rose higher and higher, until we find ourselves with Jesus and the twelve.

How often did Jesus go forth to some favorite mountain! to a desert place or garden, leading his little band thither, that with them he might pour forth strong cries to his Heavenly Father and Mother! and to teach his disciples important truths concerning the kingdom of God! And who has ever been able to speak words so rich in principle, so full of promise, so binding upon the conscience, and so free from human taint, as is the sermon on the Mount, which he delivered?

Ah, then the Christ spirit spake as never man spake! We never tire of reading or repeating that sermon. It has passed the lips of millions, and still it is new. Was it not a lamp lighted from the great source of Light, by direct inspiration at that time, whose light can never be extinguished or hid, and placed upon a hill to illumine the Pilgrim's path down through the ages? How plainly the Christian's duty, life and character is marked out in that sermon. Let its light shine, and may its power be felt!

And how profound and heavenly must have been the season when Jesus and his three loved disciples went together to the Mount, where Jesus was transfigured before them, and their vision was opened to see those two spirits—Moses and Elias—with whom he was in communion! True, they did not fully comprehend the significance of that interview, and Peter thought if they could build tabernacles for Jesus, Moses and Elias, they would take up their abode in that mountain, and there they could often commune with them. Their spiritual emotion was so great that they exclaimed: "It is good to be here!" Who can wonder that they wished to retain those spirits, and the heavenly influence which pervaded their sphere? Let us seek to draw such pure and heavenly influences around us to-day, that we also may say, "It is good for us to be here!"

Oral Confession.

Why should I orally confess to man? is the first and most important question the Christian Shaker is called to answer. On the underlying principles embodied in the right performance of this work, depends the prosperity of the spirit's travel away from the entanglements of sin.

As God himself is the breath of life in man, it is evident that all souls have latent within them the motive to begin their progress towards Him, and it becomes the first labor of the teacher of righteousness to inspire souls with the faith that they are the ones called, and promised forgiveness, and they shall have power given to rise in life if they will. "Come unto me all ye weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Souls do not rise from a sinful state without a full knowledge of the effect of sin; the avenues of its approach; and a thorough sense of shame at the digression from the state of innocence implanted in their creation. This requires deep thought; conflicts terribly with the passionate element within, until this knowledge is obtained. This is the first, severest and most important phase of confession, without which any verbal statement is useless, liable to be dishonest and undertaken for mere hope of present absolution, yielding no victory. It is this spirit of close self-examination that has enabled thousands of noble witnesses in the past and present to contend successfully with evil. To the discerning eye of faith, all the moral virtue, the Christianity and victory over wrong, is the sequence of confession, and without confession of sin there is no real faith in Christ. "Confess your faults one to another," indicates the work of the Primitive Christians; "Now, go thy way and sin no more," implies that sin had been confessed. Is the artless confession of the child to its mother, "I stole the apple," or, "Father, I did tell a lie," less binding on the maturer child, who, with greater experience and strength of spirit, should know and shun the evil before him? If the humiliation is too great, at what price shall we be bought, and what of the fact, "Except ye become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom?"

Man, being made in the image of God, and receiving a breath of His life, we hope to find in all grades of human development evidence of those laws which ultimately are to govern, and lead to happiness. To instance the involuntary use of the direct statement of facts, as a medium of healing to the wounded spirit, how often do those who are weighed down with grief or guilt, the consequence of some misstep, seek a near friend to help them bear the trial of soul, and what so likely to soothe the mind with a feeling of forgiveness as this knowledge? "I have honestly appreciated my wrong, and confessed the fact, and God has promised to forgive;" hereby realizing that "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

There is a restraint put upon our desires, by suffering the consequences of violated law, as the sickness and pain inflicted by intemperance; but, does this restraint work a moral elevation above the reach of self-interest? or, does the spirit's elevation commence where self-interest has finished its work?

We know there is a manner of confession only unto death, in which the carnal mind glories in its shame, or unfeelingly cries, "Lord, thou knowest I am the chief of sinners," and sins accordingly. We have also a faith, eternal as the spirit, in a confession unto life, whereby the soul can disrobe from every sinful element; the lusts of the world; its intemperance, ambitions and pride; its abuse of the beautiful, to corrupt it and bring it under bondage to self. This is the gospel that Jesus sent his disciples into all the world to teach; and in the goodness of God we rejoice that in this, our day, He has proclaimed the same testimony again, by the same spirit now making itself manifest in the followers of, or believers in, the mission of Ann Lee, who confess their sins; nor this alone, but do forsake them, thus engaging in the only acceptable repentance.

HENRY HOLLISTER, Mt. L.

The advantage of living does not consist in length of days, but in the right improvement of them.

There is a treasure which no self-seeking being ever found; which no created hand can bestow or take away; which no outward events or revolutions can destroy. It is an inward consciousness of the presence and participation of the Divine nature, gradually but certainly renewing the soul, purifying the affections, destroying the sensual and building up the heavenly. In a word, it is the conscious, eternal evidence given to the soul by the Divine and infallible voice within, which says: "Behold me, creating all things anew."

Fair Dealing.

"Render, therefore, to all their dues."—PAUL.

Selfishness is a strongly marked trait of human nature. It not only appropriates whatever it can grasp, but refuses to others that which justly belongs to them. Personal freedom seems to it a good, but it is not content with its own; it must deprive as many as possible of their liberties, merely for its own gratification. Wealth it esteems a desirable thing, but far more desirable when it makes the strongest possible contrast with poverty. Honor is an inestimable advantage, but only that sort which inflates its possessor to extraordinary dimensions. Honor that may be possessed equally by all men is to it an absurdity. The degradation of others, the poverty of others, the tears of anguish caused by selfishness, it regards not, only as it may gain some advantage from them. It assumes numerous forms, and decks itself with a variety of costumes, all of which are extremely gratifying to it.

In the light of Christ's teaching, what is patriotism, but selfishness under the guise of a principle ennobling human nature? As often expressed, it is mere diabolism. "Our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country." Our country, whether right or wrong—still, "our country." There is no need of arguing that such expressions are contrary to the precepts of Jesus—all will admit it; but is it not true that these express the real spirit of patriotism? This will be denied by many who advocate an honorable love of country, and claim nothing for the land of their own birth but what they are willing to concede to others. It may be asked, then, where is their patriotism? They claim for all equal advantages of whatever kind. Has not their patriotism, then, enlarged itself to the love of general humanity? When the individual ceases to regard his own pleasures, his own liberties, his own welfare as objects to be sought for, regardless of the rights and interests of others, he loses the character of a selfish person, and has acquired that of general benevolence. Patriotism, when it has passed beyond the bounds of Fatherland, and takes the wide world in its embrace, has lost its distinctive character, and may as well abandon its name. But there are many who find it difficult to see any good beyond the narrow limits of their own country, or even the particular portion of it in which they were born. Hence arise national and sectional prejudices, the fruitful source of wars.

This narrow spirit exhibits itself not only in the national divisions among men, but also in their religious parties. Indeed, it is as strongly entrenched within the walls of the various religious bodies, as anywhere else. These walls its eyes cannot pierce, and it will not venture high enough to look over them, or it might behold without, beautiful landscapes of hill and dale, field and forest, and fertilizing streams, equally attractive with anything it can see within. This spirit is invariably strengthened by sectarian organization. Let it be once embodied, and it gains the magnetic force of the whole body. Organization is understood to be the marshalling of force in battle array; the building of fortresses on inaccessible heights,

Probably one reason why the Spiritualists have persistently refused to organize into one body, is the fear of shutting in among themselves just such narrow prejudices as they see in the various religious organizations, and thereby perpetuating them. And yet it may be a question whether they have avoided these prejudices altogether by refusing to organize. Would that which does not already exist be included in the body, or would organization create it? They claim to believe in a God of love, just as Jesus Christ did, yet many of them wish it distinctly understood that they have discarded the Christian name. They believe in immortality, as he did, yet say they are not Christians; they admit the fact of intercourse between beings in and out of the body, just as Jesus did, yet they are not Christians. They claim to have enlarged views of Deity; to believe in the ultimate welfare of every individual of the human family; yet the same views have been held for the past century by Unitarians and Universalists—Christian bodies. They take their name from the fact of their having positive evidence of the existence of the human spirit after the death of the body, and of constant intercourse between the dwellers in the spirit world, and those who still have their residence upon the earth. The same has been maintained from the beginning by Shakers, who accept the name of Christian because originally it signified a believer in God as infinite love; in immortality, or the unending existence of all human beings; in eternal life, or the life of God in the soul of man, as the privilege of all who will seek it; and in holiness, as the only means by which eternal life is gained. If Spiritualists can gain it otherwise, then may they with propriety say they are not Christians; if not, is it exactly fair to discard the name, because under it the worst errors and the basest lives have been cloaked? Would it not be just as consistent to refuse the boon of life altogether because every blessing which God has bestowed upon man has been perverted?

But Jesus Christ, it has been said, has taught nothing better than other sages, who preceded him by centuries, have taught, and there is no propriety in adopting his name to the exclusion of others; it is, therefore, better to reject them all. Nature's God reveals himself impartially to all, and has not given his truth to the exclusive care of any one. That is so, and yet these truths exist in different persons in vastly different degrees. The life of God in Christ was manifested in a degree superior to that which was in those who preceded him, as his spirit and life evinced; and such as follow him, in wholly discarding the narrow, selfish life, as he did, attain to the same degree of the divine life that he did. "All things are theirs." It is true, the God of impartial love reveals himself to all; it is, then, right to acknowledge him in all. Not in error, nor in vice, which we are all free to combat, but in man as man; in whatever virtuous principle we can discover, whether in the individual or any collection of persons. If all would have more regard for these, and less for those things which offend their tastes, or, more properly, their prejudices, there would be fewer wars among the nations, less strife and bitterness among the religious sects, and, in a time not far distant, a degree of harmonious action among all classes that would effect the happiest results.

Our ignorance of each other is the cause of many, if not the most of our disputes. Selfish surmises bring about distrust and enmities. We dare not look each other in the face, hence we cherish respecting each other mere fancies—monsters, in place of the men and women that actually surround us. What though this large body and that, bearing the Christian name, "have caused it to be blasphemed," by reason of their violation of the laws of the Divine Master; they have nevertheless done much to benefit the world, and individuals among them all have been noble examples of every virtue. There are multitudes who have never borne this name, to whom it has not been significant of any special excellence, yet they have blessed the world in many ways. Let us exalt whatever is good, and cease to dwell on the evil, and then shall we more easily "overcome the evil with the good;" and whatever excellence any of us may have that others have not, will be the more readily acknowledged and accepted.

My Home.

My Shaker home, my happy home!
No spot on earth so dear to me;
And if abroad my thoughts do roam,
They soon return again to thee.

The trees, the houses and the land,
Are pleasant objects to my eyes;
And dearer still, a loving band—
Companions dear, I love and prize.

My faith, more precious still, I find
Is that which holds me in this way;
Not earth, with all her wealth combined,
Can lure me from my home to stray.

Most hallowed spot, my Shaker home!
My interest and my all 's in thee!
And from thee I will never roam,
There's naught on earth so dear to me.

And while life's journey I pursue,
In my sweet home I love so well,
I'll keep my heavenly home in view—
My future home, where angels dwell.

J. C. JILSON, Shirley.

Love.

Hail! lovely one, and teach me what I ask—
Whence art thou come, and where is thine abode?
What climate dost thou favor most? and where Canst thou ever be found? Dost thou fix thy Home amidst perpetual flowers, whose soft and Fragrant breath spreads balm upon the dewy air;
Whose beauteous leaves, of velvet touch, cast far and Near a glowing light and hue on all around,
Shut in by towering trees, and scented shrubs;
Whence singing birds, with plumage gay, pour Floods of music on the listening ear; causing
The heart quite to forget all else?
Dost thou walk ever with the rich and Powerful ones, on velvet carpets spread out for Thy convenience? looking on naught
That can give pain, or cast a shadow on thy Smiling face?

Does pity never stir thy heart? and is thy Bliss complete when thou art far removed
From all who seek thy aid? or
Dost thou dwell in wilds unknown to busy,
Bustling feet, where man does sometimes Seek to hide even from himself, and from the Outer world; holding communion with his
God, and all the orbs on high?

"Hold! simple one! nor let thy mind be caged
And fettered fast with thoughts like these!—
My name is Love!

From God I came; and to his throne do straight

Ascend the blessed Beings, whom my power
Hath taught. On earth I also dwell;
My power is known to all; and in no destined
Spot do I my home locate.

In lofty palaces of state I sometimes stray,
But oftener am I found amidst the lowly
Ones of earth, whose simple tones make music
On mine ear.

To truth, indeed, most closely I'm allied,
And walk with none who slight her men,
Or cover with a veil her virtuous deeds
With scornful lip. Strife flees at my Approach, and hides abashed, poor meagre thing,
That ayes the powerful mind, and seeks Ascendancy as such. I love him not!

'Tween me and him a mark is set,
And when, like fiery steed of war, anxious
To plunge into the strife, led on by human ire
With dripping steel—or, like the serpent's
Rage, hissing its maddened spite—it rushes
On, reckless of friend or foe, there I am not.
I leave, in dire distress, such vile abodes,
And enter not 'till all is calm, and those Poor ones, whom hate hath served, return
And seek for me. Then often bitter tears are Shed that I am gone, and in my stead
Hate takes a local stand. No genial hand
Outstretched to grasp its kind, but callous
Heart, and words that wound, embitter all Life's joys. Angels look down with pity on
The scene, and mourn that mortal man will Thus his highest peace and comfort spoil.

My mission I fulfill.

"Peace on the earth, good will to man," is my Continual aim. The prattling infant and the Hoary head alike I claim for mine; and often
Lay the shining locks of youth, most trustingly
Amidst the silver hair of age: then stand and Point, that all may see how blessed is my work!
While Virtue's smiling face assents.

I call aloud to all: "Come, enter in my train,
And I will give to you more than the earth
Doth yield in joy and bliss. The cup which Fell misfortune holds I'll sweeten with a Simple drug, ere proffered to thy lips; and Oft assuage the keenest thirst of pain, and Make thy dying couch feel soft and easy
By my gentle touch.

Though some my name mistake, or misapply,
Or borrow for some selfish end, yet unchanged
I remain; and when the counterfeit appears
All see it is not me! Companionship with Virtuous deeds alone I hold; and when with Sinful lip my name is spoke, the mask a Single eye can penetrate, and see beneath
My borrowed vest a hideous form!
Then look for me where I am found, and Listen to my kindly words, for they are True, and unto Heaven will lead thee on."

AURILLA WHITE, Shakers, N. Y.

Where is God?

He's in the kindly faces of parents, teachers, friends,
And in the godly graces which love with chiding blends;

He's in the tender sympathy one feels for other's woes,
And in the warm affection with which the heart o'er-flows.

All honest, upright actions, no matter here or there,
Bespeak God's glorious presence, and God's peculiar care.

He's in the beauteous blossom, and in the whispering breeze,

And in the sparkling sunbeams which dance among the trees;

He's in the sounding music of every rippling rill,
And in the bird's sweet melody, on every woodland hill;

He's in the grasses waving so gracefully and green,
And in the luscious fruitage of autumn, God is seen.

In all, where life is teeming, there God our Father dwells,

And with his gracious goodness earth's mighty bosom swells.

In the sun's sweet morning rising, in the pearly drops of dew,

And the dawn-tide's bright effulgence his glorious presence view;

When it retires at evening, in gorgeous, grand array,
We see therein Jehovah's mysterious majesty!

When the gentle moon arises, and unveils her queenly face,

She but reflects an image of his wondrous, loving grace;

And in the blue, arched heavens, bespangled o'er with gold,

Our God's unrivalled beauty and changeless love is told!

In the fury of the elements, when thunder shakes the main,

And in the silent grandeur of the lightning's lurid flame;

In affliction's fearful tempest, in the spirit's peaceful calm,

Alike we see our Maker—the loving, Great I Am!

Where sin is not, there God is found—in life that's pure and clean,

And that theology's not sound that will not life redeem.

HANCOCK.

"Should Christians Dance?"

A correspondent of The Religious Telescope, Dayton, O., asks, "Should Christians Dance?"
it answering in the negative, expresses wonder, that any one who believes in giving both soul and body entirely to God's service, should ask such a question. We wonder if it ever read of David's dancing before the ark "with all his might?" Of the beautiful daughter of the high priest, who went forth with timbrels and dances to greet the conquerors? Does it recall the circumstance, that when the prodigal son returned, he heard music and dancing?
and that out of that house came one, representing our heavenly Parent, God? Will it be so good as to read the 12th and 13th verses of 31st Jeremiah, and ponder, particularly long on the latter verse? We are glad to hear this question asked. Will not some anxious ones inquire, "Should Christians Fight or Marry, or gratify their appetites in unchristian lusts?
should Christians hold private property?
should the Christians of one Church be both rich and poor? if so, by whose authority or permission? did the founder of Christianity inaugurate the new doctrine by permitting the above licenses or by abrogating them?"

There are many practices, worse than dancing, in which professional Christians engage without any seeming compunction; but which are disgraceful, and impossible for the practical follower of Christ to endorse. Admitting that David and Miriam were not Christians, yet they are revered by professional Christians, who seem to take no umbrage at their acts. We assert, that Christians do dance; and further, that when professors of Christianity shall all have forsaken their fleshly lusts, their pride, and worldly ambitions generally, they will dance with great joy at their deliverance from these bonds; and still further, that the clergy of to-day, will be among the most powerful dancers.

Publications, previous to "THE SHAKER," issued by Believers concerning their doctrines, were issued too soon for the appreciation of the world, and may now be laid aside as historical.
Something fresh, like new discourses, from the fountain, is always the more palatable. A great many of our fellow beings are now no doubt looking and wishing for something new and higher than the old standard of theology.
I have been astonished (particularly in the time of the war) to hear of individuals who had never seen nor heard of the Shakers. So for the sake of sincere souls we are glad to believe "THE SHAKER" is in season. The information respecting the Shakers in this quarter (Ky.) has mostly been founded on slanderous reports.

Light hath need to come out of the East. May not the Eastern world be properly called masculine? The theory or germ of all arts, sciences, politics, governments and religions that have issued therefrom, never seem to fully develop until they reach the American (or more justly the Columbian) soil. She (America) will take all theories through the ordeal of righteousness, and if not approved, will by her be corrected, modified or expelled from the natal sphere; so that persecution, the engine of extreme intolerance, never can find an abiding foothold on her soil "while the world stands." The fond dreamers of monarchy, aristocracy, slavery, and of vicarious atonement, fore-ordination, election and reprobation, without regard to works; Christians living in sin, and believing in a physical resurrection, are already disturbed and uneasy in their slumbers by the sound of the gospel trumpet. Think, too, of the foolish theory of being born and regenerated without the co-operation of a Mother! It is apt to be the case when a child is ignorant of having a Mother, it cannot know much about its Father. All errors are shades or casts of ignorance, and ignorance abides in darkness—sin.

Is not Shakerism the only doctrine on earth built on the Spirit, and draweth together and formeth a body? If this is the case, will not all others divide, subdivide and scatter to the four winds, because of being built on the letter, not on the Spirit? If the institution of Believers had been thus started it would have gone down long ago. But being neither the planning of man nor woman, it has withstood much prejudice, opposition, persecution, privation, fatigue, hunger and thirst, heat and cold, day and night, adversity and prosperity. The work is of God, and the eulogy to Him belongs. The "well done" is due in glory to God. Man is but a worm of the dust. We believe that a new cycle and progressive step is rapidly approaching, and can welcome the dawn of a brighter day.

JOHN BARNETT, Pleasant Hill, Ky.

Answers to Correspondents.

Q. Is God a Trinity—Father, Son and Holy Ghost?
A. To us, God is a duality, male and female—Heavenly Father, Wisdom, and Comforting Mother Love.

Q. Was not man made in God's image?
A. Certainly; "male and female, God created them."

Q. Is not man a trinity—body, soul and spirit?
A. Man, being created in the image of God, is male and female—dual.

Q. Is not man a trinity—understanding, will, affection?
A. Man has five senses and many affections.

Q. Does not Paul say: "May your body, soul and spirit be blameless?"

A. We believe you have quoted correctly.

Q. Does not scripture say: "Dividing asunder soul and spirit?"

A. It does.

Q. What is the difference between soul and spirit?

A. To which we give an individual opinion, thus: The body is the soul's covering, or house; the soul is to the spirit what the body is to the soul. All created things may have a soul, but the human soul alone contains a spirit. "And God breathed into (the animal) man the breath of life, and he became a living soul." This breath allies man to his Maker closer than aught else. The soul may wander into the ways of the transgressor—become dead through sin. Thus may the soul be corrupted; but the spirit is incorruptible, inapproachable by sin, and this spirit will lead the deadened soul back, through sufferings, to its Maker—God. The spirit and soul are immortal.

Q. Is not God the same yesterday, to-day and forever?

A. We believe God to be eternal—without change. Some of us have had revealed that all that has been called God, has not represented the infinite Creator to perfection. Each cycle passed has had its God—the best known representative spirit. The Jews had theirs—it permitted them to marry, fight, hold private property, etc. The true Christians have their God represented by the Christ spirit to Jesus and others. This representative of God will not permit its subjects to marry, fight, "nor possess aught they can call their own." Under the dispensation of Moses, God permitted and counselled retaliation; but under the more perfect type of the Infinite, the rule is, "Love even your enemies!" The God which Christ represents introduces us to a life that is eternal in the present tense—a virgin life, eternal here, and no change needs occur that it may enter the abodes of the blessed. Not so with those who fight, who are husbands or wives, or who engage in sinfulness. To us, the Spirit Christ is a fitting representative of the Infinite. *

Society Record.

MT. LEBANON.—The South Family have been improving the appearance of the village by clapboarding their laundry building—previously plastered externally; several new slate roofs are noticeable also. Second Family have razed the old landmark south of the dwelling-house—quite an improvement. They have slated the roof of the office-barn, surmounting the same with cupola and a glittering vane, which seems inviting the wind to blow from the right direction. Second Order have repainted their dwelling, rising quite high to do it. They have also re-roofed several buildings. Cart shed has had new foundation. Cow barn has been considerably repaired. The Church Family have put on 150 squares of slate this season. We do not like the black paint on their beautiful, new fence. North: This family is re-roofing brick shop, and making many other improvements. Canaan Families are looking beautifully; paint, with hard labor, have made a wonderful transformation! May God bless lower family—Canaan! The Society have made a donation of $1,200 to Groveland.

WATERVLIET.—Company of visitors started for Mt. L. on the 8th. South Family have repainted several buildings, and improved dooryard considerably. Res. Ed. of THE SHAKER officiated at Mt. L. Church, August 6th. This Society donated $800 to Groveland—a brotherly offering.

GROVELAND.—The ground, blackened by the late fire, is already improved by better buildings than those burned. Much regret is felt that the beautiful trees destroyed cannot be restored, only by years of patience. "So God works through the ages—when the old disappears, something better takes its place. 'Be ye followers of God, dear children.'" W. H. B. No one wishes Groveland a streak of good luck, more than THE SHAKER.

ENFIELD, CONN.—Church Family have built a new barn, 50 x 60, and are improving their grass considerably. "Our Second Family are building a large Sisters' shop and wash-house, the progress of which, if noted monthly, would be rather quaint and simple. Good health here."

SHIRLEY.—Plenty of rain, of health and of blackberries—the latter twelve miles distant. Early Rose potatoes, an abundant yield—thirteen hills make a bushel! If there is a saint on the earth, the Boston Cultivator makes John Whiteley appear as one!

WATERVLIET, O.—Harvest closed, commonly good yield; fruits, excepting berries, very scarce. General health.

PLEASANT HILL.—Eight Swedes landed here on July 30th. A protracted drouth still prevails; late crops and pastures will be very short. Br. Rufus Bryant is able to walk with staff. Thank him, kindly, for getting better. He intended starting for South Union on the 8th August. Hortency G. Hooser, one of the earliest settlers of this place, has sent us a communication for October. She lately observed, that "she had been trying a long while to make nothing of herself, but could not accomplish it, and would have to abandon it."

SOUTH UNION.—The boiler for engine, used for pumping water, exploded, injuring engineer Davis considerably. Paint has been doing wonders here.

Should be glad to get data from each Society by first of each month; unless received by this time, we cannot insert.

Elder F. W. Evans has been successfully prosecuting a course of lectures in London. We have received The Globe containing a good report of one. THE GOLDEN AGE, the most excellent of N. Y. journals, contained a characteristic letter from him in Aug. 2. We received a letter for THE SHAKER from his pen, but too late for publication. He returns on the 24th of August.

Home Again.

When drawing nigh unto the wharf, on the steam-tug that landed us from the Atlantic, it was a happy sound when some of the officers said: "Your people are waiting for you." And it was a joyful meeting with a company of Elder brethren and Elder sisters from different families, among whom was the ever-welcome presence of "the Managing Editor," G. A. Lomas. How good to meet with loved ones after long and distant absence!

Having sailed on the 1st of July in the Atlantic, under Captain Murray, we landed from her, now under the command of Captain Perry, on the 4th of September.

We have received from my dear friend and fellow-traveler, J. M. Peebles, the representative of the Spiritualists of America, the following communication for the little SHAKER, which will speak for itself. F. W. EVANS.

STEAMER ATLANTIC,
WHITE STAR LINE,
September 3, 1871. }

Editor of THE SHAKER:

It is Sunday at sea. The mimic bell has summoned the passengers to the saloon for divine worship. Bibles, prayer-books, hymn-books, are strewn around loosely upon the table. A pulpit is improvised—all is ready. The English clergyman, richly vested, appears, to read the service. The measured mechanical music now reaches our ears. Is this serving God? Does God require any such cold, formal service? Would not feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and educating the masses in the principles of justice, equality and charity, be infinitely more acceptable in the sight of God and angels? Elder F. W. Evans, ourself and a few others retired—retired as a protest against making the English church service a sort of religious steam-boat "church and state" institution on board the White Star line of steamers. No American, touched with the fires of freedom, or thoroughly alive to the genius of this progressive age, can for a moment encourage any thing that tends to a church and state establishment—the entering wedge of which is the strenuous effort now being made by sectarists to put "God," the trinitarian God, into the Constitution. This done, and the Declaration of Independence becomes a nullity, and religion degenerates into theology, bigotry and persecution unto death. This done, and farewell to freedom of speech and press—farewell to that freedom which now grants to all the organizations, orders and denominations of the land the privilege of worshipping God after the "dictates of their own conscience." The virus of churchal sectarianism is as poisonous to-day as in the sixteenth century. Let Americans be on their guard.

ENGLISH LANDS.

Travel in any direction from London by the interlacing railway conveyances, and you involuntarily pronounce England a garden. Industry has seemingly carried cultivation to perfection. There is a neatness, a thrift in the agricultural districts seldom seen in America, where lands are cheap, and where wide prairies are waiting to respond to plow and sower. Though meadows, hedge-rows and waving harvest-fields charm the eye, the soul is burdened with the knowledge that only the few own the soil. Land monopoly is the rule in the British kingdom. Few seem to ponder upon the fact, that the right to life presupposes the further right of each individual to sufficient soil to sustain that life. The land-holders in her "Majesty's realm" are rapidly decreasing. It is said, and without contradiction, so far as we know, that a hundred and fifty persons own to-day one-half of the land in England; while twelve proprietors hold, and professedly "own," nineteen and a-half millions of acres in Scotland. Magnificent mansions, elegant parks, and vast deer forests with odious game laws, abound for the comfort and amusement of English noblemen, while the starving poor beg for bread. London journals reported one hundred and fifty thousand paupers in the city alone, last March. It is also estimated that there are a million more women than men in England. Poverty and dissatisfaction are on the increase. Elder Frederic bore a strong testimony, in all his public meetings that we attended, against the terrible condition of things in Britain—the land of his birth. Is not America, England's younger brother, imitating her in sundry wicked schemes of land monopoly? Capital is continually concentrating, and, through cunning and cupidity, banking institutions, railroad corporations and land monopolies are becoming fearful engines of power, making the rich richer, the poor poorer. When, oh! when, will selfish, land-grabbing Americans feel the heaven-voiced principle of equality—feel the pentecostal fire—feel the descending baptismal flame—and verify the conviction by this apostolic practice: "And they that believed had all things in common"?

THE ENGLISH MISSION.

A long time ago, we read the great speech of Elder F. W. Evans, made at the Rutland Convention, in Vermont. Some six years since, I met him in New York. Handing me several Shaker works to read, he utterly astounded me with his perfect familiarity with spiritualists and spiritualism. He had been converted from cold materialism to a knowledge of the future existence through his own personal mediumship. He further surprised me by relating wonderful manifestations he had witnessed in their communities, and through our media who had fled at different times to their societies for rest and mental recuperation. This interview interested me in Shakerism, its testimonies in favor of present inspirations, communications, peace principles, temperance, etc., etc. Work with all true workers for reform, has been my motto for years. Denominational names are but "tinkling cymbals." To this end, those joint conventions of Spiritualists and Shakers were held last winter in Cleveland, and Troy, N. Y., to the satisfaction and mutual profit, we believe, of both parties. Elder Frederic's first London meeting was held in Cleveland Hall. The audience was composed mostly of Spiritualists and Secularists. Mrs. Emma Hardinge was present, and expressed herself highly delighted with his radical utterances against orthodox theologies and monarchical governments. He also publicly testified to the facts of Spiritualism. The great meeting was held in St. George's Hall, Langham place. W. Hepworth Dixon, Esq., author of "New America," "Spiritual Wives," etc., occupied the chair. The large hall was densely packed before the hour for service. After the lecture commenced, a continual stream reached the outer door, and then left, unable to gain admission. There were present, members of Parliament, distinguished journalists, prominent Darwinians, clergymen, Spiritualists, Secularists, social reformers. The music was excellent. And never have we seen greater attention paid to a speaker than to Elder Evans upon this occasion. The "Spirit of the Lord was upon him." Occasionally there was a dissent; as, for instance, when he advised the English to dispense with the "bishops and noblemen constituting the 'House of Lords,' and put women in their places!" He further shocked them when declaring that the repenting, warring "God of Israel" was nothing but a tutelary divinity—and that the seventy communities of Shakers in America were so many communities believing in present revelations and spirit ministrations. As a whole, the audience was charmed with the simplicity, sincerity and solid logic of the speaker. Mr. Dixon did himself great credit as the presiding officer. To James Burns, editor of Medium and Human Nature, and publisher of spiritualist literature in London, belongs the honor of getting up this and a series of meetings for the Elder in the provinces. At several of these gatherings he presided as chairman, making at each an appropriate opening address. Friend Burns is an inspired man, with great versatility of talent, and Mrs. Burns is truly a "helpmeet." They have two rosy-cheeked boys, perfect specimens of health, that never tasted of meat nor medicine in their lives.

A GROVE MEETING.

It was our privilege to be present at the first large open-air demonstration of Spiritualists in England. The meeting was held at Bowling Hill, near the city of Bradford. Those gifted in calculation, estimated that there were two thousand present. It was a grand spectacle. Mr. Burns, elected president by acclamation, made the preliminary speech, earnest, eloquent and catholic. Elder Frederic, ourself and others addressed the hungering crowd. It was a grand success. At the second session, after the Elder had given a detailed account of his conversion from Robert Owen Materialism to Spiritualism, he elaborately elucidated the leading principles of Shakerism. The interest was intense, and the questions interesting. The Elder showed great wisdom in answering them. Take these as samples.

"If Shakers do not marry, how do they increase their communities?" "By gathering in from the world those who have ripened up for the sickle—ours is the harvest order." "But did not God in the beginning of creation command men to multiply and replenish the earth?" "I do not know, not having been there at the time; and then, other than the instincts of the earthly nature, a special command from God to insects, beasts and men to 'replenish the earth,' would seem quite useless. They certainly do such business now without any direct command from God." "Well, if all should turn Shakers, would it not run the world out?" "I apprehend no immediate danger of all men turning Shakers—the cross is too great and the life is too self-denying. And, as for running the world out, the tendency, considering foeticide, abortions and illegitimate offspring, seems to 'run' in a different direction at present. But, if the world should be 'run out,' the calamity would not be very serious, inasmuch, as upon the Darwinian basis, there are plenty of monkeys in Asia and Africa to get up a new race; and this might be an improvement!" "But you oppose marriage." "Nay, friend, not marriage per se. The marriage relation is legitimate on the earthly plane, for reproduction, as Moses taught. But ours is the resurrection order—a degree above—and bears the same relation to the world that the spirit bears to the body."

My work in England was mostly of a business character, relative to the publication of Higgins' "Anacalypsis," new edition of "Jesus—myth, man or God," and the gathering of facts for the European department of the Year-Book of Spiritualism for 1872.

PERPETUAL COMMUNISM.

Without pronouncing judgment at this time either for or against the ascetic orders of the ages, I confess myself astonished, after reading the histories of the East, at the silver threads of celibacy and communism that run like crystal waters through all the nations of antiquity. Jamblichus, writing of Pythagoras' visit to Italy, says:

"More than two thousand, in the first public discourse of Pythagoras, were arrested by his doctrine, who, together with their wives and children, forming an immense auditory, and having founded the community called Græcia Magna, received from him laws and ordinances, which they regarded as maxims of divine authority, and which in no instance they transgressed, but which the whole assembly with one accord obeyed; being admired and proclaimed blessed by all around. They had their goods in common." (De Vita Pyth., c. 6, p. 22.)

The learned Philo, writing of the wise men of Egypt, observes that

"The object of these philosophers is manifest from the title which they assume. The men, and even the women, call themselves THERAPEUTÆ, that is, Healers, and this with propriety, as professing a medical art superior to that practiced by men of the world. The latter profess to heal only the bodies, while the former cure the souls of men, when seized by disorders, when occupied by lusts or by an innumerable multitude of other vices. The persons who profess this art, embrace it not from education, nor from the persuasions of others, but because they are seized by the love of Heaven. Thinking themselves already dead to the world, they desire only a blessed immortal existence. They fix their habitations on the outside of cities, in gardens and villages, seeking retirement, not, I conceive, from religious hatred of mankind, but to avoid a pernicious intercourse with the world. This society now prevails throughout the habitable globe, the members thinking it their duty to share with Greeks and barbarians the consummate blessings they enjoy. They have a sacred apartment in which they perform the mysteries of a holy life. Into this place they bring neither meat nor drink, nor anything but the laws and divinely inspired oracles of the prophets. The idea of God is ever present to their thoughts. Many of them deliver magnificent visions, suggested by their sacred philosophy in the home of repose. Their clothing is plain and simple. They eat no food more costly than coarse bread, regarding plenitude as prejudicial to both body and mind. They practice great humility; and, holding all things equal, each seeks another's good."

The Jewish historian, Josephus, writes thus of the Esseneans:

"They cherish mutual love beyond other men. They reject pleasure as evil; and look upon temperance and a conquest over the passions as the greatest virtue. There prevails among them a contempt of marriage; but they receive the children of others, and educate them as their own. * * * They despise riches, and are much to be admired for their liberality; nor can any be found among them who is more wealthy than the rest. It is a law with them, that those who join their order should distribute their possessions among the members. They wear white apparel; and neither buy nor sell among themselves. They avoid oaths—teach the immortality of the soul, and hold forth the rewards of virtue to be most glorious."

* * * The course of life they pursue is exempt from change or the caprices of fashion, and they bear some resemblance to the communities said to subsist among the Dacians."

The Hindoos had their Rajahs, the Egyptians their Therapeutæ, the Syrians their Esseneans, the Greeks their Pythagoreans, the Romans their Anchorites, and the Mediæval ages their Hermits. These often fled to deserts to escape persecutions. Finding solitude sweet, they remained. Athanasius, Basil, Chrysostom, Gregory of Nazionzen, Jerome, Augustine, Evagrius, Cassians, and others of the first centuries, encouraged or practiced lives of retirement—lives of self-restraint, celibacy, poverty, and the exercise of charity and good deeds towards all men.

When the principles of self-sacrifice, benevolence and mutual love abound among individuals, races and nations as reigning forces, then will dawn the Republic of Plato, the Arcadia of the poets, the Eden of the bards, and the happy-valleys of the seers seen in visions. These golden days are coming. The peace echoes of the Quakers, the reform principles of these seventy Shaker communities, the radical teachings of Elder Frederic, the daring enunciations of William Denton, the brave utterances of Lucretia Mott, the pathetic pleadings of Mary F. Davis, the eloquent orations of Emma Hardinge, and the stirring appeals of other great-hearted philanthropists and speakers, are harbingers of the millennial era. Each religious cycle yields its harvest sheaves. But before the victory, before the shouting of the "harvest home," comes another outpouring of the Revelator's "vial of wrath." Crucifixions precede transfigurations as do thunders the storms that purify the air. A religious-political war-cloud is gathering in the distance. Only the ministry and mediation of spirits can arch this cloud with the rainbow of peace. Let Shakers, Quakers, Secularists, Spiritualists and Liberalists all form a solid phalanx to meet the emergency, using "spiritual weapons" for the pulling down of strongholds and the up-building of the temple of truth.

Life in God.

Intelligence and Love are the primary attributes in the Godhead; all others are subordinate, and move in harmony with these.

Without supreme intelligence, the universe of mind and matter could not exist. No other attribute is adequate to the comprehension and execution of the stupendous whole! Remove intelligence, and what remains?

Love is the feminine in God, the Mother of all their children in the universe. Wisdom is the appropriate use by the Supreme, in the design and creation of the universe of mind and matter. Power is only the inherent force of God in creation. Judgment is only the Omniscient exercise of the divine mind and will.

Love is the attraction of mind and matter, and binds the stupendous whole—the universe of God. Remove love from the human soul, and what remains to time and the children of earth? We should immediately fall asunder and become extinct.

Between supreme intelligence and love there has been an eternal union, co-existence, mutual recognition of excellence, and immutable purpose in the grand design—Perfection absolute!

Love is the magnet of creative intelligence, and draws her children to herself, and the embraces of each other, and contiguity in the procreative union; without love, the sexes are a nullity, and an unmeaning distinction of creation.

We can only reason by the powers of body and mind given us; these powers acting on the objects of time, and, by analogy, necessarily rising to a higher source, give us our ideas of ourselves, and of a Supreme intelligence.

We find ourselves in this lower sphere, male and female, a perfect adaptation of the appropriate, productive power, and the love principle, or passion in co-operation.

By analogy, we ask, are (there) Father and Mother in God? As we are only recipients of their gifts, could they impart attributes not contained in themselves? The whole creation, as far as we comprehend it, is male and female, and the female as Mother, and centre of influence in the family!

Come, ye savans of the earth, these are facts, and logical deductions; we ask you to fairly examine the same, and publish to the world your conclusions.

On this subject we have the testimony of the holy Saviour, in these words: "Have ye not read, that He who made them at the beginning, made them male and female, and said, for this cause, shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh: wherefore they were no more TWAIN, but one flesh." "What, therefore, God has joined together, let no man put asunder." Mark! In the procreative union they are one; so pronounced by God, and so confirmed by the Son.

The teaching of the holy Saviour, not only acknowledges, but confirms the Mosaic account of creation, as male and female, and also their likeness to the Godhead: "And God said, let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, etc. So God created man in His own image, in the image of God created He him; male and female created He them: and God blessed and said unto them, be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it."

This is the record of the Bible, as plain as the English language can make it, as expressed by God himself, that God is male and female; and that Adam and Eve are one, the express image of them or him, as you please.

Those who believe the sacred record, are as sacredly bound to receive His testimony! There can be no shadow of doubt or turning: it is yea, amen!

Three males in the Godhead are a monstrosity, and repugnant to every feeling in humanity! A barren conglomeration of unproductive elements. The holy Saviour never told his disciples that there were three male persons in His Father, and that He was one of them.

But this Trinity is a most mortifying and degrading image, in the Christian (?) galaxy; borrowed, yea stolen from Oriental mythology.

Go into the Hindoo temples, and you will there find his catholic majesty, and the Hindoo worship nearly verbatim to that of the holy See.

The Hindoos, Tartars and others say, the west inherited or borrowed catholicism of their oriental brethren; the catholics deny the charge, and say, the missionaries carried the sacred dogma to the heathen nations; but every oriental scholar knows that the gods belonged originally to the east, and that the west is the dupe of paganism.

The missionary Huc, on his way to China, tarried over winter in the Tartar city of Lassa. Here he made the acquaintance of a young Tartar prince, and spent most of his time in converting the young nobleman. In the spring before his departure, Huc thus addressed his young friend: "I am about to depart on my mission, and wish to have a memorial of my labors. I think you are fully prepared to enter upon the solemn rites of our sacred religion; I propose baptism." Said the prince, "Stop, my worthy friend, you are quite too fast; I have listened to you attentively all winter, and perceive, to my astonishment, that our theologians are identical." "O, well, well," said Huc, "our missionaries have been here, and taught you these sublime truths." "Quite too fast again," said the prince; "Whatever of religion, law, physic and the sciences you have in the west, all are oriental, and the east are your teachers." So Huc departed on his mission, "a wiser if not a better man."

WM. REDMON, U. Village.

In character, in manners, in style, in all things the supreme excellence is simplicity.

Nothing new, nothing great, nothing curious, nothing marvelous, nor even miraculous in creatures, tends in the least to effect the work of regeneration. This is wrought by daily self-denial, mortification and suffering; by quietly and patiently doing and suffering the will of God in preference to our own.

Nothing can long delight him who delighteth not, above all things, in God.

True repentance is turning from evil to good; from self to God.

Tears, without turning, will never be owned for repentance.

Grant, O Heavenly Father, that I may fear nothing but sin; hate none but self; love nothing but thee and thine.

Count not that time lost which is spent in meditation and prayer.

PELHAM.

Innocence.

True innocence is like a bright, lovely jewel; this jewel is easily tarnished. How important then, that we keep it bright by a life, pure and unspotted. We should shun the very appearance of evil, even in thought and feeling.

To my mind, true innocence consists in living a life so pure, that nothing will enter the mind, but what is perfectly refined from all grossness and everything that would lead thereto, so that if our thoughts were written, there would be no occasion for shame. The innocent mind has needs of keeping no guard, nor taking thought, for fear of overstepping the bounds of modesty; for as the heart is, so will be our words and acts.

Innocence will join us to the angels, and fit us to dwell with them.

Thoughts by a Shaker Sister.

David said, "I am fearfully and wonderfully made." This is true of every man and woman. Our life, in all respects, is a wonder. We live and move and have an existence. We breathe—some unseen power keeps the machinery in motion—the heart beats; the tongue moves to sound forth the thoughts of the brain and feelings of the soul, and the ears of others catch those sounds; thus mind meets mind and we impress our thoughts upon others. The eyes, the sole medium through which light is transmitted to the body, are wonderful in their construction. All the members of the human body (if healthy) move in conformity to the will-force, or in unison with the controlling governing wheel of the machine; the intelligence coming through the brain. We eat, we drink, we wake, we sleep. Who can tell how all the vital forces operate? and how the subtle agencies are brought to bear upon the human organism, so as to retain the equilibrium, and preserve the harmonious action of all the parts?

We speak of life and death. Life represents action. "Life is heat; Death is cold," means decay—dissolution. Does the philosopher, the theologian, or the greatest seer of the ages, understand the modus operandi by which this "harp of a thousand strings" is constructed and attuned?

We see an ordinary machine, produced by man's ingenuity or intelligence, and perhaps comprehend how, by wind, steam, or water, as a propelling force, the wheels are set in motion; but the thoughts—the reasoning powers—of human beings, the emotional feelings—feelings of joy and sorrow, of love and hate—who understands their origin, so that they could take us by the hand, and lead us along the path which conducts to the fountain, and reveal the mystery?

"Help, Lord, for the godly man"—the preserver of the earth—"ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men."

Whether the above quotation is applicable to our own time, keen observers of men and things, of cause and effect, must decide.

One thing is certain; that is, "Truth," as applied to practical life, does not, at the present time, "ride (very) prosperously through the land." "All have sinned," have violated the physical and spiritual laws of their being, more or less; and few indeed do good—do right—according to their highest conception of right. Is there a remedy? If so, where is it to be found?

A crucified Jesus has been preached; runners have gone up and down through the land crying, "Lo here! and lo there!" Spiritual teachers and modern prophets have arisen; periodicals and daily journals have become very numerous; and others are springing into life; and now, by the aid of the iron horse, which wends its way among the hills and valleys with almost lightning speed, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, they are conveyed from city to city, to every hamlet and nearly every cottage throughout the civilized land over which the cultivator has passed. Knowledge is thereby increased; but "the wicked continue to do wickedly;" and true understanding, touching the Christian life, is, to a great extent, hidden from mortal sight.

Christendom is full of names—sects. Many churches, with their towering spires pointing somewhere, attract attention from those who are thirsting for the spiritual waters of life, “as the hart panteth for the water brooks,” and they ask the learned divines, “Is righteousness, which maketh men and women righteous, practically righteous, found within these courts?” Their answer is, “No; we rely on the merits of a crucified Jesus! By his stripes we are healed! By his righteousness we shall, in the future, be saved!”

The people known as “Shakers,” have not sought to be numbered with popular Christians—the sects called orthodox. They have dwelt alone, and have preferred to let works, rather than worldly profession and gorgeous display of Church paraphernalia, bespeak their faith. As birds, they have fled to the mountains—the highest revealed spiritual truth—and sought cover “under the wings of the anointed cherub.” There they patiently wait, drinking in inspiration from the celestial spheres, and watch for the bright morning star to arise, the precursor of a new day, when an angel messenger to the present generation will come forth, who will speak unto the Churches and breathe the breath of life into them, and cause them again to “rise and stand upon their feet”—re-baptize them with the same spirit which first called them into being. They have, for a long time, lain as “dead bodies in the streets spiritually called Sodom and Egypt”—sensual pleasure, and the darkness arising therefrom—“where our Lord was crucified.” The carnal life is opposed to the spiritual, and always kills the life of God in the soul.

When the first angel messenger has performed a work, then another angel will follow, who will testify of the dual God, and the dual Christ—a living, risen Saviour, who will walk with those who are willing to enrobe themselves in linen white and clean—virgin purity. Then the voice will be heard, saying: “Come up hither”—to the higher life.

Modern Spiritualism is an angel of light, and has wrought a great change in society. Not a quarter of a century has passed since a believer in spirit communings was called heterodox. Revelation was a thing of the past, except in natural science. Not one spirit friend was welcome to bear a torch-light of truth to this sin-darkened world.

Spirit influences have now become so strong and subtle, that they have found their way into almost every household, and pierced nearly every circle. It is doing its work—shaking old-established creeds and dogmas, “confounding the wisdom” of the hierarchy, and is “bringing to naught the understanding of the prudent.”

In this way, God will pull down what man has builded that is false. Truth alone will stand! All the dashing, surging waves of error and superstition that may beat against it cannot move it! Truth will live! and all who build upon it will live! such will behold a risen Saviour, and feel his power. Truth has no bounds; as it is co-eternal with Deity, so it fills immensity! Error must fall before it. May God, through the medium of his own choosing, speed the work! A. DOOLITTLE.

Inspiration.

A very interesting study, to the observer of Nature, is the combination of its various elements, whether spontaneous or artificial. The solid earth itself, with its ocean and its atmosphere, is the result of this union of elements. One combination produces the delicate plant with its exquisitely beautiful flowers, and another the stately tree—the glory of the vegetable realm. One, the sparkling gem; another, that which gives us the material for our most durable and magnificent edifices. One furnishes that which is agreeable to the sense and productive of health and vigor; another, that which is every way disagreeable and even destructive of life. Separate these into their constituent parts, and the beauty, the fragrance, the solidity, and even their foul and destructive characteristics disappear.

The grand truths to be deduced from these facts are, that the various results which are effected in the material world are all owing to the different combinations of its elements; that these combinations and their results are all under the control of the Divine Mind; are partly within the power of created beings at the present time; and, in the future, so far as they affect man's condition, will be wholly under his control. For, it is not to be supposed that our chemists have arrived at all the ultimates of things in their various analyses of Nature, though they have resolved substances into more than sixty of, what they call, primates or elements. And even Huxley, with his newly discovered protoplasm, is likely to be surpassed by future analysts. Reasoning from what has already been discovered by man in the realms of Nature, it is not contrary to the deductions of sound logic to believe that hereafter he will so far penetrate into what are now its secrets, as to be able to give unerring rules for the maintenance of physical health, and, as a necessary consequence, such as shall have an important bearing upon the moral status. Much has already been done towards “a consummation so devoutly to be wished;” but the manifest uncertainties in our various schools of medicine declare how very far we are yet from that most desirable state of things. And the numerous schools for moral health show that there is, at least, among the masses as much uncertainty respecting the true mode of the soul's salvation as of that of the body. And yet, we have all learned something. We have learned that there are certain influences to be shunned if we would maintain physical health, and others to be earnestly sought after. There are those, also, that affect the moral well-being, equally to be avoided, and others, again, to be ardently desired.

“Evil communications corrupt good manners,” because, like the atmosphere charged with elements that enter not into its constituent parts, they insinuate themselves into the moral system and deposit there what does not belong to the soul. We may shun all these. We live in a physical atmosphere liable to be corrupted by various influences, but we may build our residences above them, so as to be beyond their reach. We are in a world, also, whose moral atmosphere is tainted by various hurtful things, but we may choose that portion of it which is far away from their contaminating influences. The prophetic language of past ages corroborates this. “It shall come to pass in the last days that the mountain of Jehovah's house shall be established in the top of the mountains,” far above the moral miasmas of the marshes below, where the pure breath of heaven completely fills field and forest, avenue and dwelling. The angel that talked with the prophet Zechariah made this declaration: “Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls,” or, literally translated, as country villages; evidently a literal and truthful prophecy of the actual dwelling places of “Jerusalem which is above;” above the old one with its narrow, filthy, disease-producing streets, and its lofty, war-enticing walls, and above everything that is low in its moral and spiritual condition. “I,” says Jehovah, “will be a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory in the midst of her.” He is her protection both from external foes and internal vices, better than walls of stone and gates of brass. The Divine Breath goes through her fields, her streets and her dwellings. It makes music in her groves, moves in her waving grain; and manifests itself in the beauty and fragrance of every flower that greets the eye. Entering into the innermost spirit of every one enrolled as a citizen of this Jerusalem, and working outwardly, it brings everything within him into the completest harmony with the whole.

“Every divinely inspired scripture is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect.” He in whom God breathes the divine life, may impart that life to others, and even his writings, though subject to numerous copyings and translations, will have an influence for good on all after generations, so that the apostle has justly styled such, “God-breathed scripture.” This inspiring influence is not confined to the books of the Bible, whether Catholic or Protestant, but is discovered, also, in the writings of many others, by those whom the Divine Spirit illuminates.

This life-giving breath was that which inspired John Wesley on that memorable occasion when, listening to the reading of Luther's scripture comments, he felt a strange glow in his heart. It was this which gave him “thoughts that breathed and words that burned,” and made him so efficient in turning others to righteousness. If, however, he had given more heed to the word that spoke within him than to those written by Luther, he would have effected a more thorough work than he did; though, it is true, Luther's theology could not shut the divine teachings wholly from his soul. This, also, dwelt largely in George Fox, as a fire within him, constraining him to cry aloud and spare not the vices of his age. This pure breath of Heaven became the permanent life of Mother Ann when she had wrought out her redemption from the lower life; and, in the possession of this, she could say, “If there is anything within me contrary to God, I do not know it.” This was recognized by many of her devoted children as soon as they came into her presence; was felt in her singing, in her words of encouragement, and in her reproofs of sin.

This must be the life-element of the Christian, which shall purge from his entire being whatever does not belong to the life of Heaven; must create within him new desires and dispositions that will, in the end, infinitely surpass the best which he possessed previously. When this is effected within him, then is accomplished in him, in its highest sense, the divine fiat, "Behold, I create all things new!"

Physical Improvement.

It is not a question, but a settled fact, that physical culture and improvement should go hand in hand with spiritual progression. It is uphill work to be good Christians, unless we learn to live rightly, physically, and obey the laws of life and health. A sound mind in a healthy body is the best condition in which to live out the true principles of Christianity, and enable us to do the greatest amount of good, spiritually and physically.

Let us set about the work more earnestly, to correct all the wrong habits of life. Let us learn to take care of our health, keep the digestive organs in good order, being careful not to overtax them. Our food should be healthful, and healthfully prepared; we should eat our food slowly, with thankful hearts and cheerful spirits. There is much said and done to suppress the sin of intemperance in alcoholic drinks, while the great sin of gluttony is winked at; and who is wise enough to tell which is the more deplorable, the more effectual in breaking down the constitution, benumbing the senses, depressing the spirits, and unfitting people for active duty? The Shakers have made some efforts to reform and overcome the wrong habits of life; they have gained some victories, but have more yet to gain. Would it not be well for some to speak through THE SHAKER in regard to these matters? Let the testimony go forth, both to Shakers, and to others who have ideas that need to be shaken. Those living in the order of nature, in the marriage state, should so live as to produce healthy offspring; such as will make good Shakers. The world stands in need of more Shakers, to act as a balancing power; to keep in check the increasing tide of human depravity. It is for the world's interest to have more good Shakers on the earth.

Then, let all be awakened to feel the need of coming up higher; of living holier and practicing more self-denial; and let all who feel that they are able to bear the Shaker cross and live the life, be Shakers.

WM. H. WETHERBEE, Shirley, Mass.

The End of the World.

This subject is being agitated at the present time with increased animation. "The World's Crisis" is positive of this event occurring within five years; when the earth will collapse, and Jesus make an appearance to save Second Adventists from the otherwise general destruction. We have before us a pamphlet,* written with much sincerity, and compiled with much mathematical ingenuity, declarative of the destruction of the physical world in the year 1873. We are believers in the ending of the world, and of the appearance of Christ's Spirit; and make no objection to the times that have been set; but of choice would name 1871. We have a hopeful faith that the world will end in 1875; also in 1873; and nearer still, the present year of 1871!

The world to which we refer is the world of sin; others allude to the physical earth. The result of our opinions, would be perfected Christian characters, by being those "upon whom the ends of the world have come," as really to-day as two or four years hence. The result of Miles Grant's opinions would be the resurrection of dead bodies; weeping, wailing and gnashing of teeth on the part of the multitude, while a few would rise to ineffable glory in perfected physical trim. If the world is to end, we say let it end to our largest Christian profit; at the expense of our pride; our lusts; to the destruction of all that makes us unlike our pattern—Jesus, who became the Christ. Our earth is too pretty to be destroyed; but our evil dispositions, made up of the world, are only worthy of annihilation, and the quicker they merit their just dues, the better for the individual and the race.

Our beautiful earth will continue to revolve, we believe, a few centuries longer; but the work of purging from our souls "the beggarly elements of the world" should commence at once; let these come to an immediate ending. The elements composing the world which should end, are "the lusts of the flesh, of the eyes, and the pride of life;" and "be of good cheer," said Jesus, "for I have brought these elements to an end." Putting an end to the world, after the manner of Jesus, causes the dead to rise—the dead in sinful works; for they cease their sinfulness and are resurrected to the life of the righteous. The Adventists are looking in the clouds of earth for the coming man; while they should seek among the clouds of heavenly witnesses, the truth, that the second appearance of Christ will be through the feminine order! But why dwell upon the second appearance of Christ, while so few are assured that Christ has made a first advent? The first appearance of Christ to any individual will have the effect of saving him from his sins; not from the penalty of past sins, but from the necessity of transgression in the present and future. How many experience this salvation? to just so many has Christ appeared, no more. And none can realize the second advent of this blessed Spirit, until they have experienced the baptism of the first appearance, which will put an end to the world of sin, ere the second advent can take place. All will yet experience the end of the world. All will be visited by the Spirit of Christ. But these occurrences will not happen simultaneously to all. Some have already put an end to the world in themselves, and are experiencing the blessing of Christ's Second Appearance! Others are ripening up to be harvested from the world, by the harvestman—Christ; then will they willingly forsake a worldly life; all that composes the practice of "the children of this world" will be brought to a speedy close. Here is the hope of the people called Shakers—having ripened up to the necessity of living angelic lives, they are those "upon whom the ends of the world have come;" and they look for the continuance of their organization, to those whom the Spirit of Christ will similarly affect. But the people generally, at present, seem too devoted to the pleasures of a worldly life, and are quite unwilling that these should end. Elder Grant, while looking for a general smash-up in 1875, is quite unwilling to become "a eunuch for the kingdom of heaven's sake" before that time; and we will have patience with him, and all other Adventists, if, upon the non-appearance of Jesus; the continuation of the earth in its course; the willful adhesion of dead bodies to their graves, and the absence of a general conflagration, they will come to the common-sense conclusion, that what they are earnestly looking for with their natural eyes, will occur only in a spiritual manner and be spiritually discerned. Many arrived at this conclusion after the failure of 1843; and are among the staunchest supporters of the principles of the Shaker Church to-day. They have since seen the earth, and earthly pleasures pass away with a great noise; they have heard Gabriel's trumpet sounding the "come up higher" invitation; they were dead in trespasses, and were raised up to the mount of salvation; and when they realized their mistake they sung, as all sincere Adventists are destined to sing:

"Adieu, adieu, vain world, farewell!

I find no rest in thee!

Thy greatest pleasures form a hell

Too dark and sad for me!

Alas, alas! I have too long

Preferred thy sinful crowd;

I've listened to thy siren song

'Till mercy called aloud!

"Adieu, vain world, I say once more;

I'm bound for Canaan's land;

I see a happy world before,

Prepared at God's right hand!

On life's tempestuous sea I sail,

Where countless billows roll;

Yet Christ, my pilot, will not fail,—

With him, I trust my soul.

"He can command the roaring tide,

And silence all my foes;

With courage, safely I can ride

Through every wind that blows;

And as I daily homeward steer,

Toward the sweet land of peace,

This world does less and less appear,

And all its charms decrease!

"While shining millions, sailed before,—

Who've gained the port above,

Found nothing in old Babel's store,

That they could prize or love;

That everlasting glory bright,

Will tarnish all below;

Just as the sun's meridian height

Forbids the stars to glow!"

Be strong, be steadfast in fair virtue's cause,
Nor fear reproof, nor covet vain applause;
Heed not of evil tongues the envious strife,
Nor the loud storms that rage in human life.
On truth's firm basis let your hopes remain,
And seas may rage and tempests roar in vain.

'Tis easiest dealing with the firmest mind;
More just when it resists, and where it yields, more
Blest are the lips that open but to bless! [kind.
That never yet the gentle heart belied!
Still prompt to smile, to praise, or to caress,
And ever slow to censure or to chide;
Blest shall they be on earth by all who hear,
Nor their vocation change in heaven above;
For what do angel lips in that bright sphere,
But sing of praise, of mercy, and of love.

How terrible is passion! how our reason
Falls down before it; whilst the tortured frame,
Like a ship dashed by fierce encounter's tide,
And of her pilot spoiled, drives round and round,
The sport of wind and wave. CONN.

* "The Midnight Cry!" by Barbour.

Let Truth roll on.

Roll on, thou mighty tide of Truth, and deluge all the land;
Sweep error from a suffering world, where now it holds command.
Roll on, roll on, nor cease to flow, 'till each vile weed shall die,—
The worthless tares and bitter fruit sown by the enemy.

Too long already hath this tide set back upon its source;
But yet 'twas gaining added strength and a restless force;
And as the rains from heaven descend, this swelling torrent deep
Shall dash the foam impetuously, and o'ery barrier leap.

Then raise the flood-gates, free its course, and let it onward go;
The thirsty earth will drink it in, and better fruit will grow.
Why should we waste our precious stores, in this the time of dearth,
When lo! grim want and famine gaunt, are stalking o'er the earth.

Why not set free this blessed stream, to irrigate the land;
Why not "go into all the world," obeying Christ's command?
These solemn thoughts and feelings deep, are surging in my soul,
I can no longer silence keep, Truth must and will control.

To wakeful watchers, it is true, the night seems very long;
Some fear in darkness should we work, it might be all done wrong;
But morning now is dawning bright upon the traveler's way,
And glorious rays of gleaming light declare the coming day.

'Tis time for gospel light to spread abroad o'er land and sea;
And man must learn that nothing else but truth can make him free.
O, let it have an outlet wide—let gospel graces shine,
'Till all can see and own, that love and virtue are divine.

E. H. PERSONS, Harvard.

Retrospection.

A century has passed since Mother Ann's gospel was revealed to mortals; and, though we may think the progress slow, that but little has been achieved, yet let us consider how great, how laborious, was the work of the first pioneers. I have watched the rise and progress of Pleasant Hill from my childhood up, for sixty-two years. I saw the brethren, with their own industrious hands, fell the sturdy oaks and maples, right here, where our large and commodious dwellings now stand and have stood for many long years. I saw very soon, young as I was, that providing for the outer man was not their greatest aim, but they sought first the kingdom of heaven, and then, by giving their hearts to God and putting their hands to work, they wrought wonders in this land.

How very easy now for the wayfaring man, the widow and the orphans to find a home of sweet rest, where everything is ready, provided by the hands of kind and tender friends. I verily believe, that in the course of another century, the beautiful villages, that are being reared by the hands of the pure and righteous servants of God, will become "As diadems on the brow of the Universe."

HORTENCY G. HOOSER, Pleasant Hill.

Time, its Records.

Thou precious boon to mortals given,
A little space in which to learn—
Probation is thy name in Heaven,
Thou'rt fruitful with immortal germs.
Whither dost thou flee forever?
Say what freight thy moments bear!
From my soul what strong endeavor?
What the deeds thou dost declare?

None can stay thy rolling ages,
None recall thy moments past,
Deep engraven are thy pages,
Fadeless are thy photographs.
Life, the silent, tireless artist,
On thy flying canvas lays
Every changing scene, regardless
That the form so soon decays.

O, thou viewless portrait taker,
Thy unerring pencil, draws
The minutest act or feature,
And records its secret cause;
Slaves and nobles, fools and sages,
There behold their likeness cast;
Time will soon unfurl its pages,
Nothing perished but the mask.

Spoken to the ear in closets,
Or in deeds revealed to sight;
Even though you've only mused them,
There are blazing, wrong or right!
Faithfully they stand recorded,
Pleading at the angel court;
And though never, never worded,
Each shall make its true report.

The revelations of physiology, phrenology and psychometry go to prove that every person carries his history with him, and that history is manifest in his actions, and stamps his features with unerring precision. "A man is, what he does." Every act of mind or body, open or secret, helps make each individual life, that is displayed in character. Each act records itself with a faint or deep impression, according to the nature and intensity of the impulse that prompts it.

Behold the astronomer, gauging space, and resolving the intricate mazes of planets, suns and systems—those mighty chroniclers of unnumbered cycles. He seems already to have entered eternity, and, in his contemplation of past and future, to gaze upon the eternal.

Somewhat nearer, see the geologist, closely scanning the rocks, and drawing from the depths of the earth her secret records, extending back through countless ages, to primeval chaos. Nearer, still, we see history laid under contribution, and the exhumed monuments of buried races are made to testify to the past transactions and acquirements of the human family.

Also the Bible, that venerated book and much abused record, is put upon trial, its doctrines canvassed and merits discussed, in this age of ages. Even that which has so long claimed the name and station of Christianity is brought to the bar and sharply interrogated; and we opine that, before the trial terminates, it will be found miserably wanting in all the essential elements of pure Christianity—for, see! it does not save its votaries from sin! Its most sanctified teachers and professors confess themselves sinners, and believe it impossible to live without sin! What a sham Christianity is that which, instead of burning up iniquity, spreads a veil over it!

All departments of human knowledge and research seem to be undergoing a sifting or shaking process, by the power of the quickened intellect of the race. If any believe these are not the external manifestations of the judgment day, will they believe that the spirit of progress is less active, less progressive in the spiritual than in the natural and intellectual elements of man's creation?

If the spirit of God operates among mankind like wheels within wheels, the centre being much smaller and slower in movement than the circumference, may not attract so much attention, though it be the source, both of motion and power to those more external.

People see a small body of Shakers, view their external organization and habits, and, perhaps, think them a strange curiosity—being, however, only as one tree surrounded by a forest, or as one block in a quarry, they are deemed remarkable for singularity, but otherwise of little consequence. Few stop to inquire why it is so, or what will come of it. After learning that Shakers hold a community of interests, that they are very neat, very honest, and do not marry, they care not to go much further.

But why is it? What induces free and intelligent people to associate together for the practice of principles so repugnant to the natural feelings and desires of the earthly man as are those of the Shakers? Wealth cannot be the motive, where all are upon a level, and distribution is made to each according to needs and circumstances, without reference to individual tastes and peculiarities, and where the surplus goes for the benefit of the needy, or unfortunate outside of the organization.

The desire for a comfortable home cannot be the bond of union in so much voluntary restraint; neither can it be ignorance of themselves or of the world that keeps the Shakers together. What, then, is the secret bond of their union?

Who devised a plan so contrary to man's depraved nature? Who sustains it? And what is the purpose of its Author? These are questions well worth the consideration of the seriously inclined.

ALONZO HOLLISTER, Mt. Lebanon.

The Setting Sun.

The setting sun resplendent shone,
And bade the earth farewell;
Soon night's deep shades will intervene,
And east upon each lovely scene
Its dark and silent spell.

Yet weep not thou, but humbly bow—
God worketh not in vain;
Although beneath the stormy wave,
The brilliant orb sinks in the grave,
'Twill rise, 'twill rise again,
'Twill rise again, 'twill rise again;
Although beneath the stormy wave,
The brilliant orb sinks in the grave,
'Twill rise, 'twill rise again.

What then, if here the silent tear
Doth oft unbidden roll;
While every joy that filled the heart,
In sorrow seemeth to depart,
And darkness veils thy soul;
Yet fear not thou, but humbly bow—
Thy tears are not in vain;
Although beneath the stormy wave,
Thy sun of gladness make its grave,
'Twill rise, 'twill rise again,
'Twill rise again, 'twill rise again;
Although beneath the stormy wave,
Thy sun of gladness make its grave,
'Twill rise, 'twill rise again.

JOHN ROBE, Mt. Lebanon.

The American Shaker in London.

To the Editor of the Golden Age:

Your kind favor of the 27th of July is at hand. I have not received (but expect to in a day or two) THE GOLDEN AGE. Indeed, many "lovers of this kind," have waited for that in the shadowy past, and "obtained not the sight." But thanks to time and the laws of progress, which, like those of gravitation, never relax their efforts, now is the desired consummation nearer than ever before. I am in London, England. I see, I hear, I observe, and "I keep up a terrible thinking." Ninety-six years ago, a poor woman externally, but rich in the notice of the Heavens, was driven from these shores by the "Church and State" "beast" to the wilderness of America, then in the Revolutionary struggle, which by the "visions of God," she declared would result in the establishment of a government that would let each person frame their own theology. And thanks to the yet-to-be-honored name of Thomas Paine, more than any other, that "Golden Age" idea was realized.

And to-day I am in London, as the representative successor of this same woman; and back of me are some seventy communities of people, who believe that she experienced the return to our earth of "the Christ," which first the Heathen Roman Church and State, and then the Christian Roman Church and State, crucified; and the latter a good deal more effectually than the former; for the "saint" who sins, serves the devil more acceptably than any "sinner" can possibly do. So far as my mission has been known, England has said "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!" I have been most hospitably received and attentively listened unto. I began by announcing a meeting in Cleveland Hall, where the Spiritualists had held frequent meetings.

The attendance was small, but increased at each succeeding call, until I decided to give all who wished to hear and see a Shaker, an opportunity to do so, by engaging St. George's Hall, and inviting Hepworth Dixon to occupy the chair. But I sadly miscalculated the slow, unexcitable, and unfanatical English mind, as not more than a third of the people who came could get into the hall.

Those who did fill it, were of the "better classes," to use an Englishism. As tickets had been sent to some two hundred M.P.s. and sixty editors, we had a corps of reporters.

And among them all, the Times did itself the honor to make the fairest report; and much to my surprise, the Thunderer has taken the lead in welcoming "the Shaker," saying that "it was an opportunity not to be lost, to hear an authentic exposition of Shakerism." The result is that I am literally overwhelmed with visitors, invitations to lecture, and applications to go home with me to "Zion."

My impressions, while in my quiet mountain home, of the state of England, is realized to the letter. Politically, as well as geographically, there is only "the Channel" between England and France. The plethora of population is felt by everybody. "There are too many of us," is the common expression. Yesterday I received an invitation to deliver an address before the Co-operative Emigration Society; I have spoken before "The Temperance League;" the Woman Suffrage people are especially favorable to an Order, founded by a woman, claiming that God, being dual, the Government of the Universe itself is equally masculine and feminine; and that it ought to be the type and pattern of all human governments, from that of the household of nature to "the household of faith," with its "father and mother and brethren and sisters," having their "houses and lands" "in common." The Peace advocates find coadjutors in Shakers; and in proposing (as you will see by the report of my St. George's Hall speech, which I send you, I have done), that the English people put their governmental machinery into the hands of the Quakers, who "marry and are given in marriage" (as we have turned our Indian government over to them), I have put the "dead body" of the Quakers on their feet again, and would give them something to keep them alive.

And inasmuch as this government, in the society, is dual, and they are practically acquainted with the rights and capabilities of woman, who thus, "by reason of use," have their managing abilities developed, let the Quaker men take possession of the House of Commons and the Quaker women have the House of Lords. This will begin the millennium. The reign of "peace on earth" would commence by disbanding the army and navy, and breaking up the whole military system. The people would soon be the owners of the soil; poverty be banished; "the social evil" be no more an eye-sore, and a cancer on the vitals of the nation. The national debt would be paid and cancelled; and one nation would actualize the visions of the seers; and the words of promise spoken by "all the prophets since the world began," would be no longer vain visions, or hope deferred, which has made the heart of humanity sick; but hope would have its fruition in a just, peaceful, and happy people; and the co-existence of the resurrection, or Shaker Order of celibacy, would hold in check, and balance the principle of population.

Draw Nigh.

There was a law among the ancient Persians, that whosoever should present themselves before the king, unless they were called to his presence, should be put to death, except such to whom the king should extend the golden sceptre. (See Esther, iv:11.) But in this our day we have no such prohibition. The sceptre to us is always extended. And it is a sceptre of mercy. The still small voice says come. It is a general and universal invitation, from our glorious King, to draw nigh at all times, and in all circumstances, by prayer and devout supplication, to make known our desires to Him. And we may freely address Him, not only as the Eternal, the Almighty, Creator of all things, but as our heavenly Father and Mother.

It is not in the spirit of bondage, or of fear, that we may approach Him; but in the spirit of love. We may cry to Him, not as a criminal to a judge, nor as a slave to a master, but as a child to a Father, whom he tenderly loves, and who feels for him a pure and holy affection. The Apostle John says: "I write unto you, little children, because ye have known the Father." Who is a child so likely to know as his Father? What is the first word he utters but "My Father," or "My Mother?" To whom is he so likely to flee in the hour of danger? On whom will he call so freely in distress? He relies on him for care and protection. He expects that he will defend him and provide for him. Then, will not God, who stands in this endearing relation, in a much higher and holier degree, exemplify it and fulfill it more perfectly and divinely? He certainly will. Then let this give us boldness and courage, at all times, to ask, and the promise is that we shall receive. Draw nigh.

DANIEL ORCUTT.

What hidden works of darkness lie shrouded beneath the mask of base deception—of speeches fair, and colors false! Oh! the depth of human depravity.

It is honorable to be great; it is excellent to be small. "Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Plough deep the fallow ground of the heart, sow and cultivate the seeds of purity, love and truth, and you will reap a rich harvest of true felicity.

What is hell?—A condemned conscience.

Where, and what is Heaven?—Heaven is within you; it is a condition or state of the mind devoid of error or remorse.

Let those who profess faith in Jesus Christ maintain good works. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

"I am a dead dog," exclaimed a poor backslider to the Christian faith! Is there not more hope of him than of a professing Christian saint, who sins daily and seeks to hide his iniquity?

Prayer, like a golden key, unlocks treasures of inestimable value. Be careful which way you turn it.

The heart of a wicked person drinks in vanity as a dry sponge absorbs water. When they are full, a very little pressure causes an emission.

D. A. BUCKINGHAM.

Why I am a Shaker.

A friend asks: "Why are you a Shaker?"

Answer.—Because I have resolved to be an honest man—a Christian. Jesus was the first Christian. By precept and example he pointed to a more excellent way than was marked out even in the Jewish economy, which was far above heathen idolatry.

When I was awakened to see my loss from God, through a departure from his laws, I sought to become a Christian. I looked to the Churches to find the good Shepherd who feeds his flock, for my soul was hungry. But I could not find him; nor hear his voice. I then looked to find his footprints, that I might know whither he leadeth his flock to rest. The ministers of the popular churches told me that I was a Christian. But my conscience said, Nay! Jesus Christ, the great exemplar, said, come out from the world and be separate; be pure, be just, be holy; renounce war, and those lusts which produce war. "As ye would that others should do to you, so do ye the same to them." I knew that I could not be a full Christian unless I followed the example of Jesus Christ, and lived, in word and deed, as he did; and my conscience reproached me, and was my accuser day and night; for I was so very unlike the Pattern, who was a celibate from deep principle; this I was not. He utterly condemned war; I did not. He said, "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father who is in Heaven, the same is my relative—my mother, or sister, or brother." The ties of consanguinity (not the principles of pure celibacy) formed the bond which held me.

The Spirit, through Providential agencies, led me to the Shakers. I found them to be a community of people living as did the Pentecostal Church, ignoring war and private property, loving their brethren and sisters as themselves, and abstaining from all sexual and sensual gratifications; indeed, living pure virgin lives. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Here were the fruits. As an honest man, I cast my lot with them. They taught me to confess and forsake all sin; to right every wrong; to cleanse my heart from all impurity, and to "go and sin no more." This is why I am a Shaker.

Society Record.

MT. LEBANON.—We learn that black was the color, decided by the majority, for the new fence at the Church Family—we yield to majorities. Apples scarce; pears abundant, but suffering from blight or rust; blackberries many—"twenty-two individuals, including horses and wagons, visited Washington Mt. to collect them, September 2." F. W. Evans arrived home on the 5th of September, in good health, though somewhat worn; he was more than welcome.

WATERVLIET.—Ministry here on the 13th of September, from Lebanon. General health. Sealing fruits in full operation.

HANCOCK.—A new woodhouse is completed here—thirty feet by seventy feet. Crops look well—corn a little later than usual.

ENFIELD, N. H.—Church family have done some painting. The North have painted all their buildings within the year. If any Shakers, or those who admire Shaker work, are in need of Shaker pails, tubs, etc., write H. Cumings, Enfield, N. H. We are vouchers for quality.

SHIRLEY says we made a mistake concerning blackberries—they were blueberries; glad to correct. They also want more health than was represented in September.

CANTERBURY—"Larger crowds at our meetings this year than for years. Wish we could better administer to their necessities." Usual health. Elder Benjamin Smith is afflicted by over-exertion and sun-stroke, but improving.

ALFRED.—Ministry at Mt. L. on the 2d of September. Sale of place not mentioned.

SOUTH UNION.—"Religious element very scarce in these parts—about fifty attending public service from without the village—more being too lazy to get up, and to our meetings by 10 A. M."

Gospel Treasures.

Should we take the bright wings of the morn
And soar over mountain and sea,
From isles that old ocean adorn,
To lands where the bright flowers be;
Should the mountains unbosom their gold,
And ocean her jewels restore,
Should earth all her treasures unfold,
Our spirits would still thirst for more.

There are far reaching depths in the soul,
No phantoms of pleasure can fill;
There are wild waves of passions that roll,
No power but of Heaven can still:
There's a heart sad and lonely within,
A hunger for good from above;
There's a deep seated sorrow for sin,
And thirst for pure Heavenly love.

There's a happiness purity brings,
Contentment the gospel bestows;
There's a hope in the trusting heart springs,
Triumphant o'er earth and its woes:
There's a treasure of bliss far away,
Reserved for the righteous in store;
And the bright morn is dawning to-day
That never knows night any more.

There are pleasures that never grow old,
And hopes that will never decay;
There's a wealth that is richer than gold,
To all who the gospel obey.
Rejoice, then, ye faithful and true,
Your day of salvation has come;
The bright crown of glory in view,
Invites to your Heavenly home.

E. T. LEGGETT.

UNION VILLAGE, Ohio, Aug. 1871.

To the Juvenile Class.

The different stages of human existence may be compared to the seasons of each year—Spring, Summer, Autumn and Winter. The skillful agriculturist and horticulturist understand the appropriate work for each of the seasons as they roll around. Spring is the proper time to prepare the soil for the reception of choice seeds. The earth itself contains seed which will grow without cultivation, and bring forth fruits and flowers. Some of the various kinds of fruits which grow spontaneously, are good and useful for food, both for men and birds; other kinds, which look very inviting, are poisonous and very hurtful. So of wild flowers and plants; some contain deadly poison, although they may be beautiful in appearance, while other kinds emit a sweet perfume, and the aroma is healthful. But cereals, and the choicest fruits and flowers, are produced by skill and labor. After the soil is properly prepared, the wise and careful husbandman deposits the good seed in the earth, where it is kindly nourished, warmed and enlivened by the sun's rays, and moistened by the dew-drops and gentle showers. Thus nurtured, those seeds germinate, and the little roots being weak and tender, they work their way down into the soil to get a strong hold there; while the delicate tendrils climb upward into the sunlight and unfold their leaves, which are full of little fibres, resembling the veins and pores of the human body, which open their mouths to inhale the pure atmosphere and drink in the sweet dews of the morning. With intense interest the agriculturist watches the growth of the good seed, and also watches, with a jealous eye, the appearance of every wild plant, or weed, that he may without delay pluck them up so that they may not choke the better seed, which should occupy the whole ground and have room to expand and grow, nourished by the full strength of the soil. Even then, if the sun refuses to shine, or the clouds withhold the rain, those choice plants or vines become enfeebled, and wither, droop and die. But, aided by those essential elements, and the nice implements which art has produced, he toils hopefully on, and by midsummer he begins to reap some of the fruits of his labor. The gathering in of a bountiful harvest is a joyful task, although somewhat laborious.

With an eye to the future, day after day he toils on and gathers the ripe fruits, each in their season, and stores them carefully away; and, by the time that Spring, Summer and Autumn have passed, his garners are filled. And when the cold bleak winds of winter come riding along in their chariot, and the fleecy snows cover hill and dale, and ice-bound rivers and lakes are seen on the right hand and the left, this wise tiller of the soil is ready to wrap himself in his mantle and gather to his warm fireside to enjoy the fruits of his labor in the midst of peace and plenty.

In my next I will show the analogy of the seasons with the life we call human.

Extremes.

That one extreme produces another, is a truism. Dogmatic theology "demands absolute, unswerving submission from the human mind. Doubt is sin; unbelief is damnation." The other extreme—simple materialism—rests upon the axiom that religious (as well as every other) belief is the result of evidence; that unbelief, in any proposition, arises from the want of proof—demonstration.

All children are materialists; and if, as they grow to puberty, they would never profess to believe what they do not understand, it would "save" them from hypocrisy, and cause their teachers to reason, not to threaten. They would not then, as now, "affirm things whereof they know not."

"Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord!" Why do not the clergy, who profess to be his ambassadors, pass the invitation down to the people? Simply because their dogmas are unreasonable, or, as they (in phrase polite) express it, "above reason;" and every man and woman ought to be "above" pretending to believe them as an act of the will, a thing impossible.

Let any one try to believe that his mortal body, when laid six feet deep in the ground, will do anything but decompose, as would the body of a horse, "for both go to one place—the earth; and as dieth the one, so dieth the other," as decayeth the one, so decayeth the other.

Then let him try to disbelieve that a grape-vine, anywhere within twenty feet thereof, will send its roots thereto, to make that human body into grapes. Or, let him try to doubt the additional fact that some mischievous boys, or busy girls, will incorporate those grapes into their living bodies, and give some to their friends, thus utterly subverting the absurd doctrine of a physical resurrection by proving that men and women, in more ways than one, are continually "eating one another."

He is a "fool, who saith, in his heart, There is no God," and equally a fool is he who saith with his tongue, "There is a God," when he knows it not with his understanding, and ("in his heart") does not believe it.

I honor, as honest men or women, those who are just what "they seem to be, and who profess and seem to be just what they are." Do they believe simply in external matter—the object of their external senses? Let them honestly declare, "I am a materialist! and what I do believe all human beings believe!" materialism being rudimentary to the race.

Who knows when Spiritualism, as an idea, first enters the brain? and when endless life and immortality (which are the same thing) come into the understanding, as a light shining in a dark place, making things visible which (before) were "not seen?"

I love the frank simplicity of soul that enables one to say, I have done wrong; I have been mistaken; or, "I do not know." Teach me, and I shall be instructed; turn me, and I shall be turned; convince me, and "lead me in the way everlasting." That is true nobility! Cannot you convert me by your good words? then confound me by your good works, so shall I believe for your "very works' sake," inasmuch as, by the superior fruits of the spiritually religious Believers in Christ's second advent, all men and women shall distinguish, or "know," them from the innumerable sects who, though naming the name of Christianity, do not depart from selfishness, nor do they love one another into a religious Community.

The Difficult Lesson.

LOSING ALL, AND GAINING MORE THAN ALL.

One of the most difficult lessons for individuals to learn, is the fact that there are two planes of existence for humanity, either in this world, or in that to which we are hastening with every diurnal revolution of our planet.

The vulture-eyed philosopher, nor the lion-hearted reformer, outside of Shakerism, seem to comprehend this fact, excepting in very rare instances. Hence, we are not surprised, when Horace Greeley, writing of THE SHAKERS, asks: "Are our relations with men and women so universally pure, that we may rightly despise those, who, unable to separate the palpable evil from the latent good, reject both together?" Nor are we disappointed, when Alcander Longley, of The Communist, asserts that Ann Lee's very proper disgust at the low state of morals around her, caused her to run to the other extreme—that of celibacy—instead of stopping at the condition of respectable marriage!

In answer to "our later Franklin," and our would-be founder of a community, we here say: That we are just as able to see, and to separate the good from the evils of the marital relation as any others; and that we have "run to the other extreme," not so much from our disgust of social evils, as for our admiration of the superior joys of angelhood. We know marriage has its proper sphere—on the earthly plane—there it is honorable, when honorably conducted; and for a criterion of honorable marriage we would name either the system of Mosaism or that of George Fox. Scarcely an instance can be produced of marital relations being conducted now, upon either of these admirable bases. And yet, not because of the mourning cry of humanity from one end of the land to the other, do we invite any to become celibates! The Jews were very perfect in their reproductions, when they could bring forth such specimens of humanity as Jesus! and yet, amid the most perfect on the earthly plane the necessity appeared for a celibate order of beings; and he who was the fulfillment of God's promise to Moses, in "taking all sickness from the midst of Israel," became the leader of the celibate or Christian order! Was the reason of Jesus' renunciation of the marital relation, because he could not separate "the palpable evil from the latent good?" Or were his surroundings so disgusting in consequence of lust that he "ran to the other extreme?"

Jesus and Ann were the evangelists, not of an improvement of the old order of things, but for the introduction of the New Creation; not for the recuperation of "the earth and those who are earthly," but to baptize souls with the resurrecting power of "the Lord from heaven"—the very antipode of the "Adam of the earth, earthy!" Recognizing the distinction between the earthly and the heavenly as we do, we can easily "comprehend the good and the bad of the earthly," and "reject both together," because of the superior joys and relations of the heavenly. Could we enjoy the felicities of matrimony exceeding the most finely drawn picture of the most exaggerating, sensational novelist; and could we reproduce offspring as perfect as was Jesus; we should feel no more permission to engage therein, than we now do, when "incompatibility of temper" is so common, and when the production of less healthful progeny than monkeys is so general! To us there is a sphere that is as elevated above the reproductive, as our estimates of heaven are superior to our estimates of the earth. "Marriage peopled the earth," said the saint; "but Celibacy increases the forces of heaven!" and said a greater: "The children of this world (the earthy), marry and are given in marriage;" very properly so, and we wish more honorably so; "but my children—the children of the Resurrection order—I am the Resurrection—neither marry nor are given in marriage!" Claiming, as we do, to be Christians—having aspirations to be "the children of the Resurrection;" how can we be expected to soil our bodies or souls in the mire and filth of that which constitutes the order we profess to having been raised above? And yet, we are not practicing celibacy because Jesus did; nor because Ann Lee taught it to be a necessary element in the Christian's character; but we have risen in love with the eternal principles they have presented to our enlightened understandings, instead of falling in love with the temptations of nature, pure, or perverted! Could the angelic hosts personate physical humanity, so would we have our lives resemble them; not for the appearance, but for the enjoyment here upon the earth, the fruition of the same principles engaged in by the disembodied pure and perfected.

Let others cleave to the earth; to earthly institutions and practices as seems to them proper; such cannot reasonably expect that we, who have had our lives cut off from the earthy plane, can remain satisfied with the nourishment of earthly pleasures; but having become ripe for the Christian harvest, we find a new and higher source of supplies; when leaving our loves of earth, its vanities and relations, we find the never-failing manna, and the ever-flowing fountains of life, eternal life.

We are being schooled into eternal life. We have forsaken the loves of the word as well as its lusts, because neither are eternal. We realize war to be the product of earthly loves and relations; we will not fight, nor vote for those who do fight; nor for those who believe in marriage, private property, or who engage in fleshly lusts of whatever description; for these are not eternal, and we pray for their discontinuance. But few have ripened up to this necessity, and to the solving of this difficult lesson—a lesson impossible for the carnally-minded to learn; but the fields of human souls are ripening unto the harvest, and for such we have attempted an illumination. Already in the distance, in America and over the waters, we see, we hear mighty souls proclaiming the everlasting testimony; still nearer, we see, we hear, from Hiramonton, N. J., to Monticello, Minn., the more perfect testimony of an enduring life; and nearer still, we see, we hear, we feel Brethren and Sisters in Christ—"the few who have found it"—walking the narrow way, and "despising the shame" of peculiarity from the multitude, losing their lives on the plane of earth, for an eternal residence in the heavens. *

AMONG the many justifiable Bible authorities for wrong doing, is the following:—The tobacco user finds his in: "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still." What says the "SHAKER?" E. M.

Hope On.

Hope on to the last, tho' the dark clouds may gather,
Enchaining thy course in tempest array;
The storm shall pass o'er, and the sun in its splendor,
Will brighter the beauties of nature display.

Hope on to the last, tho' many oppose thee,
Be true to the cause of justice and right;
For truth is a legion, and God will sustain thee,
And turn in their souls the darkness to light.

Hope on to the last, tho' the soft shades of evening,
Are hidden behind the curtains of night,
And the haven of rest, which gleamed in the distance,
Enveloped in blackness, is hid from thy sight.

Hope on to the last, there are joys in the future;
Weep not for those phantoms long since past away,
For the pleasures of earth are exceeded in heaven,
As the stars are outshone by the bright orb of day.

Hope on to the last, for thy joys are eternal,
And thousands shall join in thy welcome above,
While the untiring strains of heavenly music,
Announce thy approach to the regions of love.
J. V. CALVER.

"Owe no Man," etc.

"I do not know that I owe any man a dollar!"—Edward Fowler.

"Once it was the custom for each individual to repeat, from memory, some regulation of the family or society, when all had gathered for worship. The ministry were not excepted. We were all anxious to know which rule Elder Ebenezer Bishop (then the presiding Elder of Believers) would repeat, supposing it would be the most important spiritual requisition. All were disappointed when he repeated, 'Believers must not run into debt!' But circumstances have since proved the wisdom of his choice, as touching both the temporal and spiritual prosperity of our people."—Chauncy Miller.

"I have been in the Trustee's office for many years, yet I never gave my note to any one, and I never will."—Simon Atherton.

"Of all afflictions, being in debt is the worst. I make it a rule to pay my employees in full once a month, whether they want their wages or not."—Benjamin Gates.

"I endeavor to keep my accounts in that manner, that the whole could be straightened and balanced with an hour's notice."—Levi Shaw.

"Hand in hand, with the injunction that we must not run in debt, should be an injunction not to live, nor desire to live, beyond our means."—Galen Richmond.

The above, as may be seen, are the remarks of some of the most prominent members of Shaker Society to-day, doing business as Trustees. "That child around, and taking notes, and faith he'll print them," will surprise these members somewhat, but he, nevertheless, feels honored by the testimony he has unobscuredly obtained, and in being able to record for the benefit of others their sage counsels. Undoubtedly, the column could be many times filled with like matter, all tending to advise: "Look before you leap," and "Dip not out more than gets in, else you will come to want." Carelessness on the part of Believers has caused them to swerve somewhat from the rule enforced by that good Elder in an eastern Society, who would not permit the Trustee to mingle with the rest in worship, because he had failed to pay two or three shillings due on a hoghead of molasses he had brought home! Suppose the same rule were now in force, how many trustees would be in durance? *

Salvation by Obedience.

Obedience to God—obedience to his law—to faith and principle: This has always been required ever since the creation of man, and his being placed in Eden's Garden. It was necessary for the order and regulation of man's doings in the ordinary course of business life. It was needful for man's daily protection and salvation, spiritually. Law, without obedience, is like faith without works—man without soul, or a body without spirit. Obedience is the very life principle of law. The laws of a people, country or nation are of but little value without obedience, for they will be neither enforced nor kept. The law which saith, "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" if a man commit adultery, how is he benefited by the law? He may meet the penalty of the law by chastisement or imprisonment; but unless his confinement or sufferings by such penalty work repentance, he will again sin when opportunity offers.

In tracing back God's dealings with his creature—man—we find the original law delivered to him by his Creator, when placed in the Garden of Eden, was, "Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." This was God's law or commandment to man in the beginning. Did man keep this law? Now, this law, whether given to man verbally or written upon his heart—intuitive knowledge—it matters not. He was, doubtless, made able to comprehend it. The breath of the Almighty breathed into man, by which he became a living soul, endowed him with reason and understanding sufficient to know his duty to his Maker, and what was in that day required of him.

By disobedience to law, to the commandment or the knowledge of God implanted in the soul, man lost his union and communion with his Creator, and his right to the Tree of Life, which was also in the garden placed. Shame and dishonor ensued; yea, even death! Consequently, the disposition in man to hide in the bushes, to evade the countenance of the Almighty. Man discovered his own nakedness. He knew he had transgressed God's law. He was fearful of the consequences—the doom pronounced upon disobedience—the penalty of the law.

The promise of God afterwards given to man, that the "seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head," has ever been man's anchor and hope through all time of the past up to the present. And ever since the sad event of the fall, it has been man's duty and privilege, through God's goodness and mercy, to be eradicating from his soul the bane then received by disobedience.

Jesus Christ opened the door, and led the way to man's redemption. "All who will may partake of the waters of life freely." Man is still left to choose or refuse. "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest to your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light."

From the day of the original transgression of God's law, there have always been ministers or teachers of God's word, those endowed with a measure of light and truth, sufficient to show mankind their duty, and to lead them upward (by degrees) from death to life, if they would yield obedience to the divine truths made known by those empowered to teach. Those who were obedient to the instructions and warnings of Noah, were saved from the mighty deluge which was about to destroy the world. Abram was a teacher of righteousness. His faith and obedience was an example to mankind, worthy of imitation. Obedience to God's laws through Moses, was leading the human race, step by step, higher up the Ladder of Progress, into a knowledge of God's will to man, as pertaining to the work of his redemption from under the curse.

It is as impossible for man, in his lost state and condition, to become immediately reinstated, or joined in full union and communion with his Creator—God—to be redeemed from the fall, all at once, as it is for a child who has commenced to learn his a, b, c, in literary knowledge, to become immediately master of the arts and sciences. He has departed from the true knowledge of his Maker, and must retrace his steps, grow into the knowledge of the truth, by degrees, as he has departed from it. For man did not—could not fall into the lowest state of degradation all at once. This immediate conversion and redemption from death to life, without self-mortification, and a daily cross-bearing, is a deception. The imputed righteousness of Christ, which is said to release converted souls from all responsibility and trouble thereafter, on the part of the sinner, is a false covering of the adversary of souls, designed to ease the consciences of men and women, and lull them into sleep and death, deeper than before. "Except a man deny himself, take up his cross and follow me," saith Jesus, "he cannot be my disciple."

Jesus did not effect the great work of overcoming the world in himself, in a moment, an hour, nor a day. It was by daily training from childhood to manhood, up to the time of his Baptism in the River Jordan, and many sorrowful days thereafter. How greatly was he tempted, and how severe were his struggles, combatting with his enemy, the Devil (whatever may have been his form or feature) which, according to Scripture account, lasted forty days and nights! "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force."

Jesus set the example of daily cross-bearing, overcoming evil with good, whenever and wherever opportunity offered. "Let him that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." The law of Moses served as a schoolmaster to lead souls to Christ. In obedience to that law the children of Israel inherited the promised land—a land flowing with milk and honey.

If there had been no law or commandment saying, "Thou shalt not kill; Thou shalt not steal; Thou shalt not commit adultery," etc., man would not be culpable for so doing. By the knowledge of the law, sin is revealed. "Where there is no law, there is no transgression." "For sin is the transgression of the law." Jesus Christ came into the world to put an end to sin, and introduce an everlasting righteousness. This he did by overcoming the world in himself, and setting an example for others to do likewise.

"I am the Resurrection," said Christ. Man must be resurrected from death and deathly works, into the new life, which is in Christ. He must be born again. This new birth is spiritual, not carnal—not physical. "Except a man be born again," said Christ, "he can not see the Kingdom of God." This saying of our Saviour was not comprehended by Nicodemus. Our Savior explained it to him more fully. That he must be born of the spirit, and not after the flesh. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I say unto you, ye must be born again."

Mankind, instead of being led by the spirit of Christ, which worketh by love and purity of heart, are governed too much by selfishness, passion, pride and lust; seeking their own ease and aggrandizement, not God's honor and glory.

Trace the travel and progress of the children of Israel from their rise to their fall—from their deliverance from Egyptian bondage to the destruction of Jerusalem; and you will find that in all or nearly all cases, where they were subject to God's word and law to them, prosperity attended; but when they rejected or disobeyed, they were smitten by their enemies, or in some way suffered loss. It reasoned not who was ruler, judge or king over the people, disobedience to God's requirements always brought trouble. Kings and rulers may err and deviate to the right and left of the true standard of Truth and Equity, but God's word abideth forever. Principles vary not. While under the law, all must be subject to the law. But when having come out from under the old commandment into the new, or covenant of Grace, the latter takes the pre-eminence—the old is fulfilled—as in Jesus Christ. "One jot or one tittle shall in nowise pass from the law till all be fulfilled." Jesus Christ was the end of the law to them that believe—those who walk no more after the flesh, but after the spirit—who follow not the first Adam in the work of generation, but the Second Adam in the work of the regeneration.

If we say we have no faith in such a one or ones, or that we have no confidence in the administration of God's law by or through such individuals or persons called to be rulers in the Church or House of God, are we justified in rejecting, or in going contrary to their counsel and instruction? Such are ministers of God's word or law; and obedience to the law or testimony is required of all under it. If we respect not the person or persons, have respect for God's law, though administered by them. The principles of truth and right should govern us, not passion and partial feelings. Man cannot change principles by misdirection or misapplication of them.

Jesus said, "If a man love me he will keep my sayings." Many professors of Christianity make great pretensions of their love to God, or love to Christ, who really are unwilling to prove their love by acts of kindness, self-denial and the daily cross, as Jesus did. They seem willing to name the name of Christ, but unwilling to depart from iniquity.

The teachings of our Lord and Saviour were on this wise: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you." "Whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." "Render not evil for evil, but good for evil."

Here is a new commandment given under the gospel dispensation. It is Universal Love. No more an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, but love and good will toward all men. No more war and bloodshed, strife and contention, selfishness and individual promotion, one rising above another with superior claims and usurpation, but community of goods, united interests, brotherly and sisterly love, justice, righteousness and equity in all things. No special toleration for particular, personal fellowship, or affection for this or that one, but it is all ours—universal brotherhood.

Every house set in order must have laws, rules and regulations to keep it so. But whoever knew one kept in that condition, unless the gift or principle of obedience reigned there?

D. A. BUCKINGHAM.

Truth, Faith, and Reason.

Truth and reality must be the basis of all moral excellence and durable bliss.

Fiction and false views, like unsuspected counterfeit coin, may appear like reality, and give great present satisfaction, but sooner or later the deception will be discovered, when the sting of disappointment will succeed, and be in proportion to the ever-departed joy.

As we rarely or never discover the true amount of large accounts, without carefully considering and adding each particular item, so neither shall we ever attain to truth without patient and careful investigation.

We may reasonably suspect the man who requires us to believe without investigation, for, if he be neither dishonest nor designing, he must be under the influence of a credulity that renders his opinions unreliable.

He that imposes first on his own understanding by believing without examination, will most likely impose on that of others, if permitted.

He that has thoroughly investigated a subject, and satisfied his own understanding of its truth, far from wishing others to take it upon trust, earnestly desires them to examine for themselves.

There can be no permanent happiness, only in conformity to the truth and reality of things; whatever is forced, far-fetched, or false, must ultimately fail.

Many assertions do not make one truth.

He that does nothing but that which is good, says nothing but that which is true, thinks nothing but that which is pure, need not fear being put to shame.

"All power," said Jesus, "in heaven and earth is given me," i. e., all power—the power of God is pledged for the support of my gospel, the truth which I have taught, for truth is Almighty. God is truth.

O, Heavenly Father, teach me thy truth! my desire is to believe all that is true, and practice all I believe.

If we cannot bring truth to agree with our wishes, we must subject our desires to truth.

We never act rationally while in our affections we give temporal things the ascendancy over those which are spiritual and eternal.

To deceive, and act the hypocrite, costs more than sincerely to be what we pretend. How base, then, is hypocrisy.

Universal truth comprehends all the real qualities, relations, and dependencies that exist in and between all things in the universe. Some small portion of these have been discovered by, or revealed to, man.

For convenience of investigation, universal truth may be divided into two departments, Moral and Physical—the one relating to mind, the other to matter.

All truth is precious, but truth in relation to moral subjects is infinitely more important than that which merely relates to the physical, inasmuch as it relates to the present and eternal well-being of infinite millions of immortal intelligences.

PELHAM.

The World.

What is the world? A blinding maze,
Where sin hath marked ten thousand ways,
Its victims to ensnare;
They're broad, they're winding, and aslope,
They're void of truth, and void of hope,
All ending in despair.

Millions of travelers through these roads,
Borne down by sin in heavy loads,
To dark and dismal night.
One humble path, that never bends,
Narrow, yet rough and steep, ascends
From darkness into light.

Is there no guide to show that path?
The Gospel! He alone who hath
The Gospel, need not stray;
But he who hath, yet doth not give
The Gospel light that souls may live,
Himself shall lose the way.

DANIEL ORCUTT, Enfield, Conn.

Hampton Logic.

In order that a religious superstructure or organization may be eternal in duration, its foundations must be deeply laid in a substratum of Eternal Truth. In accordance with this proposition, I propose to show that we, as a Church of Believers in Christ's first and second appearing, are based upon an immutable and steadfast foundation, impregnable to any assault, so long as we ourselves continue to build thereon; conferring upon each faithful builder complete immunity from sorrow and danger, and, finally, placing such in a condition of sinless perfection, completely saving all souls, in all worlds, who are obedient to its practical suggestions:

1. The highest wisdom possible to be brought to bear on human weal must be embraced in that plan only, which, in its practical results, will secure the greatest good to the greatest number.

2. Again, this wisdom can reach and benefit man only through the agency of a universal law—that the less is and must be blest of the better. In other words, those possessing a measure of wisdom, goodness and perfection, must reach higher degrees of these through the agency of those possessing a greater amount of wisdom, goodness, etc., or remain forever where they are.

Now, if our system of religious life can be proved to stand upon these two immutable principles, it is safe for all time and eternity. Let us see: I remark then, first, that we are organized on the plan of the Pentecostal Church of Jesus; that is to say, we have all things in common, none being permitted to consider or to call aught that he holds his own, but distribution made as each has need. We are equally conditioned according to our several needs and circumstances relative to labor and clothes—equal in facilities for intellectual improvement, and equal in all the gifts, graces and consolations of the Holy Spirit. And, moreover, the sexes are equal in regard to the distribution of powers, privileges, responsibilities and offices, in the administration of the government of our organization, in things temporal and spiritual. Is not our organization, on this principle, the only one capable of securing the greatest good to the greatest number; at least the best that can be devised for man, during his abode on this earth?

A society or organization based on these principles is manipulated with undeviating reference to that great law of the universe, by which "the less is blest of the better." And here, it seems to me, is the point in which the Religious System, based on the foregoing principles, pre-eminently lays legitimate claim to a foundation firm as the everlasting hills. Every individual of Christ's true Church, from the least child to the highest officer, is mediately superintended and cared for by all the orders and spheres of the heavens who are farther progressed than he is; and superintended immediately by an order of persons supposed to be sufficiently in advance of him to subserve his every purpose for protection, and salvation from sin, as well as for growth in grace and holiness!

Now, this Divine Arrangement does not terminate in the highest representatives thereof here on the earth, but is continued through many orders, reaching, in its sublime gyrations, our Mother Ann and Jesus our Father, then their direct ministering angels and intelligences, etc., passing on through myriads on myriads of heavenly orders of spirits; in fact passing into a boundless infinitude of arrangement whose end is nowhere. If this sublime system of agency terminated at the highest point reached here in time, how could we be linked to the great battery of heaven, so as to receive its magnetic influence, and through that, our power to progress? We have better assurances. This connecting, transmitting claim of agency passes beyond the gateway of death, and on through sphere after sphere and order after order of heavenly intelligences, even ad infinitum.

Jesus and Ann are only heavenly links in the great chain or concatenation of agencies, through which the magnetisms and powers of progress are transmitted to all below them, for the purposes of spirit culture in holiness, and every good and perfect gift. That there is no end to this series of agencies, I think I have the best of reasons for believing, viewing the subject from philosophical and logical points. Besides, I have the testimony of one who declared, "there was no end to the heavens," when interrogated upon the subject of the different orders therein. Then the query arises, where is the great center of this magnetic influence, permeating every part of the universe, and moving by grand and sublime pulsations through the countless heavens and earths, which "roll in the depths of immensity?"

I answer: Where there is no circumference there can be no center; consequently this Divine influence is distributed wherever the visible or invisible machinery is found for its transmission in the whole concatenation of individualized intelligences throughout the universe. The direction of this power of the All Father and All Mother is forever toward higher and higher degrees of perfection in goodness and intelligence, from lower and more imperfect conditions. It may be asked: Do you not, by this argument, destroy the theory of a personal God outside of and independent of the universe of forms and forces? Answering this question indirectly, we think we furnish a "local habitation and a name" for the Father and Mother God, more consistent than any other theory can develop; and indeed any other theory or ascription of personality to God, will not bear the rigid scrutiny of logic or common sense for a moment; so at least it seems to the writer. The universe then is the home of our Father and Mother, and all progressive manifestations are the results of their influence and presence. This must be so, for if the universe of mind and matter is boundless and infinite, no God can be predicated as having a separate personal existence outside of it, because there is no outside, and, consequently, no room for such existence. Again, if the universe is peopled by infinite myriads of entities and individual intelligences, and the Father and Mother spirit permeate and abide in these, what need of a separate, incomprehensible abode outside of all these, or if these are infinite in extent, which is Ann Lee's testimony, what room, as before stated, is left for this separate abode? When we pray, we pray to all the hosts of heaven, even the myriads of individualized intelligences embracing the entire universe who are greater, holier and more perfect than ourselves; through these we reach the heavenly Father and Mother, who reside in this multinomial series as a sublime whole. Is not this praying to the All Father and Mother in their entirety, as far as we can have any intelligent comprehension of that entirety? But in this view is implied the great law of the universe, that "the less is blest of the better," and through this, that other condition, the plan by which the greatest good is secured to the greatest number. Millions of purposes are subserved through the medium of this arrangement, having for their object the best and highest results in the evolution of all things toward perfection. Among these benevolent purposes and intents, the eternal progress of man in intelligence, and greater and greater degrees of goodness and consequent salvation and happiness, stand pre-eminent. Jesus being the most holy, as well as the most intelligent organizer of which we have any history, and Mother Ann Lee having organized her Church precisely after Jesus' model, and both being based upon the two eternal laws of the universe (above stated), therefore it would seem to be proved that the foundation of the Church of Christ's second appearing is sure, steadfast, eternal, one upon which we may forever build in safety, passing on from grace to grace and from glory to glory forever, evolving from age to age higher degrees of intelligence, goodness and felicity during all the endless ages of the interminable future. •

The Flowers.

I walked through a beautiful garden so green,
My heart was quite filled with delight at the scene;
The flowers were all blooming, most gorgeously dressed;

But soon sad emotions my spirit depressed;
For this thought came o'er me: How short is your stay,

Ye beautiful flowers, so brilliant and gay?
With leaves now expanding, with colors so bright,
And buds bursting sweetly the eye to delight;
Refreshed by the dews of the morning so fair,
Exhaling sweet odors, perfuming the air;
But all those enchantments, so gay to the eye,
Though rich in their beauty, soon wither and die.

The beautiful summer!—how soon it is o'er,
And the bloom of the flowers is remembered no more;

But deep in the heart that is free from all stain,
There are flowers that bloom, and their beauty retain;

No rough wintry storms, nor fierce tempests that roll
Can harm those sweet flowers that bloom in the soul;
'Mid the hot scorching rays of earth's fierce summer
sun,

Their freshness and vigor appear just begun.

They will blossom anew in that heavenly land,

Where joys are eternal and beauties expand;

Where pure crystal streamlets continually roll

To water those flowers that bloom in the soul.

PLEASANT HILL, Ky.

POLLY M. RUPE.

THE following article speaks for itself. Some of our correspondents need just this instruction, with additions. We have some otherwise good articles on hand, which we know not what to do with, while very many have been reluctantly hurled into the waste basket:

The Lowell Courier says: "When will that millenium for editors arrive when correspondents and writers for the press will no longer fill their articles with such abbreviations as 'Sect.' for secretary, 'Pres.' for president, 'o'clk.' for o'clock and the like? when they will not interlard their sentences with nondescript hieroglyphics which they think answer for punctuation, but which are as meaningless to the typographical eye as an inscription from the Moabite stone? when will they not underscore every third word under the mistaken notion that the italic fronts of type are as large as the Roman? It is ordinarily easier for the journalist to copy a piece of manuscript than attempt to edit that furnished by those unaccustomed to write for the press. And yet the only directions to be followed are the simplest: to let the manuscript alone after putting down the words needed to express the meaning. As for not writing on both sides of the paper, we despair of ever beating that into the heads of correspondents."

Materialism.

The influence of Spiritualism, and its widespread action, is, indeed, one of the wonders of the nineteenth century. And, while it is a fulfillment of past predictions, it is also a prophecy that the face of modern civilization will undergo a change.

Several years (about 1843) before the advent of the "rappings," I heard the following prophecy uttered: "That which you have witnessed (Spiritualism on a small scale among the Shakers, will break forth among the world." This prophecy struck me with much force, for I saw in its fulfillment, revolutionary results. It has been, and is being fulfilled to an overflow beyond measure.

The mission of Spiritualism thus far has been to arrest materialism, and to disintegrate old organizations and ideas. All attempts by spiritualists to organize, have made bad worse.

In the present phase of Spiritualism, there also is a prophecy, namely: "That as a wave of spiritual light has reached rudimental humanity, so it will be succeeded by a wave of light and warmth combined, producing religious conviction, which, in its results, will be organizing. The elements with which to organize are plentifully strewn all over the realms of sentiment and intelligence. Prominently among these will be new religious formations; the organization of labor, and its results; physiological matters, referring themselves to the right use of the generative and nutritive functions. Also, governmental adaptations, taking cognizance of property in, and the distribution of, land, with the abolition of usury.* Getting into debt makes a man a slave; and taking usury makes a man a robber, abstractly. Quietly standing amid the din of human thought, is the Shaker form of human social life—"not numbered with the nations"—a Peak, isolated and alone. Its foundations not resting on mere human animal emotions, but on their denial, as a substratum, to be overlaid with human-divine emotions, as a new base of action.

Human reproductive emotions are the foundations of all forms of social life; domestic happiness and embroilments rest there also. Hence the wisdom of watching the heart, the emotions—with all diligence—for out of them are the issues of hate and war, as well as of love and peace.

One of the prominent sentiments of society at present is in the direction of a permanent amelioration and elevation of humanity as a whole. Governments that rule by might and power, force and fraud, as do lions and tigers, are less and less acceptable. The power to obtain and possess wealth, by merely lending

*The law of Moses required an equal division of the land to the Jewish people. It also made provision for such of them as might be too poor to cultivate their lots, for it, in the name of God of Israel, called upon the more wealthy of the people to give, or lend, to their poor brethren all they might be in need of for that purpose, without asking or receiving either usury or increase. And, moreover, if (through poverty or misfortune) any of the poor were unable to discharge the debt before the end of the sixth year, they were, in the seventh (or Sabbatical year) to be freely and entirely liberated from all and every demand of their creditors.

What a brilliant contrast is herein presented between the Mosaic and the (as it is very improperly called) "Christian" modes of providing the means of subsistence for the poor!

money without creating any wealth, is too palpably iniquitous to be recognized under any other denomination than that of Satanic. The antagonism between the accumulated products of labor and the laborer, shows such a deviation from the rule of right as justifies an assertion to which I have to plead guilty, "That humanity is now comparatively in hell." All over Christendom war establishments exist to kill and destroy, associated with extensive efforts, at home and abroad, to preach a gospel of peace, mercy and love, which is comparatively heaven yet. This is so outrageous and unnatural a mixture, that there can be no wonder in truthful men and women spurning with contempt such a combination, and looking elsewhere than to the meeting-house or the churches for hope and peace. Such a state of things so long continued has brought forth the infidel dogmatic materialist. He is the product of the absence of the divine in "the powers that be," coupled with doings which violate the common sense, as well as the higher instincts of humanity.

That form of materialism which ignored spiritual facts is to me the most illogical of all isms, because spiritual entities and their forces are the most material of all things, and are eternally manifesting themselves in tangible creations or effects. Our world is a world of effects modified by conditions; the unseen world is the world of causes—of spiritual intelligent forces. The most repugnant form of materialism is found in a praying, fighting, singing Christianity. To all doubters I would say, "Doubt, but be honest;" yet, do not allow doubting to make ruts, lest the wheels of progress should get bemired, and new and open ground could not be reached.

A few days ago a person said to me, "I am a materialist; what my five senses can take cognizance of, I can believe." He then began to decry Spiritualism as a humbug. To prove it so, he and some friends formed a circle, and the table began to move; a bulky person placed himself on the table, and still the table moved. His idea is, that the force that moved the table was confined to those in the body. I then began to analyze and illustrate somewhat as follows: It was not the bodies of those who formed the circle that moved the table, but an unseen impalpable force in possession of the circle. I then drew his attention to the indubitable evidences of spirit entity. I asked him if he ever had seen a dead spirit? implying, that as spirits in the body (taking him on his own ground), being in possession of an unseen impalpable force, when out of the body, would not be destitute of the same attribute. Spirit is force organized. Force is eternal, and that power which renders force subservient to intelligent will, could not be less than eternal.

He related the following: "He had a friend engaged in carrying (by water) butter to market. At a distance of more than a hundred miles, he saw his friend's vessel go to pieces; in a few days he had a letter informing him of the loss. I remarked that he was in possession of another sense in addition to the five."

A person well known and of good standing among his friends, had spent the best part of his life an invulnerable materialist; and had shown his great devotion to truth by much doubting. This, with its associate caviling, had made some ruts in his mind. Spiritualism came in his way—in his family, if I don't mistake. On its appearance, he met it with his old tactics; but the manifestations came so thick and strong that the old ruts caved in, and he appeared in print, declaring his conversion and adhesion to the truth of disembodied spirit-entity. Robert Owen, the social reformer and materialist, was met in the same way, and with the dignity of a true man, and the simplicity of a child, he accepted Spiritualism as a substantial reality.

The many proofs of spirit-entity have so thinned the ranks of the whole class of earthly materialists, that a corporal's guard is about all that is left of them. One fact dissipates the whole fabric of their doubts and negations.

I consider anti-religious materialism as only a passing phase of abnormal spirit-life, induced (as above stated) by long-continued outrages against the common sense and higher instincts of humanity which, by its love of truth, has providentially operated to destroy the system that gave it birth, a system falsely called "Christian," but which (its professions and practices considered) is really the most Satanic the world has ever beheld.

I have been asked, "What is your idea of God?" Upon this subject I have but few words to offer. I am capable of thought and of organizing thoughts, and of manifesting them in external forms. I am child enough to believe that I had a father and a mother; and that there is a Great Central Father and Mother of us all, who are capable of thought, and of organizing thoughts, even as I am, and of manifesting those thoughts by creations so grand and good, as to impress me with wonder, admiration and awe. They are not far from any one of us. I will follow on to know them.

I am thankful for the "express image" of their Divine attributes, as manifested through their first-born Son and Daughter from the human family—Jesus of Nazareth, and Ann of Manchester, which manifestation, with increase, is still continued through their successors in Christ—the Shaker Church, of their own establishing. These I will follow, to them I will gather, as to the properly anointed Shepherds of those whom Jesus Christ designated a "little flock."

"Come!" and (with me) learn of them, for they are "meek and lowly in heart." They seek not their own but others' welfare.

DANIEL FRASER, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

"Virtue alone is Happiness Below."

And, of course, the more perfect the virtue the more perfect the happiness. Self-indulgence is not virtue. Virtue is self-denial—"the narrow way that leadeth unto life"—happiness. Vice is self-indulgence, gratification—"the broad road that leadeth unto death"—unhappiness.

NORTH UNION, O.

Consecration,

According to Webster, means "devoted to sacred uses." Let us consider this important subject. We, as members of the Society of Believers, have covenanted to consecrate our all to the upbuilding of the principles of Zion. This is a weighty obligation! It signifies our willingness to sacrifice our worldly inclinations, and yield obedience to a visible lead. These cannot be accomplished by following our own inclinations, unless these are consecrated and ratified by the Church. If I say I am consecrated, yet claim the right to dispose of my services as I think proper, I give the lie to my profession, for I have solemnly agreed to yield myself obediently to a visible Lead, and failing to do so destroys my avowal of consecration. No matter how talented an individual may be, if not consecrated, he may be the means of great discord, and the cause of Society's failure of blessing. Consecrated truly, will be the devotion of our all for the benefit of mankind, having no selfish objects in view, no personal desires to gratify; looking not for any reward, other than an approving conscience; standing firm for the cause of truth and justice; devoted to the right because it is right. Then are we truly consecrated.

Angel's Call.

Hear the voice of Angel spirits

Calling loudly unto all,

"Come up higher—Come away from Sinful acts by Adam's fall.

"Leave behind all works of darkness—

Leave a life of sin and woe!

Live to God—live pure and holy,

While upon this earth below.

"God's right arm will guide you yonder,

Far above earth's pleasures vain,

Where pure joys, substantial, holy,

With you evermore remain.

"Then let all be found advancing—

Toiling with a heart and will;

Laying waste the haunts of evil,

And the Oil of Love distill."

Truth's Mission.

All hail with joy the blessed day,
That gospel truth may wing its way
O'er this heaven-favored land of ours,
To aid the soul's expanding powers.

O, may it enter every heart,
And quenchless light and faith impart;
Until the kingdom here shall come,
To be the humble seeker's home.

O, Gospel, gentle as a dove,
Thine olive branch of peace and love
Shall guide the weary traveler's feet,
Through fields where hostile armies meet.

For in earth's field of toil and strife,
The soul that seeks the higher life
Will, by thy talismanic charm,
Be kept secure from every harm.

Thou art the very Source of Truth,—
A lamp alike to age and youth,—
From each polluting thing a shield,
For all in thee, to God are sealed.

Bright Gospel, let thy glory roll
In thunder tones from pole to pole;
And wake the slumbering ones of earth,
To struggle for the heavenly birth.

Yea, cast the veil of night aside,
And break the bands of sin and pride;
Unto the sorrowing race of man
Reveal salvation's lowly plan.

L. A. WOODWARD, Whitewater, O.

The Omnipresence of Deity.

Alas, how weak, short-sighted, and inconsistent are we! We may say we feel the power of God within us, but would be shocked to hear one say, "I feel God within me." It will do very well to say that no soul can be saved without the operation and indwelling of the spirit of God; we should be startled to hear one say he could not be saved without the indwelling of God in his soul. So, we hesitate not to admit that God is Omnipotent—Almighty, but we can scarcely grant the possibility of his ubiquity. We must fix him a local habitation, give him a form, and take from him Infinity. Nevertheless, we may be assured that wherever the power of God is felt or perceived, there is the God of Power, since it is as absurd to suppose the power of God without God, as to suppose God without power. Where the spirit of God is, there is God, for God is spirit; and it would be as absurd to suppose the Spirit of God without God, as to suppose God without Spirit. It is a mere figment of the fancy to suppose that the Spirit of God is something distinct from God, and is as absurd as to consider the mind or spirit of man something distinct from man. The phrase, "Spirit of God," may be defined as God's influence, and it is mostly applied to the manifestation of Divine power in individualized being—an inspirational saving influence of God in the soul of man. As to the Omnipresence of God, which is so much more difficult for some to perceive than his Omnipotence, it will be found that the latter cannot be rationally conceived to exist without the former. It must be admitted that where God is there is power, and because his presence is infinite, his power must also be infinite; and it is for this very reason that his power is infinite, because he is everywhere, there ready to do what he sees should be done. "The eye of the Lord is in every place, beholding the evil and the good." (Prov. xv., 3.) Again, His Omniscience can no more be rationally admitted without supposing his Omnipresence, than can his Omnipotence. Inasmuch as he is everywhere present, he in every place sees and knows all that exists or takes place, and happy is he who believes that nothing, the most minute, can take place without, at least, his notice. "The very hairs of your head," said Jesus, "are all numbered, and not one of them falls to the ground without your Heavenly Father's notice—not one sparrow falls to the ground without your Father." How could he have taught the ubiquity of God in stronger language? How, more clearly and cogently, could he have set forth the infinity of his power and providence, his goodness and government even in the most minute things? Happy are they who heartily and habitually believe in this Omnipresence and infinite goodness of God, the Heavenly Father and Mother, and who are reconciled to everything which He permits; who see his footsteps in every thing without them, and feel Him "working within them to will and to do of his own good pleasure," being conscious that they are daily and faithful co-workers with him. By Father and Mother, I do not mean two distinct persons or beings in Deity, but that in the one Infinite Spirit or Divine Essence, there exists the attributes of Father and Mother, just as much the one as the other. But Father and Mother are the names of relations, not of essences, and belong to that class of things which logicians call accidents. They are accidental qualities or titles. This by-the-by. We will proceed with our main subject, the Omnipresence. If it is difficult to conceive the ubiquity of Deity, how shall we comprehend his eternity? How shall we grasp the tremendous thought that "He inhabiteth eternity!" (Isa. lvii., 15)—that all time, all being, and all possible events, past, present, and to come, are alike intimately present with him, so that he "inhabits," dwells in, and comprehends the whole as fully and clearly as the least parts—that, as he inhabits and fills infinite space, so he as perfectly inhabits and comprehends the whole infinite duration? Yet all this is but a faint and inadequate idea of his infinity. Our ideas on this subject must always be imperfect, and can only amount to this, that after extending them to the utmost bounds of thought on every side, there is still something to be added—an infinity of greatness and glory beyond, that a finite mind can never reach. Yet even such inadequate thoughts of Deity are profitable and consoling, when we consider that this incomprehensible infinity of power and goodness stands pledged for the protection and final happiness of all who put their trust in him and obey his laws. Into what insignificance and nothingness we little worms do sink, with all our boasted greatness! Surely, if God were anything less than infinite we should be entirely overlooked. But while the thought of his infinity humbles us in the dust, it consolingly assures us that we cannot exist without his special notice and regard. For if we should conceive of the least animalcule or atom existing somewhere in the universe out of the reach of his knowledge and notice, we should instantly destroy the idea of his infinity, yea, of his existence, because if one animalcule or atom can exist without his creative and sustaining power, thousands more—yea, all the animals and atoms in the universe can exist without him! Thus, the necessity of God's infinity rests on the same foundation as that of his existence, and we cannot overturn one without destroying the other.

R. W. PELHAM.

SHAKERISM is a desperate remedy for a desperate disease. It is radical, certainly, and it is a question whether any less radical measure can meet the appalling character of the passions, as they appear in the unvarnished manifestations of every day life. But whether it be a finality or not, it is manifest that there can scarcely be even a decent degree of saintliness till men and women are able to live a celibate life, so long as duty, inspiration or reason shall dictate. If there be a possibility of living out a partial affiliation of fraternal love and sexual passion, without the cast iron rules imposed by monogamic marriage and the Shaker brotherhood, the road to it lies through Shaker grounds, at least.—New Campaign.

To the Juvenile Class.

Childhood, Youth, Manhood, and Old Age are analogous to the seasons. The human heart represents the soil. Childhood is the spring time of life. Then is the proper time to prepare the mind and heart to receive the seeds of truth, such as Honesty, Chastity, Meekness and Love. The heart, like the earth, contains seeds or germs that would grow spontaneously and bring forth fruit; but an enemy has infused poison into the soil, and sowed seeds there that are not pure and good, and, if left to grow, would produce wild and bitter fruit, if not decidedly poisonous, and they are unworthy to occupy a place in such a beautiful garden as the human heart should be. Hence the necessity for commencing early to plow deep, that we may upturn the soil and destroy any vile weed that may already have taken root there. Some young persons cling with great tenacity to those plants which spring spontaneously from the heart, because they are pleasant to the eye and sweet to the taste, and are not very bad. But, if wise, we shall seek the best—the very best. There is only so much soil, and we can ill-afford space, even for the indifferent. If young minds would only decide upon one point, i. e., that they will always relinquish the inferior for the superior, and welcome the hand of the cultivator to pass over them, and pluck up and cut down everything but the useful and the good, then, through the medium and by the help of those instruments which the great Husbandman of souls has provided, together with the action of the spiritual and divine elements, wind, rain, dews and sunshine, every good plant will flourish and grow, and yield its increase a hundred fold. And, like the industrious tiller of the material soil, such will gather with a prudent hand all the choice fruits in their season—natural and spiritual truths—in science and religion, and store the mind with all useful knowledge pertaining to the life that is present and future, and cause the reason and conscience to be co-workers in gathering all that is virtuous, good, and true into the mind and heart. And when spring, summer and autumn have passed, and the infirmities of age creep upon them, they will be able to wrap themselves in a mantle of truth which they have woven, and feast upon the fruits of their labors, until an angel messenger is sent with his chariot to convey their spirits home. Then they can lie down upon their couch and be gathered in peace to their spiritual fathers and mothers, to feast upon the fruits of their toil in the bright summer land, where the wintry winds can never reach them more.

The change from the terrestrial to the celestial spheres will be a source of joy, not of sorrow and sadness, to those who have well-performed all the duties pertaining to the rudimentary sphere of existence. The death-sting is taken away, and the grave can have no victory over the heart where nought but true plants have been cultivated, and which will continue their growth, and bear fruit in the immortal land. Love-angels stand ready to extend the hand of welcome to such, and to offer the meed "well done, enter into rest." But rest does not imply inaction. The highest order of angels work. An approving conscience in reference to the past will stimulate to future action in the life and real home of the soul, which is beyond the shadowy vale of time.

My young friends, you are now in the spring-time of life. What is to be your future course of action? Will you seek to satisfy the emotional feelings which so often crave present pleasure, at the expense of principle, and thus produce the wild flowers and plants of nature at the expense of the good and the true—blight the finer feelings, and desecrate the soil of your hearts? Or, will you choose the better part, and cultivate in your hearts innocence, purity, child-like simplicity, and every other virtue that will fit you to be companions of angels in spheres above?

In the celestial garden, immortal flowers are blooming of the fairest, richest hue, and they send forth a sweet perfume. It is the work of the angels. They sow, and they reap what they sow. They plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of the vine. The blight, nor the canker-worm does not reach that clime, for there law is not broken, and sin is not known.

Life in God.

Men are hunting for God, seriously looking after a physical being who will compare with their pre-conceived opinions of a Supreme Being; by continuing the search, they will certainly come up somewhere, perhaps among the ancient Egyptians, Greeks, or Romans, for they had gods many. The holy Saviour said, "God is spirit, and they that worship him must worship in spirit." Again, "no man hath seen God at any time," for the simple reason that he cannot be seen by the natural eye. We may see and feel the agency of God in our fellow beings, where he is manifest for salvation; we judge of good men, who are intellectually enlightened, by their actions—those who see, know, speak, and act the truth. God is truth. Every work of God is founded on truth, and the continued growth in truth is a positive test that the work is divine; the man of God is thus manifested to the world. In the Lord Jesus was God manifest in flesh or humanity; so in his faithful followers, the apostles, and thus in every pious man or woman in his or her degree.

God is justice, and is manifested in every just person, whose life is a continued exemplification of the divine attribute.

God is love, and whenever and wherever love flows into our souls direct, it is God, and from the brethren and sisters, it is God flowing through his children to each other—in fact, love is the permeating and pervading, and all-uniting bond of the universe.

God is wisdom, as seen in all his plans and works; for the universe of organized mind and matter is planned and executed with the most consummate skill and intelligence.

God is power, the motive power of the worlds without end; this force of the Almighty is continually in operation, carrying forward the universal machinery; without this infinite and continued propelling force, the whole would cease action.

Growth, of every description, comes under the same supervision and law of love, in the development and maturation of all plants, and their continuation and perfection by the immutable laws of increase.

To sum up, the whole, both animate and inanimate, the plan, the execution, and continuation of the vast expanse, all are of our Heavenly Parents!

It will not do to talk of inherent principles, for principles are only the emanations of the Godhead, and of themselves they are simply a nullity—without the creative Original, a blank.

If man is carelessly curious to see God, and will not be satisfied to believe that he is, because of his intangibility, as an ocular demonstration, let us ask him to make some experiments on himself. He is moved by spirit or intelligence; has he ever had ocular demonstration of his own powers of thought?

Can he inform us of the mode, of the wonderful working of the machinery in the production of his ideas, and his continuous faculties on the complications of mind and matter?

Man is said to be a microcosm of the world, of the solar system, and of the universe. In him there is a center, or focus of thought; the whole body is moved and controlled by the nerves connected with the power of thought, and extending to the extremities of the animal machinery. Also, the mind has the power of self-control; the whole economy of body and mind is moved by the central controlling influence—intelligence and love.

Looking at the solar system, we see the sun himself, with his deputed power, in the center of the dependent orbs, controlling and carrying them with him in his unceasing cycles; this system is in concatenation with another, and it again has its joining; and so, by analogy, the whole universe is joined to the Empyrean of the Eternal; the center—the God-home of intelligence and love!

Around this eternal center—the Empyrean—revolve the whole universe of mind and matter, and from this inexhaustible source radiate law, life, love, and intelligence to the whole creation. God governs the universe of matter by fixed and inherent laws; the universe of mind by agency of ministering spirits.

And if we may be allowed and permitted the figure of speech, by way of illustration: to the Empyrean battery are connected all the ethereal telegraph wires which send the divine intelligence to the innumerable hosts of intelligent beings, from the highest archangel down through the conjoined precincts, with their kingdoms and families, to our earth, peradventure, near the very verge of intelligence.

WM. REDMON.

Life is like a flower bed, in which thorns and roses grow promiscuously. Wisdom alone teaches us to gather one and refuse the other.

The great test of true friendship is constancy in the hour of danger, and adherence in the season of distress.

A mind well trained and long exercised in virtue, does not easily change any course it once undertakes.

Be Encouraged.

When dark spirits, round us stealing,
Storm the castle of our heart,
Let us, to our faith appealing,
Bid them, in God's name, depart!
Why, with clouds dark o'er us rolling,
Veil the radiance of our sky,
While bright angels, round us calling,
Come with sunshine from on high!

All above, around, is beauty,
Sun by day and stars by night;
Happiness our only duty,
And in God our sole delight.
Every pulse that beats to heaven,
Every thought attuned to prayer,
Every tear to pity given,
Is a crown of glory there.

There each stream is music flowing,
And each breeze is melody,
Heart to heart in union growing,
Soul to soul in purity.
See the golden chain ascending,
Joining earth to heaven above;
See bright glories with it blending,
And its links all formed of love.

Freedom.

What is Freedom and where is it to be found?

Our fathers fought for freedom. We inherited it; are said to be the free-born sons and daughters of America. We certainly are inspired with a love for freedom, and consequently have acquired a strong detestation of bondage. But liberty, true liberty, is not attained by the sword. Though our country may boast of freedom, yet are the people free? Are they not fettered down to earth by passion, pride, envy, revenge, and evils too numerous to mention? Can we boast of liberty when we are not able to govern ourselves? Jesus said: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." Cowper, in some of his inspired writings, says: "He is a free man whom the truth makes free, and all are slaves beside." This has been a subject I have considered attentively from my youth up. It seems really lamentable that in these professedly free United States, after the struggle there has been to emancipate slavery, that it should still exist in our midst, wherein all might and should be free. I hate slavery. I read in one of my school books, words like these: "And even now in some parts of united America, women are but little better than slaves." How shocking! And again: "Man tarnishes his name and brightens it again; but if woman chance to swerve from the strictest rules of virtue,

"Ruin ensues reproach and endless shame,
And one false step forever blasts her fame;
In vain with tears the loss she may deplore,
In vain look back to what she was before,
She sets like stars that fall to rise no more."

Is this right? I think not. It is not so in Christ's kingdom. Jesus said: "He that is without sin, let him first cast a stone." And to the woman: "Go and sin no more." If it is so in the kingdom of this world, I do not blame the women for wanting more rights. Certainly all now have a right not to tarnish their name; and I would that they all had the grace and dignity not to do it. I am sensible that I live in a very enlightened age and country, and do feel a strong sympathy with those of my sex who would be glad to live lives of purity, if they could find the requisite protection. I believe there are many refined young females who would wish to live virtuous lives devoted to God, if they knew of a way. To all such I would say there is an asylum—I have found it, and have for many years breathed its pure air free from all contaminating influences, surrounded by dear brethren and sisters who are ever willing to strengthen and encourage, not draw down, and back, but onward and upward. This haven, and this relation, THE SHAKER will point you to.

THE SHAKER.—This is the title of an able periodical, published monthly at Albany, N. Y., under the direction of the Mt. Lebanon Bishopric of Shakers, and in the interests of that interesting people. While almost every other sect and ism in the United States has its organ, it was only last January that the Shakers established one of their own for the first time, and it was done in response to the urgent demands of the friends of reform, that they should give their ideas of life and happiness as viewed from the Shaker platform. The world at large is somewhat cognizant of the life and practice of the Shakers, but are almost entirely ignorant of their principles and doctrines. "The Shaker" gives information upon all these points, and is a very interesting paper to every inquiring mind. Fifty cents per annum. Address G. A. Lomas.—Springfield (Mass.) Union.

Love and Fire.

Religious revivals are the resultant of the love of God toward humanity. Love is fire, in its ultimate incarnated. "God is love;" and this makes God a consuming fire through jealousy. "I am a jealous God," hating idolatry and adultery above all things, and always operating to destroy the idols as Abraham destroyed the images of gods and goddesses, which his father made his living by creating. Christendom is "full of idols;" consequently, when the righteous in a city pray to God, as Lot did in Sodom, they are praying for the destruction of that city, unless timely repentance—a turning from idolatry—averts it. As Jefferson affirms, all great cities are the cancers of the nation; being produced by false organic laws, permitting the monopoly of life elements, and destroying the taste of the people for rural pursuits—agriculture in its various branches—it is merely a matter of time when such a city as London will be destroyed, and by what agency. We may hope that it will be through the soil of England being returned to its owners, the people; and that the soil will allure the people from London, leaving it, like Babylon, to "the owls and bitterns;" for the prophecy of desolation upon that city is as applicable to all cities as it was to Babylon.

The fact that a certain city is destroyed, does not prove that its wickedness exceeded "above all other cities," but that it was more ripe, and that the love of God was towards it in an especial manner; and that as it has perished, so likewise will all other cities perish, unless their inhabitants repent.

Under the law of "the co-relation of forces," the love of God may be transformed into material fire, sweeping away, as in a moment, the accumulated labors of many generations, who had not wrought in God sufficient to preserve "their works." Not that there was no good—no religion—nor yet that there was no natural fire to begin the conflagration at Chicago. In Rev. 9:23, "Moses and Aaron went into the tabernacle of the congregation, and came out and blessed the people, and the glory of the Lord appeared unto all the people, and there came a fire out from before the Lord and consumed upon the altar the burnt offering and the fat, which when all the people saw, they shouted and fell on their faces." In this case, there was no physical fire as a nucleus; but when "Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, took either of them his censer and put fire therein, and put incense thereon, and thus offered strange fire before the Lord—"natural fire"—which he commanded them not, "there went out fire from the Lord, and devoured them, and they died before the Lord." They lacked faith as spiritualists.

How far, and to what extent, do the modern priesthood offer strange fire, when they offer their gifts—sparks of their own kindling—eloquent prayers, and learned essays—fires of ambition, impelled by the love of self—in place of the true spiritual gifts of the primitive church? Will they not, one of these days, originate a conflagration that will burn up them and their works? In 1st Kings, 18:34, Elijah said to the prophets of Baal, "Call ye on the name of your gods, and I will call upon the Lord; and the god that answereth by fire, let him be God; and all the people answered and said: it is well spoken." "They, the priests of Baal, took the bullock which was given to them, and dressed it, and called on the name of Baal from morning till noon, saying, O Baal, hear us! But there was no voice, nor any that answered; and Elijah mocked them, saying: Cry aloud; for he is a god; either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is on a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked. And they cried aloud, and cut themselves with knives as was their manner, till the blood gushed out, but with no avail. When it came Elijah's turn, they filled four barrels with water three several times, and poured it upon the burnt sacrifice and the wood, and the fire of the Lord fell, and not only consumed the burnt sacrifice, but, as in Chicago, it burnt "the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench." And the people said: "The Lord, he is the God; the Lord, he is the God;" and the unspiritual prophets were themselves destroyed. This descent of fire frequently occurred during the history of the Jewish nation. This fire would not injure the righteous any more than water would injure fish.

"Who amongst us," Isaiah inquired, "will dwell with the devouring fire? Who shall dwell with everlasting burnings? The Lord descended upon Mount Sinai in fire, and the people were afraid because of the fire, and said: Let us not see this great fire any more."

In Numbers, 35, after the earth had swallowed up the houses and all the men that pertained unto Cora, with their goods, "there came out fire from the Lord and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense." But, of all the prophets of Israel, none exceeded Elijah as a medium of spiritual power over the material elements.

2 Kings i: The king sent a captain and fifty men, to bring Elijah down from the top of a hill on which he sat. Approaching, the captain said (mockingly), "Thou man of God, the king hath said come down;" and Elijah answered: If I be a man of God, then let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty; and there came down fire from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty. And when a second captain and fifty was sent, being a little afraid, he said: "O man of God, thus hath the king said: 'Come down quickly.'" Again the prophet called for fire to consume them, and the fire of God came down from heaven and consumed him and his fifty. And the captain of the third fifty was sent, and went up, and, like the Egyptians, being thoroughly converted to a belief in Spiritualism, fell on his knees before Elijah, and besought him, and said to him, "O man of God, I pray thee let my life, and the life of these fifty, thy servants, be precious in thy sight. Behold there came fire down from heaven and burnt up the two captains of the former fifties, with their fifties, therefore let my life be precious in thy sight." This humble and candid confession showed that the fire of the Lord was going back from whence it came, towards the interior of things. It had burnt up unbelief in the captain's soul, and become again a spiritual fire of faith and zeal towards God. The angel of the Lord said unto Elijah, "Go down with him." The fire had reached the soul of the king also; and "Elijah said to him: Thou hast sent messages to inquire of Baal-Zebub, the god of Ekron; therefore thou shalt not come down off that bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die. So the king died, and Elijah was not injured. And Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven," from whence the fire came. It was not his body that went up, but his soul and spirit that had already ascended into the heaven—the paradise of the Jews.

Thus did Elijah subdue military power by Spiritualism, according to the true design of the Mosaic dispensation, where the war power was transferred from the physical to the lower sphere of the spiritual world. It is on this wise that war will be abolished, and the millenium inaugurated, in which the nations shall cease to learn and practice it any more. In that epoch, the male and female will be equally represented in the earthly government, which will become the image of the government of the universe.

War Raised One Step Higher.

The Christ Spirit, with which Jesus was baptized, converted and convicted him first from the Jewish plan of war—the application of physical force—by means of which, he cleansed the temple of the commercial people who were trading and trafficking under a cloak of religion, calling them "thieves and robbers," who were desecrating the house of prayer. This was one step upwards. "The zeal of the Lord's house had eaten him up." Further travail prepared him for another step; so that when a village of the Samaritans refused to receive him and his disciples, because his face was set as though he would go to Jerusalem, with whose inhabitants they held no social communion, James and John said: "Lord, wilt thou command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did?" Jesus turned and rebuked them, and said: "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of," in respect to the spirit and practice of war. Ye are good Jews, after the pattern of Elijah; but are not yet converted to Christianity, which will save you from destroying your enemies even by spiritual agencies, and even when they are heretics, and have refused to receive and entertain the Son of Man, having turned their backs upon the kingdom of heaven, which had come nigh unto them. "For the Son of Man has not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them, both body and soul, provided they will obey the truth." This obedience will never be secured, except through a baptism of fire and love, which shall create, as at pentecost, a genuine spiritualistic, religious revival.

Shaker Iconoclasm.

While millions are seeking their heavens in the indulgences of perverted passions, we are called to work ours out by severe chastisement of our affections for sinful lusts—by rigid self-denial to all that engenders worldly ambition or selfish aggrandizement.

After thousands of years' activity in the habitual practices of war, marriage, private property; of carnal desires, and the gratification of those desires by our ancestors; we are commanded to turn back the tide of nature, and build the foundations of a new structure, that condescends not to the use of a single material, good nor bad, that constitutes the bulwarks of the old order of life! Who, then, wonders at our persecution? Who is surprised at the few who bear the ordeal and comply with the command? Or who wonders at the worldly cry of the failure of SHAKERISM, and the desires that it should fail, while it is making such devastation with worldly institutions? It has already proved itself a successful regenerator; and what has been done by it, can with it be accomplished again.

True Wealth.

Be my mind a sacred treasury,
Stored with gems and diamonds bright,
Where no dross shall ever gather,
That would dim their lustrous light.
Garnered there the wealth of knowledge,
Truth and Wisdom's golden sheaves,
Richest fruits and fragrant flowers,
Not alone life's fading leaves.
Walls of sapphire form the chambers,
By eternal Goodness made,
I will fill this heavenly structure
With the sunshine, not the shade.
I will hang it round with pictures,
That shall give me joy to see,
Not the imagery of demons,
That would haunt and follow me.
Like the ghosts in ancient story,
Protean forms of passions base,
Sordid loves, and gross desires—
These the temple would deface.
Innocence and pure affection,
Deeds in consecration wrought,
Holy thoughts and aspirations,
To this temple shall be brought.
Gems of good my soul shall cherish,
Spurn the false and prize the true,
Look beyond the things that perish,
Where bright glories rise to view.
Brighter now appears the prospect,
And the angel life is mine;
Growth and progress are eternal,
In the spheres of truth divine.

MARTHA ANDERSON, Mt. L.

Christian Equality.

"Ye are all brethren."

There is nothing in the teaching of Jesus Christ more apparent than the thorough and absolute change he purposed to effect in the lives of all those who should become his disciples. This change had reference not only to the individual character of each, but also to the relations they were to sustain toward each other as a community of believers. He taught not only humility, in contradistinction to pride and vanity; gentleness, in opposition to an overbearing spirit; faith and patience, as arrayed against distrust and heart-consuming anxiety; love to God and the neighbor instead of hatred; but a change in the fundamental condition of Society. In it there was to be neither noble nor plebeian, rich nor poor, bond nor free, as they had hitherto existed in all human societies, not excepting that established by Moses. Not only were these distinctions to find no place in the community of his followers, but even the titles, which were wont to foster the pride of those installed into any office among men, were to be discarded. "Be ye not called Rabbi, or Teacher, for one is your Teacher; call no man your Father upon earth, for one is your Father." There is but one simple relation to be sustained among all the disciples of Christ, that of brethren, the children of one common, divine parentage.

This teaching is thoroughly radical, and aims to eradicate a disposition that has had a controlling influence upon mankind for ages upon ages—that of exalting one's self at the expense of others. It is not surprising that it has produced so little effect comparatively in the world, nor is it a cause of discouragement to one who has studied the Divine method of working, that this doctrine was so soon abandoned by many of the professed teachers of Christ's religion; that the head of one of the divisions into which the church was split should be styled Papa, Pope, or Father; that the chief of another division should be called Patriarch, or Chief Father; and that the teachers of other divisions should assume or accept the title of Doctor, which is simply another term for Rabbi. The Infinite has an eternity in which to accomplish his plans.

Nothing else was to be expected, when the professed disciples of Christ discarded his teachings in this respect, but that they should seek to justify their conduct; nor is it a matter of wonder that those who disallow his authority altogether should style him fanatic, because of his extreme doctrines. Chateaubriand, the celebrated defender of "the Church" against the infidels of his day, conscious that Jesus had uttered some radical sayings respecting equality, says: "The Christian religion establishes the doctrine of moral equality, the only kind which can be preached without overthrowing the world." That is, to give his own explanation, Christian priests can remind the great ones of earth that they are made of no nobler dust than the plebeian, which truth the priests of ancient Paganism did not dare to utter in the ears of a Nero or a Tiberias. This wonderful gain, then, has been made by Christianity over Paganism! To preach more than this would be to overthrow the world!

But Christian equality, whenever practiced, does overthrow the world, and that is the very design of it. It banishes at once and forever all those distinctions created and fostered by human pride, whether of ruler and subject, nobleman and vassal, or clergy and laity. It discards not only the secular titles, as they are called, of Emperor, King, Duke, etc., but ecclesiastical as well—Sovereign Pontiff, My Lord the Archbishop, or Bishop, being as open to Christ's reprehension as any other title. It puts an end to that selfish abuse of God's gifts, by which a few appropriate to themselves that which belongs to the many. It diffuses an abundance of everything useful among all without distinction. It establishes not merely what the French writer styled "moral equality," which still leaves the haughtiness of the haughty undisturbed; allows every distinction in Society which human pride has devised, together with every display in dress, equipage and residence that tends to keep up those distinctions, but also actual equality, bringing the proud down to the position they should occupy, and raising the degraded to a condition in which they may enjoy God's greatest blessings. It makes short work with everything that enkindles wars or engenders strife of any kind, removing all the causes that lead to them. It strikes a deadly blow at all pleasure, passions and lusts, whose tendency is to weaken and destroy the physical, intellectual and spiritual man, and to introduce into the world of God's creation whatever causes hatred, divisions, and moral disturbances. It not only brings society upon a level, but gives to the individual subject of it perpetual quiet of soul.

"It makes the rough paths of peevish nature even,
And opens in each breast a little heaven."

Christian equality, therefore, tends to overthrow both the great world that exists in the form of human tyranny and slavery, of inequality in wealth and privileges everywhere prevalent, and the world of pride, ignorance, passion, lust, envy and hatred, and every ignoble thing that exists in the individual breast. In overthrowing these, however, it does not leave society in a state of chaos, nor the individual to float rudderless over the dark ocean. Gradually it brings order out of confusion, dispels the darkness of the mental horizon, brings in the dawn with its resplendent colors, and ultimately diffuses everywhere the heart-cheering and invigorating light of the perfect day. When the former heaven and earth have passed away, the Sons of God chant the anthem that celebrates the creation of the new; they sing of peace and love, of order, equality, and perpetual unanimity. Their melody inspires and fills the souls of all who constitute the family of heaven.

WM. H. BUSSELL.

Life in God.

The First Great Cause has deeply implanted in human souls the laws of righteousness, for the government of his children in their conduct towards each other; and in the revelation of His Divine will, these laws in the mind are confirmed.

The Saviour said: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them." His whole life was a dedication to the laws of love and divine justice.

In the laws of life, there is a fitness, an appropriateness in human action; we will call this fitness Justice. Human beings feel that they are entitled to be treated justly in all the transactions of life. Every one feels that he or she has an inherent right to the bounties of a kind Providence, and cannot feel satisfied when any of these rights are withheld or denied.

Integrity in man will scrupulously allow all these rights to a fellow being; not only allow, but bestow kind acts to aid his fellow man. In the wide domain of commerce, the man of integrity will make known the quality, age and condition of his produce, and regard in weight and measurement the same honesty.

Every citizen should feel safety in person, character and property; uncertainty in these destroys our happiness. Each man should feel a concern for the life, character and property of his fellow man, not only to guard against casualties, but to render, in sickness or affliction, a kind and willing assistance.

Common prudence should teach that we are all human beings, and, as such, may need the same kind attention; and that the human heart, full and running over, will be ready and desirous, under these generous impulses, to render back the measure more than full. The gifted and fortunate should voluntarily be guardians for their less-gifted and unfortunate fellow beings, and, in kindness, counsel them, show them, entreat them; for they lack understanding of the conditions, proprieties, duties and dangers of life. Suffering mortality is beseeching, and must not be turned away empty. O, for the compassion of the Christ spirit!

To the young man or woman in nature, whose life is to begin as the future father or mother, these inquiries should arise: Do I start with integrity in every purpose and design in this highest, earthly prerogative, to do the will of my heavenly parents, in perpetuating my likeness and representative in time? Or, am I looking forward to scenes of voluptuousness, irrespective of my call, obligations, or consequences? Do I consider that life and death are set before me, and that I am accountable for the use of my endowments and for the consequent good or evil that may arise in my connection, through time, and for ages to come?

In the matrimonial union you have pledged yourselves to verity and integrity without reserve; and in keeping this solemn declaration in accordance with the laws of nature, depends your future fruitfulness and blessing.

In the family relation must be instituted good government; faithful obedience for the child, and religious, rational instruction for youth, all conducted in the spirit of the true Christian. A sacred veneration for God and His divine attribute, Truth, should be deeply planted in the juvenile mind. In the family mansion is laid the foundation of future government of state and nation; may it be laid on the basis of truth and obedience to law and order, for God works through these principles for the salvation of nations.

Let us examine the inmost recesses of thought, for in the laboratory of the mind are manufactured the intentions, designs and consummations of human existence.

WM. REDMON.

Are the Shakers Ascetics?

In all ages, mankind have felt the desire to appease an offended Deity; for men have erred since the early days of earth's history, and consequently felt the sting of remorse and unhappiness, the natural result of violating God's laws. And as most men will relent and forgive an injury, when approached humbly and sorrowfully by the offending party, so men, in their short-sighted conception of the Eternal, have thought to propitiate Him, and regain their own peace of mind, by vows and sacrifices, or the observance of an ascetic life. Others, again, stimulated, doubtless, by a pious longing after holiness and purity, proposed to subdue the inherent inclination to evil, and the inordinate desires of their minds, by seclusion, fasting, the recitation of long prayers, bodily torments, and the abjuration of every comfort or innocent pleasure! They are called Ascetics—persons who, secluded from the world, live a rigid and austere life, and employ their time mostly in devotions and mortifications. Are the Shakers Ascetics? This epithet is not uncommonly applied. Let us look at their everyday life, and thereby see whether the name "Ascetics" properly belongs to them.

Do they live secluded from the world? Decidedly they do, in a certain sense. They claim to live in retirement from the world, in a life of self-discipline and preparation for a future state. There are no high, cloister walls around their buildings, and no dark courts lead to their dwellings; but God's bright sunlight is invited everywhere, to cheer with its rays, this simple and unassuming people. The visitor or traveler will not find the forbidding words, "No admittance," written on any of their gates or doors, but meets with a kind and hearty welcome, with an invitation to examine and judge for himself; while hardly a day passes by in which hundreds of strangers do not come through their farms and villages. The hermits of old retired from the world, and buried themselves in the inaccessible wilderness, and many a weary and sad heart now, will retire behind the gloomy walls of a cloister. They were and are Ascetics. Are Shakers? They retire from the world so far as not to take part in political movements, which certainly tend to abstract the mind from higher and purer pursuits; nor in the usual pleasures of the world—the principles that make the world (see John ii. 15, 16)—considering them as not consistent with a life devoted to spiritual progress. They have separated from the principles of the world, but do not live in seclusion; they shun the evils of the world, and all which leads to worldliness, but do not shun its children, in whose souls are the images of God; they come in contact with those who are of the world, but live not according to the demands of the world—are they, therefore, Ascetics?

Is their life rigid and austere? It may appear so to the egotist or the devotee of pleasure, but not to the philosopher or Christian. The ancient axiom, "The fewer wants, the more happiness," is still true. All the riches in the world will never suffice to supply the wants of a depraved appetite, for every sensual gratification excites a desire for new indulgences of a more refined kind, and in proportion to their fulfilment, the passion demands those that are more extensive and luxurious. "Shakers," or "Believers," enjoy the products of nature, with which they are amply supplied, and use all the comforts and conveniences which the fruits of their industry permit. They live not in luxury, but in comfort; not in extravagance, but in sufficiency. And is their manual labor hardship? Labor is pleasure, if performed moderately, and for a good purpose; it has a salutary effect upon body and mind, and no one among them is required to work beyond his capabilities. An evidence that their daily life is far from being austere, is afforded by their records of mortality, which prove a greater longevity among the Shakers than any other class of people.

True piety will not show a solemn, Puritanic countenance, but will enjoy a hearty laugh, a mirthful and agreeable conversation. And let any visitor call at a Shaker village, and he will not meet many faces of a forbidding or down-cast aspect, but the peace within will show itself in the serene and happy countenances of those who have devoted their lives to purity and soul-development, and who feel that they are at peace with God, and beloved by their companions.

Do Shakers employ their time mostly in devotions and mortifications? Their devotional formalities occupy a very small portion of the day, for labor is prayer, and useful occupation more acceptable in the sight of heaven than the recital of long and meaningless prayers. But they most emphatically claim that their lives are spent in mortification, not of the body, but of the carnal will. "Know thyself," was written, as the essence of wisdom, on the portals of the temple of Ephesus; and "Know thyself," and "Conquer thyself," is written now on the standard of Believers. To subdue themselves, and even eradicate that which "the still small voice" condemns, and to restore the soul to its native purity, as a fit emblem of its Maker—to replace in their minds the spiritual instead of the sensual, is their aim and daily labor. Can such an end be reached without a struggle? without mortification? God alone knows the fierce combat that has raged in many a soul aspiring after holiness; and often He alone has seen the silent tears, and heard the suppressed sobs of many a weary traveler towards His kingdom of eternal rest; and He alone knows the agony which the demand, "Conquer thyself," often extorts. And were it not for His help, who would succeed?

But success is certain. His help, and the observance of the eternal truths established in the Church of Christ's Second Appearing, will enable every soul to conquer the enemy within, and then the state of happiness will commence, and the soul will find heaven on earth. Then the words of Christ will be fulfilled: "Every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands for my name's sake, shall receive a hundred fold, and shall inherit everlasting life," and peace, comfort and bliss will dwell in abundance in the soul, which will then receive a forshadowing of the eternal, heavenly joys. There cannot be victory without a combat, nor holiness without struggles and mortifications of the carnal mind. Ascetics mortify the body; Shakers mortify the principalities of evil.

But let Shakers be called Ascetics, or fanatics, or a deluded people—it will not alter the truth. There is only one way to salvation, and every soul, at some period of its existence, either in this world or in the world to come, will have to enter it—the way that Jesus taught in the words: "Forsake all, and follow me." God speed the day when the light from above will shine on repentant and sorrow-stricken souls; when His angels will point out to an anxious and burdened multitude the true and only way of salvation from evil: Confessing and forsaking sin, and living a life of purity, humility, and unselfishness! A. WAGER.

The Knell of the Dying Year.

Hark! what is that low, murmuring sound,
That faintly falls upon the ear?
So distant, yet it jars the ground,—
Hush! 'tis the knell of the dying year.

All nature seems to hear the toll,
The tempests pause in their wild career,
E'er they have reached their destined goal,
And list to the knell of the dying year.

The stately trees of the forest bend
To catch the sound, and, appalled with fear,
A murmuring dirge in their sorrow lend,
To bewail the knell of the dying year.

The stars look down from the murky sky,
Through a veil of clouds their sad faces appear,
And the moon, enshrouded with mists on high,
Seems to weep the knell of the dying year.

And wilt thou not join in the solemn scene
O, man! while thy death toll approaches near?
And wouldst thou listen with downcast mien,
To the sorrowful knell of the dying year?

"Let thy footsteps tread pure virtue's way,
And thou shalt never shed a tear"—
A voice to my spirit seems to say—
"As thou hearest the knell of the dying year."

WILLIAM CALVER.

Charity.

Charity has been defined to be a principle which leads us to make use of the best means to bring about the best results. St. Paul said that "charity rejoiceth in the truth." All the Christian virtues and graces, which adorn the character of the good, harmonize; they never are antagonistical. If "charity rejoiceth in the truth," it also rejoices in justice and righteousness, as well as in mercy and kindness; and as all these harmonize, the greatest charity to any soul is to hold it to strict justice, and not to indulge it in any wrong, because, "he that doeth wrong shall suffer for the wrong he doeth."

Indulgence, instead of being charity, is injustice and wrong to the very individual to whom it is extended, and in a social point of view, indulgence to one is injustice to the whole community. This individual indulgence being intrinsically unjust, it can never promote harmony, peace, nor righteousness in any society where it exists. Indulgence is exceedingly prone to assume the name and garb of charity, and, under this false color, often deceives and has sometimes ruined very good men. The oft-repeated maxim, that "it is better to err on the part of charity, than do otherwise," is losing its effect, and, with some, has become entirely obsolete, and not without good reasons.

To make this subject plain to the understanding, we will give some brief illustrations: We remember to have read of a millionaire in France who, out of charity, undertook to support all the poor in a large district, and by his profuse liberality ultimately spent his immense fortune. Although his funds were exhausted, he still felt it his duty to support all the poor within his reach, indiscriminately, and, finding no other resource, he took to highway robbery! In this he was for a time very successful. Several heavy robberies were committed in the neighborhood, but no one for a moment mistrusted the good philanthropist.

At length he waylaid a priest, who was carrying a large sum collected to build a cathedral, and he murdered the priest and got the money! All these sums were freely appropriated to feed his poor. This good philanthropist was at length caught in the very act of robbery, to the surprise of everybody. He was brought to trial, pronounced guilty, and condemned to be hung! When the judge pronounced his sentence, he only replied, "Alas! who will take care of my poor?" Thus, we see that erring on the part of charity proved the utter ruin and destruction of this man, and it will of every individual family, or whole community, who persist, perseveringly to err on the part of this kind of charity, at the expense of justice, righteousness, and without regard to the moral character of its objects.

Thus, we see one great theme seemed to have taken possession of this man's mind, so as to overshadow all idea of justice, and even to conceal the horrid crime of murder! Has there not been something like this transacted among Believers, only differing in degree, but not in nature? Have there not been some unprincipled, dishonest creatures indulged, and suffered to trample on and outrage the feelings and faith of all the more faithful part of community, under the plausible pretext of extending charity to the poor? Thus, the innocent and worthy members of community are imposed upon, and robbed of their just rights, and their confidence and better feelings crushed, murdered, for the sake of indulging some lazy, shiftless, self-willed unworthy individuals; all done by erring on the part of charity, when great injustice is done to all parties.

To illustrate this subject further, we will make an extract from the Westminster Review: "Victor Hugo, of France, tells us of a very philanthropic bishop, who spent all his wealth and revenue on the poor—gave up his palace to be used as a hospital, and lived in a small cottage. He had no furniture but of the plainest kind; nothing that indicated wealth, except a set of massive silver plate, which, as an heirloom, had descended to him by legacy. This he would display on his table when he had guests. On a certain occasion, a desperate convict, who had served several terms in the penitentiary, amounting to nineteen years, called on the good bishop, soon after he had served the last term.

"The convict made a clean breast, and introduced himself in his true colors, as an outcast, and spurned by mankind: To his astonishment, the good bishop did not appear shocked, but looked upon him with kindness. The convict repeated the terrible fact, and, in proof, showed the passport given him on leaving the prison. The good bishop still smiled on him, and invited him to partake of food and lodging. Supper being prepared, and the silver plate paraded on the table in honor of the guest, they sat down and ate together. The convict eyed the silver plate and two massive silver candlesticks. The bishop was all goodness and loving-kindness toward the stranger—the convict carefully watched where the servant put the silver plate, and was finally conducted to bed by the good bishop.

"In the dead of night the convict awakes, and makes his way to the place of deposit and grasps the plate—all but the candlesticks, which he could not readily find, goes back to his chamber, and escapes through the window. The next day he was arrested by the police, and brought back to the good bishop, with his stolen plate, and the bishop, in the deep charity of his soul, told the policeman that the said convict was his friend, and that he had given the plate to him! The zealous policeman, mortified at his mistake, immediately withdrew. The bishop turned to the convict, and quietly presented him with the silver candlesticks, which the robber had omitted to take with the plate, and, laying his hand on the man's arm, said: "My brother, you belong no more to evil, but to good. It is your soul that I now purchase of you; I withdraw it from the spirit of perdition and give it to God!" The convict departed with his booty, and that very day committed another robbery!"

Says the Review: "The prominent feature is an unbounded benevolence, before which every other consideration, even justice, as well as prudence, gives way. This is particularly displayed in the last scene in which he appears before us, when, in order to extricate the robber from the hands of the police, he dismissed the latter with a falsehood, thus sacrificing truth itself to the benevolent purpose of accomplishing the convict's conversion, and saving him from his just deserts. Would it not be better for spiritual teachers to feed and stimulate the minds of their flocks with a desire for spiritual improvement, and a spirit of obedience, instead of encouraging, by undue and perilous indulgence, that which is at once a cause and symptom of mental degeneration?"

We will now make the application, and close the subject. Have we not seen something like this in the course of our experience? How many there are who, if they have not stolen directly, have unjustly spent the "silver plate," and, after all, have been presented with the "silver candlesticks," too! And how many of these unjustly-treated ones have ever reformed, and their "souls thereby redeemed and purchased to God?" Have we not failed as utterly as did the good bishop? And have we not, by thus giving away our "candlesticks," let our candles go with them, and thus gradually been left in darkness? Consequently, are there not some among us who will have to exclaim, in the language of the foolish virgins to their more honored, faithful brethren and sisters: "Alas! give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out?" so that they are left in the dark, and are scarcely able to "discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God, and him that serveth Him not?"

When charity, the greatest of three distinguished virtues, is made tributary to crime, and subservient to vice, then it is that we have arrived at a point beyond which charity ceases to be a virtue. The same may be said of true Christian forgiveness, for they are inseparably connected, and we cannot be in the exercise of one without being in possession of the other. The true ground of Christian charity and forgiveness is always on conditions; thus, "if thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him." Here is the foundation of true charity and forgiveness, but be sure that his repentance is genuine, and not feigned. A brother is not a reprobate. If his repentance is genuine, he will be willing to suffer the just penalty due to his innoes-gressions, and not to complain of the innocent because they withhold their sympathy.

How was it with Jesus, our Elder Brother, when speaking of the baptism of sufferings through which he must pass, in order to find his redemption from that fallen nature which he took upon him, and when Peter began to sympathise with him, and said, "this shall never be unto thee, Lord?" Why, Jesus rebuked that false spirit of sympathy in Peter, and said: "Get behind me, Satan! for thou savorest not of the things that be of God, but of men." How was it with Mother Ann, our first-born Elder Sister, when she was suffering the just penalty due a fallen nature? Did she complain of the innocent for their want of sympathy? Never! She sought rather to hide herself, "lest some should pity her with a pity which God did not." Let us go and do likewise, and then sympathy will flow spontaneously. JAS. S. PRESCOTT.

The Last Night of Jesus on Earth.

Beautiful for situation,
As Jerusalem of old,
Is the Lord's new habitation,
Where His truth and power unfold.
Built of His eternal treasure,
Is the City from above;
Vainly would our spirits measure
Half its glory, peace and love.
We, whose hearts and homes are lighted
With the radiance of His face,
Know that bloom will reach the blighted,
As the sun the darkened place.
Here, among the hills and mountains,
Revelations we can gain;
Drink from spiritual fountains,
Ne'er to thirst for earth again.
Here the future is unfolded:
From the shadows of the past,
From wild chaos, God has moulded
Beauties that will live and last;
And His power is not diminished,
Greater wonders He will do,
Ere His work on earth is finished,
And all things are made anew.
Hope, with joyous, starry pinion,
Speeds into the coming day;
Love goes back, through time's dominion,
On the pilgrim's rugged way—
Love goes back to him who sorrowed
O'er the wicked and perverse,
Back to him who told and suffered,
To destroy the Eden curse.
Love, like Mary, bows and listens
When the multitudes are taught;
In her eyes emotion glistens
When the miracles are wrought.
What, to her, is learning's station,
With its pompous iron sway?
Better far the soul's salvation,
Spoken of in simple way.
Parables, from nature taken,
Illustrate the law divine,
And the honest soul awakes
To the truths that round it shine.
Still the world will kill the lowly;
For it loveth but its own,
Hearts that would be pure and holy
Still the press must tread alone.
Jesus gave his life for others;
None could minister to him,
Though he fain would make them brothers,
Yet their spirit-life was dim;
All they knew he had imparted,
Streams their source cannot supply;
They were faithless and faint-hearted,
When the darkened hour drew nigh.
When the last sad meal was ended,
And the solemn hymn was o'er,
They the mountain slope ascended
With a grief unknown before.
All their love to him had centered;
They had known him as a man;
But their hearts had never entered Into God's deep, holy plan.
When his grief he could not smother,
Pressed on him with heavy weight;
They were striving with each other,

Who among them should be great.
They were children, and he led them;
Their affection round him grew:
Carefully he taught, and fed them
In the life and spirit new.
Oft he gathered them together,
To baptize their souls in flame—
They, like lonely, desert heathen,
Knew not whence the spirit came.
Theirs was fervent, human feeling—
Tender sympathy and love;
God was to his soul revealing
Elements they knew not of.
Every human creed must perish;
Fairest flowers will fade and part;
And the closest ties we cherish
Break and wreck the trusting heart.
Let this lesson ever wake
Strength within the struggling soul:
Principles are never shaken;
God has kept them true and whole.
They will grow and brighten, ever,
'Neath the Angels' chastening rod;
They will form our home forever—
"Stones" approv'd and blest of God.
O my spirit, thou art lifted
With a burst of holy song;
And thy inmost sight is gifted
With a vision, sought for long.
What, to thee, is earthly trial?
O, behold the heavenly state!
In the clouds of self-denial,
Toil, and for fruition wait.
Numbered not with any nation,
Israel, here shall dwell alone;
But his glory and salvation
Shall throughout the earth be known!

CECELIA DE VERE.

DEAR EDITOR:—The following, from the American Phrenological Journal, is so excellent and true to life, that I call your attention to it for the benefit of your readers.

I have thought that judging any by their features was an unsafe and unjust criterion; but am now satisfied that our spiritual beings become transformed into the likeness of those virtues for which we have admiration, or reflect the vices we endorse and practice.

C. DIBBLE.

THE MIND BUILDS ITS OWN HOUSE.

"A sensual disposition deforms the handsomest features. A cold, selfish heart shrivels and distorts the best looks. A mean, groveling spirit takes all noble character out of the countenance. A cherished hatred transforms the most beautiful lineament into an image of ugliness.

"It is impossible to preserve good looks, with a brood of bad passions feeding on the blood, a set of low loves trampling through the heart, and a selfish, disdainful spirit enthroned in the will.

"Badness and beauty will no more keep company than poison will consort with health. The experiment of putting them together has been tried for thousands of years, with one unvarying result. The laws of spirit work with unfailing effect, making sin punish itself. Every bad passion turns tell-tale, and publishes its disgraceful story in the features of those who have given themselves up to every sort of wickedness. This may not be all, but this transforming a face once full of hope and innocence, into deformity, is terrible.

"There is no sculpture like the mind. The man who thinks, reads, meditates aright, has intelligence in his features, stamped on his brow, and gleaming in his eye. There is nothing that so refines and ennobles face and mien as the constant presence of great thoughts, a high determination, a virtuous principle, an unquenchable enthusiasm. But more powerful still than any of these, as a beautifier of the person, is the overmastering purpose and pervading disposition of impartial kindness in the heart, a universal benevolence, and desire to make others happy. The soul that is full of pure and generous affections, fashions the features into its own angelic likeness, as the rose, by inherent impulse, grows in grace and blossoms into a loveliness which art cannot equal."

Resurrection of the Dead.

The following literal translation of, and observations upon, the XV Chap. of St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, v. 35 to 52, are presented in the hope that they may render this difficult passage more intelligible to the ordinary reader than it is at present. Several reasons combine to make this portion of scripture hard to be understood. The translators of the New Testament did not understand St. Paul's meaning; and, even if they had, it would require, for the reader to understand the words, an amount of spiritual intelligence which few possess. But the persons to whom St. Paul was writing, though in some respects enlightened, were not sufficiently advanced to comprehend his meaning: therefore, St. Paul had to give a portion of his own light to them in the best manner he could. This has, naturally, produced a mingling of spiritual truth and figures which must be very confusing to the unenlightened reader. We must bear in mind that the early apostles' great difficulty was to give the Gentiles a real belief in a future existence. Lastly, the apostle himself, though far superior in spiritual light to most of his contemporaries, and though his spiritual perceptions were much opened, had not himself the full light, which was reserved for the future.

In the first part of the chapter the apostle labors to convince the Corinthians that there is a resurrection from sin in this life, and a life after the death of the body. He uses the appearance of Jesus to himself and others, as a means of enlightening their darkened minds. But, that the real meaning refers to spiritual life, is evident from the expression, 'ye are yet in your sins.' Then he explains, that not only is there a spiritual life while on this earth, but a life hereafter. If there were not a future life, why run hourly risk of misery in this? he asks:

LITERAL TRANSLATION.

- V. 35. "But some one will say: 'How are the dead raised? and with what body do they come?'"
36. O. senseless! that which thou sowest will not produce, except it die."
37. "And as to that which thou sowest, thou sowest not the body that is about to be, but the bare kernel, as it may happen, of wheat or of some of the other kinds (of grain)."
38. "And God will give it a body as he willed, and to each (kind) of the seeds its own body."
39. "All flesh (is) not the same flesh; but (there is) one flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, another of birds."
40. "And (there are) bodies heavenly, and bodies earthly; but the glory of the heavenly (is) one, and the glory of the earthly another."
41. "The glory of the sun (is) one, and the glory of the moon one, and the glory of the stars one; for star differs from star in glory."

EXPLANATIONS.

Some one will ask the question: "What kind of bodies have the dead?"

Paul answers: "As the husk of the seed dies, and another body springs from the life principle in the seed."

He continues: "We do not sow the fruit, but grain of various kinds, and God gives the several kinds of fruit."

He continues to enforce the same idea by another simple illustration, varying kinds of animals.

Now he carries the idea further: There are heavenly bodies as well as earthly, and the glory of the heavenly differs from the glory of the earthly.

Illustration of the foregoing, the difference between the heavenly bodies.

42. "And thus (is) the resurrection of the dead (the man) is sown in corruption, is raised in incorruption;

43. "is sown in dishonor, is raised in glory; is sown in weakness, is raised in power;

44. "is sown a soul body, is raised a spiritual body: there is a soul body and there is a spiritual body."

45. "And thus it is written: The first man Adam was produced into a living soul; the last man Adam into a life-giving spirit."

46. "But not first (is) the spiritual, but the soul (principle); afterwards, the spiritual."

47. "The first man (is) of the earth, earthy; the second man (is) the Lord from heaven."

48. "Like the earthy (are) the earthy; and like the heavenly (are) also the heavenly."

49. "And as we bore the likeness of the earthy, we shall bear the likeness of the heavenly."

50. "This I say, brethren, that flesh and blood are not able to share the kingdom of God, nor does corruption share incorruption."

51. "Behold, I declare unto you a mystery: All of us shall not die, but we shall all be changed:

52. "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, in the last trumpet (for it shall sound), both the dead shall be raised incorruptible and we shall be changed."

He comes to the subject of which the foregoing is illustrative: The resurrection of the dead is just the same; the man is sown in corruption, but the legitimate fruit of that man is an incorruptible spirit.

The man is sown, possessed of a soul, but regenerated or ruled; his spirit is evolved and becomes his actual body: for the soul has a form or body and the spirit has a form or body. "Pneukon" means 'soul,' as an adjective, and cannot, in reason, be contorted into anything else; 'phusikon' is physical or natural.

The first Adam had a soul, existing, indeed, but capable of giving life to no other; the last Adam is a spirit able to give life to others: i. e., the first is retreating from Deity, the latter is advancing toward Deity.

The soul is first generated, the spirit is subsequently evolved.

To prevent the possibility of mistake, he says that our physical bodies will not rise.

The spirit of this prophecy is now fulfilled; no doubt the change that the Apostle speaks of has been experienced by them in the spirit land; and many dead are now being raised within the sound of the last trumpet; but like all the early Christians he expected the change too soon, and manifestly expected that both the change of the living, or spiritually enlightened, and the raising of the dead, in sin, would be much more rapid than it is in reality. He has doubtless found by this time that nothing is gained without effort.

THOMAS I. STROUD, Enfield, Conn.

Were Moses and Jesus Free-Agents?

Who was Jesus of Nazareth? What was his mission? Was it possible that he might have failed in performing his mission? If he had so failed, would the present race of beings have been hopelessly lost, or would there have been another Medium, Teacher, Christ raised up, by the power of the Holy Spirit, to have done the same important work which he performed for humanity?

I wish that I were a thorough historian, a theologian and something of a logician. Then, if I could bring my wayward pen under the rules of rhetoric, I could solve some knotty questions which now I find much more difficult to answer than to ask.

I was taught in early life, by a pious, devoted Baptist mother, that Jesus was one of the Gods incarnated in human form; that he was snugly ensconced in the bosom of the All Father before the worlds were framed, and that he was the only son. That this Loving Father, who saw the end from the beginning, did, from all eternity, predestinate that certain portions of the race should be lost, and that at some time he would send this beloved son to rescue a part from utter destruction, and thus manifest his love and justice as also his great mercy.

Religious teachers give children some hard nuts to crack when they talk to them about predestination and trinity of three male Gods conjoined in one; and full grown children occasionally are puzzled to understand how it is, and often find themselves in a maze from which it is difficult to extricate themselves.

I have always thought it the wisest way for me to avoid great mysteries, and as much as possible to keep on a plain, even road, where the fool, for Christ's sake, may travel and not err; keeping a good conscience and using what little common sense was given me. Reason is God's gift to man, and is given for use.

A few years ago an intelligent female friend, whose father was an Episcopal clergyman, said to me: "Oh! do not try to reason upon the doctrine of the Trinity; that is just the cause of so many infidels in the world." I said: "Is not God the author of reason; and will He require us to believe anything that will not bear the light of reason?" She replied, "It is a true doctrine, but too high for finite comprehension."

We will leave the Trinity and return to the Sonship. If Jesus was the Christ, the only begotten of the Father, who are they who call upon God as their Heavenly Father? Children by adoption, are they, or is Jesus the Father upon whom they call? Hardly that; for they say "grant our petitions for Christ's sake." When we go back upon Bible history, we see that the Great First Cause who framed the universe, gave the dry land and the sea their bounds, and marked out times and seasons and set the wheels in motion, designed that under law and order there should be eternal growth and progress. Never has the infinite mind lost sight of the universe of its own creating, nor left it without a controlling, moral force sufficient to hold it in its course, and keep it from returning to chaos. Mineral, vegetable and animal life have progressed.

At particular periods of time, when growth and development called for higher and more progressed teachers, there have been what we might call especial providences. Teachers and rulers have been raised up to meet the needs of the people for the time being. Then prophets would come forth, and, through inspiration, point them to a greater work, a more perfect day in the distant future, when they should have progressed unto it; a light ahead in the ascending upward scale. Moses was providentially raised up to perform a certain work. He was a powerful minister of physical truth to the Jews—precisely what they needed and must have in order to progress. Now, was it possible for Moses to have proved recreant to that people—the Jews? If so, would there have been another providential teacher or law giver raised up unto that people, or would the chain of progress have been broken and the machinery reversed? If there could have been another Moses found, there might have been a little delay, but no failure. So we say, blessed is he or she who, being called and appointed to any work, are found faithful. That depends upon their own volition.

If Jesus was a divinely inspired teacher, possessing larger powers of receptivity than any that had preceded him; had risen higher in the scale of purity by reason of his own obedience to laws given through Moses, and also on account of the progressed physical and moral condition of his ancestry, and was thus fitted to receive a baptism of the Christ Spirit that would induct him into a higher sphere of spiritual life, he thereby became the High Priest of a new dispensation wherein the law of an eye for an eye should be annulled by substituting love for force, rendering good for evil.

Could Jesus have refused the call and offer of the teachership and inductor of the Jews into this higher law—the new dispensation? If it were possible, and had thus refused to receive the Christ Spirit which was seeking a medium through which to work, could or would that same spirit have sought and found another prepared vessel into which the oil through the golden pipes from the bowl or church in the invisible world, have been conveyed to the people, or would the race have been hopelessly lost? A. DOOLITTLE.

Appreciation.

I have been an attentive reader of every number of THE SHAKER. It certainly has able expounders of our beautiful and soul-invigorating faith, and to this class of writers we need not add more. One after another of the brave veterans of a holy cause—those who might have retired with well-earned laurels, that shed lustre and joy over declining years—have come forth, as to the sound of a trumpet, and with pens that seemed dipped in the fires of truth, and in the light of revelation, are thus proclaiming the pure principles of salvation.

Noble fathers and mothers! may God send the angels to watch over you, to give light to your dimmed eyes, and strength to your failing hands, that the glorious work of expounding the principles of "heaven on earth" may not fall into less efficient hands!

We read in the July number an expression that strongly unites in sympathy with its editor in making THE SHAKER "a home educator." I have greatly desired to see this idea advanced, so that those who are children in years, and those who are willing to "become so for the kingdom's sake," may find the desiderata that will enable them to become wise in spiritual things. Though not a youth, I am still near enough to that condition in life to know of its attendant temptations and dangers. This age needs just such "a home educator" as our little paper, to balance its perversions—to rebuke them—for it is an age that is too fast for the culture of virtuous deeds and eternal life. "Youth is the time to serve the Lord," a period when the song of life should be as fervent as the little bird's, that seems to sing with all its might, and to the utmost expansion of its little bird's harp: "Oh God, I praise thee ever!"

It is before the young tree has sufficiently developed, to produce perfect fruits, that it requires the most attention. The careful gar-denier never neglects to train, prune nor graft, nor to protect the young trees from worms, hurtful insects and the "little foxes that destroy."

Great care must be taken in every department of the juvenile age—physically, morally and spiritually. Much pruning is necessary to prepare souls for the scion of faith, in extreme purity of life, and failure to be thus grafted is despair. Oh, the blasting of bright hopes that make up despair! For the right culture of youth, is required the sacrifices of noble souls unto untiring zeal in their behalf. And it may be encouraging, for all to know, that such there are; and youthful minds, "the bonds of promise," who read THE SHAKER, are not to be neglected.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

Truth.

DEAR CHILDREN:—In God, our Heavenly Father and Mother, are embodied the living principles of all truth. If you love God, and desire to express your love, live in the element of truth—speak the truth, act the truth. Adopt as the motto of every day's life: "I will speak the truth at all times, and under all circumstances." You will meet with circumstances that will tempt you to stray from this path of duty, and which promise more pleasant inducements. Beware of the tempter, stand firm by your motto! The real heroes upon our earth, who have striven in the past, and who are now zealously striving to elevate the race, have ever scorned to speak or act an untruth. Learn to be heroic, and you need never fear any harm when clothed with the armor of truth. God will bless, if you will be truthful. The spirits of love and purity will journey with you daily, and with pleasure; and your spiritual fathers and mothers will own you and admire you if you resolve to stand upon the ground of truth. Endeavor to rise in love with truth, and then the kingdom of heaven will not be far off—you will be in a condition to enjoy life; or, preparing for death, you will find peace and happiness with Christ, in those mansions, not made with hauds, eternal in the heavens. O. M. BEAVER.

Formation of Character.

DEAR EDITOR:—Some time in my youthful days, I remember to have read in some author a very interesting description of two distinct characters. One was of a character of firmness and integrity of purpose, who was somewhat cautious on what he resolved or promised; but the resolution once formed or the promise once made, was never to be swerved from or violated, no matter what unforeseen difficulty might arise in the performance. The other character, though amiable in many respects, was quite forward and incautious with his resolves and promises, and that too with sincere and good intentions. But he was weak and wavering: the least unexpected trouble would disconcert him, and away went all his good resolutions and promises! In a word, he was wholly unreliable, and as men became acquainted with him, they set him at naught and dropped him. On the other hand, the first named character, when inquiry was made concerning him, the reply would be: "Well, he is not as ready to enter into promises and engagements as some others, but if you once secure his promise you are just as sure of the performance as you are of his life and ability to perform his engagement. He is a man of integrity and faithfulness; one that may be perfectly relied on."

As I read the amplified description of these two characters, I instinctively decided in favor of the man of integrity. After reading, reflection came on, and the question was put home: To which class of these characters do I belong? Looking back over my life, I had to pronounce judgment against myself; I decidedly belonged to the weak, wavering, unreliable class, which, in my conscience, I despised! I had been whiffling, shirking and dodging on meeting the least unexpected difficulty. I could not quietly sit down, or go on under the just impeachment of being such a character. It was a crisis, a turning point in my career. I then and there resolved, and covenanted with myself, that I would break up that mean habit of whiffling and changing, and I laid down the following rule for myself:

"Whatever I promise or resolve to do, nothing shall ever prevent me from accomplishing but the absolute inability or want of power, or the discovery that the fulfillment would be morally wrong." From that day I have striven, and not in vain, to live squarely up to this rule, and it has changed my whole character and course of life. Hence, I have come to the conclusion that every youth or young man can, if he will firmly and with all his heart set about the work, change off a low, mean and degraded character and course of life, for one that is far more excellent and lovely. I mean, I believe he can do this by the aids and means which the Gospel furnishes him. This conclusion is the pith of the matter. I do not expect that the character I have drawn will suit every one; but I do mean that every one has some defects of character which he may discover by honest and faithful self-examination, and extirpate by decided efforts made in obedience to gospel principles. This is the work of regeneration. There are no mysterious depths in it; it is the regeneration of your spirit; it is putting off the first coarse husks of character, and putting on those refinements of spirit and consequent refined external accomplishments, which the Gospel alone can give and firmly establish in the character. It is embellishing our character and manners with all those glorious virtues which all good men love and respect, and which will enable us to love and bless mankind. I cannot do better here than to finish with a paragraph from a good, old, enlightened author.

"If thou hast any thought of being hereafter a member of that blest society of chosen spirits, of the excellent ones of the earth, of souls framed to love and peace and harmony, thou wilt set thyself in earnest to enrich thy mind with the heavenly graces of meekness, patience, forbearance and benevolence; and in the exercise of these virtues thou wilt find joys inconceivable to the sordid sons of earth; thou wilt endeavor to be to thy fellow creatures, even in this life, a guardian angel and a God." True Love.

Words by E. T. LEGGETT.

Music by G. A. LOMAS.

- 2 Oh, it is a glorious feeling, deep'ning as we heavenward go,
Spotless as the sunlight, stealing softly through the falling snow;
'Tis a fount of living waters, with rich blessings running o'er,
Where all Zion's sons and daughters, drink of bliss and thirst no more.
- 3 Love will heal the broken hearted, it will cure the stricken soul;
'Twill unite whom death has parted, where no waves of sorrow roll.
It will triumph when the mountains, time, at last, shall overthrow,
And when silent, all life's fountains, love shall bright, still brighter glow.

- 4 Like the li^{ght}, hope that's beaming, o'er the dark clouds rolling high,
Love reveals far o'er them gleaming, brighter worlds beyond the sky.
Grant, thou Great Almighty Giver, o'er our wild and bleak domain,
Love may, like lost Eden's river, make this world to bloom again.
- 5 'Tis to God and to each other, love unites us heart and hand,
And will guide us, sister, brother, homeward to the promised land;
While we pray to be forgiven, while we hope for heaven above,
May our strife be all for union, and our contest all for love.

The Shaker to its Readers.

The present number of ourself completes the first volume. We have attempted, and have measurably succeeded, in giving correct information of the peculiar people whose nickname we bear. We might animadvert somewhat upon the writings of those who have filled our pages, but prefer to look with a charitable eye upon those whose theology has been unable to keep pace with the increase of the revelations of the Good Spirit. We purpose being a special agent for the enlightenment of the household of SHAKER principles, and with it, leaving the dead of the past, "go on unto perfection." (Heb. 6:1.) We have traveled far and wide before we are one year old. We have had more than seven thousands of ourself circulated each month—six thousands and more reaching actual subscribers and agents. We purpose, with the aid of every lover of virtue—every friend to the reform of vice and admirer of purity of life, to reach a circulation of ten thousand, the coming year, if possible. We mean to meet our patrons with an improved appearance, on superior paper, and with living and life-giving material of enhancing value, the coming year; we therefore beg to meet our old subscribers—every one—on New Year's Day. Our subscription price is the same; and, while it does not pay the cost, we are no poorer in spirit for all of ourself we have given away. Let each of the Shaker Societies give us a day's labor, or an acre of ground benefit, remembering the reward of giving to the poor. We know we are the advocate, in the missionary line, of principles that are eternal, that will not down at the bidding of worldly pride, lust nor selfishness. WE MEAN TO LIVE—and by your help, kind readers, we mean to do a great deal of good. Though the following may seem a little irreverent for our pages, may not some of us find therein a valuable hint?

MAKING HER FLY.—Old Aunt Dina was a shouting colored saint of the city of Charleston, who would sing at the top of her voice and cry "Glory!" above all the rest of the congregation. It was common at the missionary prayer meetings of the colored people to take up a collection while singing the hymn,

"Fly abroad, thou mighty Gospel!"

In the midst of which Aunt Dina always threw her head back, shut her eyes and sang lustily till the plate passed.

The sable collector observed her habit, and one evening stopped when he came to her and said bluntly:

"Look ahead, Aunt Dina, you needn't be asinging 'Fly abroad, thou mighty Gospel' if you doesn't give nothing to make her fly!"

The responsibility of receiving and preparing material for our columns, as well as directing each individual wrapper, rests upon the Resident Editor. The folding and wrapping, ready for mailing, is the gratuitous offering of Sister Harriet Bullard with her able corps of youthful assistants. This is to be appreciated. Bowing in gratitude for past favors, we invite your immediate renewal of subscriptions that we may continue to "fly abroad" many years to come.

The Coming Millennium.

THE SHAKER, to its friends of 1872, greeting, with thanks to its friends of 1871, and to the press, by whom it has been received with so much courtesy, and treated with so great tenderness, if not kindness, these are due in an especial manner.

We feel that the mission of THE SHAKER is coincident with that of Jesus and his twelve apostles in the year one. Jesus, when perfected, represented a sphere that was "far above all heavens." The twelve apostles represented the kingdom of heaven upon earth as it culminated in the Pentecostal Church.

The condition of the world, to-day, is strictly analagous to what obtained under the Roman empire: The same general expectation of some radical impending change, something that would overturn and supplant existing systems. Then, as now, science dominated over religion; skepticism over theology; inherent abstract rights over organized wrongs. Spiritualism and spiritual manifestations permeated society through and through. A more subtle and powerful spirit, that should effect the long-looked-for revolution, and the agents through which it would operate, had already been in their midst for a generation; the many knew it not, and the few who did, were opposed and persecuted.

The kingdom of heaven, as established within and among the apostles, and in a more expanded form after the death of Jesus, was a condition where good and evil, light and darkness, were mingled together; yet where the good, and true, and right, predominated over their opposites. Jesus, who founded this kingdom, has been worshiped by millions as God, because the race has ever identified the most perfect correspondent of Deity, with which nature or the mundane world furnished it, with God himself.

The twelve apostles personated the twelve foundational principles of the Christian system; and they also embodied in their character the fundamental principles of the Jewish dispensation. "Other foundation than these, can no man lay" for the coming millennial order.

The past twelve numbers of THE SHAKER have been devoted to the elucidation of the above named principles, and of the history of their effects upon and among mankind. These comprise the mission of Jesus, and of the twelve men whom he has immortalized, by whose means have been effected the revolutionary turnings and overturnings of all human, earthly institutions for the last eighteen centuries, from the year one to 1770. The spirit and principles of the Christ-world, commingled with worldly elements, have hitherto ultimated themselves only in man governments. About the year 1770, another influx from the Christ-world, coming down through the spiritual world, there using as a medium the Pentecostal Church, which was removed from the earth when the compound heathen-Christian governments, made its continued existence impossible, except in the disjointed, distorted form of the monastic orders, and in the two witnesses, struggling to preserve the seed of the "kingdom of heaven" on earth, and chanting a continual prayer for its reappearance.

In answer to that universal prayer, "the kingdom came" at the time appointed, as demonstrated by Cummings and Shimeall, and thousands of the literary and religious chronologists—the great lights of Christendom—about the year 1770. But this time, the agent unexpectedly proved to be a female, and not the reappearance under the physical resurrection doctrine of the identical man Jesus. Through this female, the dual nature of Deity was revealed, and formed a proper logical basis for all governments of a dual humanity, in accordance with which seventy pentecostal communities arose in America, being cotemporary with the United States Government. The history of these two governments will run parallel like the history of Esau and his descendants—the Mohammedan powers; and the history of Jacob and his posterity—the Israelitish powers, or Jewish people.

THE SHAKER, or spiritual order of celibacy unites, as was never attempted by the monastic orders, the two powers of humanity—male and female—in one community, under a parental government of father and mother, as types of the Father and Mother God.

The second, or United States Government, or natural order of propagation, will ultimately be fashioned after the pattern of the Mosaic nation in the wilderness, and in their early history in the land of Canaan. The same principles embodied in the Jewish laws respecting property—right to the land, agriculture, dietetics, physiology, and of the sexual relations pertaining to reproduction, and the rights and privileges of woman. The same knowledge and use of spiritualism, as the only legitimate war agent, also as an agent for the discovery and punishment of individual criminals, as well as ungodly nations.

Thus will the Millennium be actualized on the earth, by the Christ-spirit acting through the agency or mediumship of the Gentile Pentecostal Church. The prophet "saw the hands of a man under the wings of the cherubim"—the earthly government for the order of propagation subordinate to, and protected by a spiritual order, as the spiritual order will be subordinate to, and protected by the earthly order—individualized identities, like Esau and Jacob; yet like them brothers, "the elder serving the younger." Esau possessed the physical power, Jacob the spiritual.

In the earthly government, the Lord shall rule in righteousness; for men and women will be equally represented in offices, as in the taxes and burthens. The love of God towards their children, sons and daughters of their own creating, will cause the life elements to be common and free to all. External "wars will cease to the ends of the earth," because the reproductive powers will be under governmental control, for the production of perfect men and women. Hence, the war power will be transferred to the earthly government in the spirit world; as illustrated in the history of Israel. The powers and principles of both orders, as they exist in the spirit world, are seeking to incarnate themselves upon earth, in the Shaker Church and in the United States Government; by the divine Spirit, through the agency of Spiritualism, this will be accomplished, and "the powers of the world to come," are even now working mightily to this end.

The talented, but erratic Francis Train, is a spiritual medium for the much abused and down-trodden Irish, who have passed into the spiritual world, in an unsubdued worldly spirit; they seek vengeance on their enemies in this world; and in a rebellion of their countrymen, they would stimulate and instigate them to acts of rapine and violence, congenial to their own passions.

Victoria Woodhull is a medium of the other sex, for the corresponding mission to Americans. These two, according to their own predictions, are the next presidents of the United States. They will be largely assisted, from the other world to realize and fulfill their own prophecies.

At a public dinner, given by the Emperor of Russia, he confessed with the simplicity of a child, what was confirmed by the Empress, and other members of their suite; that he was influenced by spirits, through the American medium, Home, to emancipate the twenty millions of serfs: and that the spirits helped and sustained him in the accomplishment of the arduous undertaking.

Prince Albert and Queen Victoria were spiritualists; and skeptics are calling her crazy, and seeking to dethrone her upon that ground.

Lincoln and Stanton were spiritualists, to our personal knowledge; and to the spirits, were due the emancipation of slavery, and the final success of the North.

England, to-day, must recognize the power of the spiritual world, and bow before it, by letting her government be fashioned after the "pattern shown in the Mount," or share the fate of France. She has "taken the sword" externally, and is perishing by it. Her priests, for the salvation of her soul; her doctors, for the cure of her body; her lawyers, for the protection of her property; her army and navy, for her defense against her enemies (created by her own wickedness), are eating her up. Her own sons and daughters are her worst enemies, being despoiled of their inherent rights. These, inspired from the unseen world, through its thousands of circles, are enthusiastically demanding that none shall possess who do not help to create. They claim the land as belonging to the English, the Irish, the Scottish, and the Welsh, without distinction of sex. In a word, the time has come for the founding of the spiritual order, in England; and parallel with that, will go forth spiritual agents, that cannot be over-awed, over-reached, over-powered, nor cheekmated by human authority or subterfuges; "until the Lord rain righteousness upon" the earthly government of England, founded upon millennial principles.

As before stated, both the earthly and spiritual orders and governments are now in full, successful operation in the spiritual world; and, unless human beings on earth can overthrow and destroy these, the influences therefrom will continue to descend to earth, as "refreshings from the presence of the Lord," and demanding the restitution and restoration of all truth there concentrated, that "God has ever spoken by the mouths of all His holy prophets" among all nations, and among all peoples, since the world began; until every true principle that has been, and every prophecy of good that is to be, shall also be concentrated in "this generation." And the little SHAKER will yet, more than heretofore, become a medium of "the Spirit and the Bride, who say Come; and let him that heareth, say come," and work out their own salvation, by helping to build the temple of the Lord—a Celibate Church on earth, and to establish the millennium among the nations.

Humility and Prayer.

O Heaven! we seek thy choicest gifts
Of matchless worth, and beauty rare—
The gifts of sweet humility, and prayer.
O, may we walk where these abound,
And seek the blessings flowing there—
The joys of true humility, and prayer.

All graces pure, may we possess,
The spotless robe which angels wear—
That's framed in deep humility, and prayer!
May Heaven's sacred gems adorn
The crown, which by the cross, we'll bear—
Secured by labor, faith and hope—and prayer.
Far down in Zion's peaceful vale,
Let every child of God repair—
There bow in praise, humility, and prayer.

United in true Christian love—
Joined, heart and hand, we'll gather there,
And pour forth, in humility, a prayer,
That will ascend, unto the throne
Of him, who sits in glory there,
To bless all souls, who ask of him, in prayer.

O precious gifts! divinely given,
Blest seasons here—foretaste of heaven!
We'll cherish these with love and care,
And trusting in Humility and Prayer.

EMILY SMITH, Mt. L.

The Prospective Era.

The Fatherhood and Motherhood of man, is God; his pristine home is Heaven! Widely strayed and lost from God, man has been wandering in the dark mazes of folly and sin for ages; his soul sighing, pining, dying.

In tender mercy to the wandering children, God hath long since sent forth to man a degree of light, a pole-star (His revealed Will), a compass (conscience), and guide (Christ's example), to lead the wanderers home. But, as on the physical plane, man, when lost, travels in a circle; so, in like manner, man's progress mentally, and especially spiritually, has been circuitous, or, at best, spirally, for unnumbered ages. While reason teaches that the least fatiguing course in the pursuit of truth and heaven, is direct, yet, the whole history of man's progress, thus far, shows his travel to have been spirally, as round a cone; and, though convinced that the easiest means of elevation from a low state of degradation is directly up the even grade of an inclined plane; in other words, pursuing directly from one stage of virtue, to another, still more excellent, yet man's travel, out of nature's loss, has been undulating; sometimes ascending the hill of redemption, then descending again towards degradation, loss and shame, seeming to weary of direct elevation even in the attainment of bliss.

As a consequence, thus far, the progress of the race in redemption and virtue, has been slow and tedious; but a brighter day is dawning, and cheered by the rays of its rising sun, let us, by their light, review the past and discover the development of the future weal of humanity.

In man's onward career in redemption the "Te deum" of the Adamic dispensation has been passed. The impressive mellowing tones of the Sacred Anthem of the Noachian period have died away, having lifted man a little to a higher level of earthly righteousness. The needful but sober song of Moses, with its Levitical harmonies and stern legalities, is still rolling its echoes back and forth upon the worldly order, yet on the generative plane, giving tone to moral law, and pointing to a higher standard of excellence. While the sweet angelic song of the Lamb (the testimony of Jesus Christ), is heralding its ringing inspirations, and with its trumpet-tongue calling together sin-sick souls to meet with the assemblage of Angels in the Kingdom of God, singing the joyous anthem of "Peace on earth, good will to all nations." Angels in Heaven and saints on earth are chanting the welcome tones of a present salvation from sin, and the soul-thrilling rhapsodies of the Angel-life lived here on earth! While the worshiper at Zion's shrine is filled with prophetic inspirations and heavenly visions of the glory of this prospective era in man's redemption, the multitude err in still lingering in the dispensations of the past, feeding on dried fruits from the ripened harvests of by-gone eras; hence their religion is powerless for salvation, insipid and unrefreshing to the soul. While God's increasing work is moving on for the harvesting of the ripened clusters of the vines of the earth (natural families), cutting them off from the generative life, with all its righteousness, and preparing them to become garnered into the kingdom of God. This is the work of the angels, seen by the revelator, John.

Let us look to the betokening signs of the swiftly advancing approach of this kingdom, and find an inspiration of encouraging hope; while the Day of the Lord, to the worldly man or to the halting Christian, is a day of darkness and no brightness in it; because such see only by its advent the loss of carnal pleasure and self-will, with all that weds and tethers the soul to an earthly sphere—a worldly life. Jesus said: "Ye can discern the face of the sky, can ye not discern the signs of the times?"

Man's soul and spirit, as well as his physical frame are longing and yearning for their development and redemption from the thralldom of the curse of sin. God hath provided the means to answer this demand; humanity is seeking them, and will enjoy them, and the day of its advent and power is dawning; this is the prophecy written on all the phases of man's progress that have been passed through, and now borne on the foreheads of the van-guard of human redemption.

The rapid strides of man's modern progress in science and art, ministering to the development of physical and mental comfort, is prophetic of a parallel rapidity of the march of spiritual progress to satisfy the yearning and and pressing demands of the soul. Revealed religion has been given of God to bring man's soul home to its Creator; yet, like every gift from God to man, it has been subjected to adultery! Everything that man hath touched he hath adulterated! But one of the psalm strains of the Mosaic song was: "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" and our Saviour hath come to fulfill that law. Let the Children of Zion be glad, for there is a growing evidence of the redemption of his pledge! The adulterated religions of human production, numbered by hundreds, have, one after another, perished from the view; and the remnant are rapidly coming into disrepute, because of their want of salt. But, in them all, there have been elements of salvation which will all be conserved by that religion of full and free salvation sounded forth in the "Song of the Lamb" on Mount Zion!

The scientific discoveries and developments of the day, as the electric telegraph, steam locomotion, etc., are all sympathetically linking the kingdoms of the earth; and their powers are yet to be felt spiritually, as really as now, physically and mentally; for they are giving character and tone to mind, and through mind to the soul. They are developing a universal interest in human prosperity not bounded by national caste, color nor education. They are contributing to the development of a sensitiveness of spiritual feeling—a quickness of receptivity of goodness. The angels of God are pouring out an inspiration that will fledge the wings of the soul, and render it impatient of a plodding pace in the work of redemption from sin; and soon the progressive march of religious truth and power will be seen moving with an electric speed to satisfy the quickened soul's demands. It is the prophetic promise of the coming era.

The progressing man is not, will not, cannot be satisfied with a religion that leaves the soul unfitted for Heaven. The adulteration of religion has been so great that even the element of spirituality has been drained from its cup. The manifestations of spiritualism in these prophetic days throughout the world, is the usher of a new soul-life into humanity—a life in God. And although in its varied phases of progress, human folly and sin are manifest also, discovering that adultery hath likewise set her hostile plough into the fruitful soil, yet angels are singing the song of Moses from Sinai; and, quickened with gospel fire from the heavenly altar, are ringing out: "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" and many souls will hear and heed its heavenly trumpet.

There is a spiritual baptism of heavenly fire, a spiritual life in the consumption and death of a carnal life, now kindling in the elements of religious power, that is destined to consume the world of iniquitous adultery, the birth of the creations of fallen man! Its advent is near at hand; it is the power of the coming day of the Lord, now speedily approaching. This destruction of the world—the corrupted nature of man, by the fire of the cross of Christ, is the "end of the world," predicted by our Lord and Saviour; it is the prophetic boon of heavenly promise, clearing the way for the building of the kingdom of God on earth, as his will is done in Heaven; while the consumption of the literal earth by elemental fire, as the grand climax of the judgment day, is an invention of human theology never recognized by the counsels of God.

But, in the judgment day of the Lord, now dawning, "Light is sown for the righteous;" peace for the pure in heart; joy and rejoicing at the judgment throne for the souls whose books of life by themselves are opened to God's witnesses, by an honest confession of every sin, and whose repentance is witnessed by the fact that they go forth to duty in life, and "sin no more."

The theology of man's adulterated spiritualism hath broken down the barriers between sin and righteousness, hell and heaven, and reduced to one common level of justification the sinner and the saint; the common and enormous evils of humanity, with the most exalted righteousness, purity and godliness manifest in human life; but God's law to man has been operating to separate to Himself all souls who would obey his voice through his anointed teachers, and come away from the sinful state of man; and God's work is not to be thwarted by an avalanche of human theology, affirming that "Whatever is, is right," making God the author of sin! God recognizes sin in the human family, and man as the sinner; and the subject of suffering for it, is not himself, nor some foreign devil; but the devil of man's own erring self-will! And the light of the day of God now dawning, discovers a clean separation between him who serveth God, and him that serveth him not; and a wide distance between the world of wickedness, and the kingdom of God and its righteousness! It discovers a real, veritable hell; and, though not the theological lake of fire and brimstone, yet a state of soul-sufferings and agonies, of disobedient and rebellious sinners, grievous to contemplate, and terrible to endure! It reveals a veritable heaven, and that upon earth, too, the state and dwelling place of the pure in heart, who crucify the nature of sin by rigid self-denial, and sacrifice sinful pleasures for the higher joys of immortal life.

The inspirations of "the song of the Lamb" are leading forth a people out from the worldly plane of generation and lust; separating them from the elements of carnal life, an soul death, to be, not only God's people, but God's peculiar people, zealous of good works; the objects of his peculiar favor and blessing; not the bounties of partiality, but the just rewards of righteousness and godly obedience.

These are they who stand with the Lamb on Mount Zion, clad in white robes—the righteousness of saints. These are arisen with Christ from the sink of human corruption by following the Lamb whithersoever he goeth; these are the redeemed from among men, on the generative plane, and dwell in the kingdom of God; in one perpetual, glorious day—the day of the Lord Almighty—whose sun of righteousness and heavenly light and glory shall set no more forever!

GILES B. AVERY.

Earth-Growth—Soul-Progress.

"God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." Gen. iii. 8.

It has been, to some, mysterious, when people of strong minds dispute the scripture which says: God formed men of earth, and the great book of nature proves it.

Our race, animals of every grade, and vegetables of every species, are simply dust. Taking a view of the decorations of royalty, the pride of palaces and cities, endless forms of fancy and fashion, heaps of gold in a thousand coffers, with all things terrestrial which man becomes wedded to, "dust they are and unto dust they return."

When man enters wedlock, by labor and care he may surround himself and his household with treasures and comforts, but they return to dust. When he plants the germ for another existence, we must remember it was created by a natural law fashioned from his subsistence. The mother grows that germ into infant maturity on the subsistence she draws from the same great reservoir through all the changes of gestation. Thus, by a changeless law, she clothes it, strengthens it, and forms it into a being which, like Adam the first, is created from the dust. Thus all nature declares that God not only formed the first man of the dust, but his whole race by generations are drawn from the dust as he was. We may also easily discern that unborn millions without form still lay in the dust waiting to be called forth, to be constructed and reconstructed by natural law into living specimens of individuality. When an infant is forming into life, God, through the agency of a mother, breathes life into it, till it comes into the world and can do so for itself; then it gradually becomes a conscious or living soul, as dark, natural and depraved as the beings who gave it existence.

God is in the very breath that quickens the infant into life, as it did Adam, and that breath finally inspires all to feel that they, too, become living souls. The poor Indian and the Scriptures declare that God is in the atmosphere or wind, and they are right; for our first parents said: "We heard the voice of the Lord God, walking (among the trees of) the garden in the cool (margin or wind) of the day." From that period till now, the man of earth receives his revelations through nature's elements. The skeptic, when raising his understanding no higher than the foregoing, rests at ease in infidelity. But there is a brighter page in the chapter. Man in his male and female capacity is emphatically the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. The germs for the whole race of Adam, body and soul, were placed in the earth by an all-wise Creator, to come out from the lowest earth-state, and arise to the highest heavenly state, that they might pass through all changing scenes and study all truth and law, from the lowest to the highest known to men and angels. In his first lessons he can comprehend natural law, morals, intellectual science; and with the intuition of a seer can feel immortality struggling within him.

Paul, under heaven's own inspiration, gives us the key to unlock the formation of the first heavenly world we are to enter, when he says: "The invisible things of God are clearly seen, being understood by the things which are made." Or, in other words, the next higher state, which to the earthly man is invisible, is mapped out and fashioned like this. This being the infant; that, the higher school of knowledge. Ministering angels reach down from thence to help all, who in this world cry for assistance. From this invisible source, sages, bards, seers and just men receive divine illuminations. Prophets, apostles, witnesses and leading messengers in God's orders, from age to age, have been privileged often to stand face to face with higher, more advanced spirits from the better land. These messengers of progressive truth, from regions of light, consolidated into heavenly form, have given to better men and women, beautiful revelations of priceless value to advance and raise up the race. God's suffering children, through all ages, have joined hands with these messengers, and have been helped up step by step 'till they have with Abraham caught a view of the holier city which hath foundations; and as Daniel declared: "Many of those that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake," and arise to a holier resurrection by these heavenly visitations.

WM. LEONARD.

Social Life.

A large number of persons who have visited Shaker Societies during past years, as well as the present season, have written lengthy articles, in which, from their own stand-point, they have striven to delineate the mode of worship, manners, habits, and life of the Shaker fraternity.

Some of high intellectual culture, and progressed spiritual ideas, have been candid in their statements, and as far as they had time and opportunity to gain correct information, were truthful and just, as historians. Others, less candid and more unprogressed, have failed to appreciate our efforts in the work of moral and spiritual reform, and have sought, more to please the fancy of the novel-loving multitude, and pander to the tastes of the fashionable elite of the community, rather than to do justice to their own better feelings, or to those whom they ignorantly, if not willfully undertake to represent. But we observe, as old theologies give place to reason, and sectarian prejudice disappears, there is not much controversy between the Shaker who reasons, and those whom reason is shaking. Thanks to the powers above—the good ministering angels, who penetrate with their candle of truth many a darkened chamber, arousing the latent energies of souls, filling them with new light and kindling a fire that will eventually burn up the world in them.

As the spiritual life of the believers is hid from the natural, superficial observer, so also is their social life a paradox, for both are closely allied, and belong together. It remains for those who have participated in the benefits of this social, communistic life—who have performed the duties pertaining thereto, and who, by practical experience, know its worth, to speak concerning it.

Our social interests demand that we build each other up in our most holy faith; that we labor in spirit for divine power, for light and truth from on high, for new life, which bids us lay aside the death-garments of sin and heed the spirit's voice that calls: "Come forth!" Also, to devote our physical strength, unselfishly to build up the new earth upon which the heavens must rest. "Hands to work and hearts to God," is our motto. This consecrated labor is sacred; whatever is done, should be done with the view of honoring God, having reference to the upbuilding of his work, and promoting his cause in the earth, by forming a humanitarian home—a home for the body and the soul. Holiness unto the Lord is the inscription which everything should bear in the saint's home. The benefits derived from this social relation are many; friendships are formed that are true and lasting. In prosperity and adversity, in sickness and health they never fail. Those who are devoted to true principles, are also devoted to those who love and abide in those principles; and they are as guiding stars through the journey of life, shining the most brilliantly when the storms of life are severest. Thus do we reap, by the relinquishment of the natural relationships of earth, a higher and more enduring substance of love, emanating from a fountain that is never dry; for from thence floweth "the river whose waters maketh glad."

Some view the self-denying Shaker's home as drear and lonely, filled with disappointment; just as though the greatest amount of happiness is derived from self-indulgence! When, in reality, that is the greatest cause of misery; and the source to which inharmony, unrest and sorrow may be traced. Carnal or unchristian pleasures find no place in the social life of the Shakers. Many infer, from the fact, that as the marriage relation does not exist on the plane where we have chosen to dwell, every enjoyment, intellectual and social, is abolished. This is a very natural and unspiritual conclusion.

We not only sing, "I want to be an angel," but we are working out the Angel character, so that we may sing and act as do the Angels—live as they live, and we find no sadness in it—it is real pleasure!

Social life among the Shakers is free and broad, bounded only by the law of chastity, which is not bondage, but freedom to those who from true principle seek the higher life on a spiritual plane.

It is not strange that Celibates among the Shakers to-day, should be ranked with Celibates of the past, who were necessitated, in order to keep their vows of chastity, to seclude themselves in some recluse of the mountain, lonely cave, or gather within the cloistered walls of a monastery, wearing sad countenances—fearing to smile, lest some unhallowed influence should creep over them.

Not so with those whom resurrection power has baptized, and lifted up from the natural into the spiritual order.

Innocence and simplicity form the credentials to this new spiritual home, as truly as to the desired, future home in the spirit spheres.

Mutual condescension supports, and gives impetus to healthy action in the brotherhood and sisterhood, and we often feel that all of God's unperverted creation rejoices with us in this pure, harmonial home. The birds chaunt their musical lays, the mountains break forth into singing, and the little hills rejoice on every side. The heavenly messengers, who guide and guard this goodly heritage, are seen "leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills," and we fear not to leap and skip with them.

"O, for a thousand tongues to sing
Our great Redeemer's praise."

ANNA WHITE, Mt. L.

ANIMADVERBIVE.

Our leader, in Sept. No. 1871, has been the subject of much valuable criticism; our object being therein, to urge the necessity of worshiping the Christ-principle, and not the person of Jesus; and to worship this principle in whom, and wherever it is manifested. The critics have almost invariably concluded, with us, that Jesus was not, but became the Christ—the first born of many Christs—our exemplar; and saviour only, as we follow his example. The following "child of promise," from The Am. Spiritualist, bearing on the same subject, is from the pen of that exalted spiritualist, J. M. Peebles.

Jesus a Sinner!

Religions originating in the past—all more or less ideal—rest upon the testimonies of tradition. The credulous are the most devoted. In the ratio that knowledge increases, faith diminishes. Those who know the most believe the least. The conflict of the ages is upon us. The dead, stoutly refusing to bury its dead, the mouldy yesterdays are in close battle array with the vigorous, out-pushing to-days. God or no God, Jesus or no Jesus, immortality or a dreamless nonentity—which?

This weird drama involving the political, social and religious, is becoming deeply interesting. The tendency is towards the utilitarian. This speaking present, bristling "whys" and insisting upon proof, demands the practical and substantial. All successful religious movements must poise themselves upon principles and point to facts—well-authenticated facts, as well as appeal to reason and sentiment. Men generally cultivate the reasoning and women the emotional side of religion.

Right balance evolves high moral power. Jesus, a gentle, beautiful and womanly man, was a religious Jew. All religious systems of the past had their sacraments. Baptism in some form has ever been considered a sacrament. That distinguished writer upon "religious beliefs," S. Baring Gould, M. A., says: "Baptismal ceremonies include all purifications. The idea that man is held back from perfect union with God by his imperfection, uncleanness, sin, is widely diffused and manifests its existence by water, blood and fire baptisms."

The waters of the Ganges were believed to have a purifying effect. Under its rippling surface old and young were plunged. In Egypt, proud of her Nile, the dead were washed from their sins by Osiris; and accordingly, upon Sarcophagi, Osiris is represented pouring water upon candidates in a kneeling posture, just as they enter the land of shades. The Zend ceremonies of the Persians abound in the uses of baptismal waters to wash away sin. "Every purification," said Servius, "is made either with water, or with fire, or with air." Paul speaks of Israel as having been "baptized in the cloud and in the sea." Even the Romans practiced the rite of baptism; and Juvenal criticised and satirized those who sought to

"wash away their sins by dipping their heads thrice in the Tiber." Jesus, a Palestinian Hebrew, born subject to the requirements of the Mosaic law, must needs be baptized for purification and the washing away of sin, according to the Israelitish understanding of the ordinance. But, if he was not a sinner, why should he have submitted to baptism by water? Matthew says: "Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins." Mark assures us that, "John preached the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins." And in this wilderness John baptized Jesus in Jordan. Therefore, as baptism was understood to be the "washing away of sin," it is clear that Jesus was a sinner! Nothing upon theological grounds could be more absurd than the baptism of a saint. Sinners, and sinners alone, were called upon to repent and submit to baptismal purifications, or the washing away of sins.

Many scriptural passages besides those recording the impulsive "scourging of the money-changers," and the rude "cursing of the fig-tree," point to the imperfections and sins of Jesus. The apostolic assurance that he should "come the second time without sin unto salvation," has some reference, at least, to his first coming as the "child that grew and waxed strong"—the child both of promise and prenatal tendencies. "Call not thou me good," said the Nazarene, "none is good but one, and that is God." Good and evil are relationally opposite, evil being synonymous with imperfection and sin.

The New Testament further declares that Jesus "learned obedience by the things he suffered." Obedience is the most effectually learned by disobedience. The child learns to keep the finger from the candle by first burning it. The suffering consequent upon violated law, is teaching both severe and sound. Some can seemingly learn in no other school. "He was made perfect," writes an apostle, "through suffering." The phrase "made perfect," implies previous imperfection, and imperfection is sin. He was also called "the first begotten from the dead;" but how begotten from the dead unless himself "once dead in trespasses and sins?"

From the recorded textual teachings that Jesus refused to be called "good;" that he scourged the money-changers; that he cursed a fig-tree; that he learned obedience; that he was made perfect; that he went to John to be baptized of him in Jordan, as did other Syrian sinners from Jerusalem and all Judea, "confessing their sins"; there is no other legitimate inference than that he was a sinner—our elder brother and fellow-sinner, Jesus, "touched with our infirmities!"

Mark well—we have been treating of Joshua, the carpenter's son, whose name, when Grecianized, became Jesus. Not a word have we written of Jesus Christ. This opens a new chapter. The word Christ signifies the Messianic, the anointed, the consecrated. Christ, or the Christ principle, is divine. After Jesus was baptized, confessing his sins, the "heavens were opened" and the Christ spirit from the heaven of the Christ angels, descended upon him, and a voice came saying, "this is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Now we have Jesus Christ "our exemplar," who ministered true love and sympathy. The sermon on the Mount stands out unequalled. Its burden is blessings; its inspirations love. To love those who love us is simply reciprocity, and may be prompted alone by policy. But to love our enemies—to love and do good to those who hate us, is principle, is Christ-like. Thanks, then, be unto Christ, who giveth us the victory.

God's Will be Done.

Say to the torrent: "Stay thou on the hill!"
The torrent replies: "I'm obeying God's will."
Say to the rivulet, murmuring by:
"Be still for a moment!" and it will reply:
"I must not, I will not, I cannot be still,
"I must be in motion, and doing God's will!"
Say to the sunbeam: "Withdraw thy bright ray!"
The sunbeam replies: "God's laws, I obey."
Then say to the whirlwind, uprooting the trees—
To the hurricane raging, or the mild, whispering breeze—
To the river, the lake, or the ocean: "Be still!"
Their response is forthcoming: "We are doing God's will!"
To the tear, as it wells from the grief-stricken heart—
Or, with joy overflows, as rich treasures impart—
How idle, how needless, how fruitless and vain,
To say to that tear: "Return thou again!"
That tear, in the language of heaven, will say:
"Created I was, God's laws to obey."
The vitals, which, panting for the life-giving air—
The heart with its throbbings, and the sigh of despair;
The deep pangs of remorse on the guilt-laden soul—
How vain the endeavor, these things to control!
Those pangs, and those vitals—that heart and that sigh,
In emphatic language, will surely reply:
"Unyielding obedience, by night and by day,
"To the mandates of God, we are taught, and obey!"
From the smallest of insects, revealed to our sight;
Or the greatest of angels, in power and might—
Or the earth in her orbit, the sun, moon or stars,
Or great Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus or Mars—
All matter, all being, all spirit shall say:
"Forever the mandates of God we obey!"
Then how foolish, self-righteous, irreverent in man,
To think, in his wisdom, to better the plan!
Rather learn to be humble, to love and to pray—
The laws of his Maker to know, and obey—
To feel his duty, his privilege, his shrine—
To say: "Thy will, Father, be done, and not mine!"

Progression.

What does this word mean? It means change from a lower to a higher condition.

Politically, it means to leave behind old party issues and join hands with those who are the most advanced in the great principles of reform; and were we to predict, we would say that the party destined to rule America is that party who are the most progressive, and that party will yet be made up of the most progressive of all parties, without regard to sex or color. Progression is the spirit of the age and order of the day—to advance forward is the watchword!

Theologically, it means to leave behind old stereotyped creeds of false religions, which had their origin in the dark ages, and which stand directly opposed to the increase of light and truth, which are dawning upon the earth. It means, that when we have considered the truth and meaning of any proposition, however new, if it tends to purity and is accompanied with the evidence and accords with our reason and highest convictions of right, we should implicitly believe and obey, however contrary it may be to our former opinion or that of others.

Morally, it means to leave behind all bad habits, lying, fault-finding, back-biting, evil speaking one of another; all slander, proceeding from envy, should be laid aside. "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor" was a command in the Jewish decalogue, and should not be violated by those calling themselves Christians.

Spiritually, it means resurrection—a rising out of the flesh into the spirit; out of the earthly into the heavenly; out of darkness into light; out of ignorance into knowledge; out of the rudimental into the angel order; out of persons into principles; out of the human into the divine; out of malice and hatred into charity and love; out of sin and selfishness into a life of purity and holiness. Just in proportion as these principles are carried out practically, mankind will progress into one universal brotherhood and an enduring peace. This is what we call progression in the right direction.

What do We Worship?

EDITOR OF "THE SHAKER." MY ESTEEMED BROTHER IN CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP:—Recently, while re-reading the editorial in the September number of THE SHAKER, in which the question is put, "Which shall we worship, persons or principles?" I fell into the following train of thought concerning worship:

If we ask, What is worship? the answer would undoubtedly be: Giving the heart's strongest affections to some object earthly or heavenly, human or divine. The element of worship is inherent in every human being. Objects of worship are many and varied, from savageism to saintism. The pen of the historian has made a pathway up through a labyrinth of strange experiences during the ages past; and aided by the reflex of present revelation, natural and spiritual, we are enabled to go back to our antecedents, and learn somewhat of their status, habits of life, and modes of thought, and thereby can measure the discreet degrees of growth, from point to point, or from cycle to cycle, in human progress.

It is said that "God created the heavens and the earth, the sea and the dry land," and gave his decrees concerning them, and pronounced all very good as they came from his hand. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork," sang the sweet psalmist of Israel, while he called upon the sun, moon and stars, the hills and mountains, rivers and streams, birds of the air, the fishes of the sea, and the beasts of the field, to praise God, all of which, in their turn, have been deified and worshiped by man.

Is what we call idol-worship, whether in the form of a molten calf, an image, sculptured from the rock, the sacred beasts and birds, or the sun and his satellites, the grossest form of worship? Many of the heathen Gods were, without doubt, only symbols to the worshiper, pointing to a higher divinity; we will call them materialistic worshipers. And, inasmuch as God pronounced the matter good which they afterwards converted into genii, perhaps it is not so much wonder after all that they fell into error and displaced what God had put into order, and made confusion in the elements, just as thousands of ignorant, undeveloped children have done, who did not comprehend their parents' designs. It appears to me, that whatever uplifts the spirit above the sensuous plane of thoughts and action most effectually, is the most worthy of the heart's affections; and whatever leads to sensuality and those passions which God did not create, and never pronounced good, which are fed and strengthened from the hells beneath, should be the most abhorrent to an intelligent, human soul.

Some individuals are constitutionally more devotional than others; thus it is with nations; but, taken as a whole, we are all worshipers in some form. Worship is a component part of our being; and all have an ideal god or gods, before whom to bow and pay homage. Not the lowest worship is that which "sees God in clouds and hears Him in the winds."

In this enlightened age and nation, where there is so much freedom, expansion of thought, and religious culture, would we not spurn the idea of making brazen images for worship? And yet are there no sculptured works of art extant to-day, which are not only admired but worshiped? If the knee does not bend before them, the affections are placed upon them.

How many, in our own time, consecrate their lives and give their power unto the god of war, and seek to satiate their ambitious desires by becoming heroes in battle! and with hands yet dripping in the blood of those who were innocent of crime, and had never done an injury to them or their country, but who were forced to the cannon's mouth by the cruel mandates of the war-power—how such will exult in their conquests, and the people throughout the length and breadth of the land, sing praises to them, and do them great honor!

Where is the Christian's God while, all this is being enacted? Do we say that antagonistic elements have so convulsed the ruling powers of earth, that this is mercy's means to establish justice and equity in the land; and that such mighty upheavings and earth-throes are for the purification of the people? Alas for humanity's redemption, if it can only be wrought out by the sword! Again: Is not fashion the great Moloch of the day? and at his altar do not all, from the prince to the peasant, bow the knee and worship? Is not honesty, chastity, and integrity sacrificed there? No matter how absurd and unphilosophical the fashion may be, those who are not found in it are contemned; and, rather than endure the scorn of those who revel in luxury and wealth, and crush with the weight of public opinion, they sell their virtue and go down to the chambers of death! And while the god of war and the goddess of fashion are so faithfully served, the fires of sensuality will never be extinguished; the hells will be supplied with plenty of fuel to keep them burning!

But while we look with deep pity upon those who, instead of standing in moral rectitude, on middle ground between the higher and lower spheres, are descending downward below "the beasts that perish," we look with joy and hope upon a large band of earnest laborers in the field of moral reform and spiritual progress, who are putting forth their best energies to better the condition of humanity. The hosts, who inhabit the spirit realms, are marshaling their armies, and preparing to do battle on the higher plane of spiritual truth; not with carnal weapons will they be found fighting, yet by the aid of spiritual power they will conquer. Ascending scales are already placed by the united effort of men and angels, which reach from earth to heaven. Thousands of hands and hearts are reaching up to angel spheres, crying: "Give us food that perisheth not; clothe us with robes such as angels wear, even virgin purity, at the expense of all those worldly lusts which war against the soul's peace, which have myriads of worshipers." While they reach upward, God's ministers of love are reaching down to clasp their hands and lift them up to higher and still higher degrees on the upward scale; that they also may in turn become ministers of saving power and grace to other souls; and as they rise into the ethereal and divine elements, the clearer and more perfect their vision becomes, and the easier it is to comprehend the great Cause of all causes, who dwells in the most interior heaven of all heavens, and is the central sun from which all light and truth radiate and to which all converge, there the true God is worshiped in spirit and in truth.

A. DOOLITTLE.

Heavenly Love.

When man woke to life, from the plastic clay, he was but animal; when God breathed into his nostrils the breath of love, he became a living soul. Without love, man would have been a savage, and the earth a wilderness. Unrestrained by its benign influence, his bad passions would have become lawless depredations upon earth, and the harvest of death, through man, would have kept pace with the harvest of life through his Creator. But, thank God for the gift of His spirit of love, to soothe and restrain the perverse instincts of man's nature. As the planets, with all their fearful velocity and awful momentum, are yet held, by the silent force of the sun's attraction, within the path marked out for them by Deity, so with the bad passions of man; they are subject to the law of love, and, however wide the sphere of their departure, they cannot resist her influence, and will yield, even at their aphelion, to the omnipotence of her control.

In the physical universe the law of gravity is not more illimitable in its empire, nor more universal in its controlling influence, than the law of love in the universe of sentient existences.

Wherever being is, or space unfolds,
There love exists, inspires, controls.

When the morning stars sang together for joy, love was there, as she will be, when their requiem is sung—ruler of the spheres.

All that God has ever made, loves and does him full reverence, save only man.

Love is man's only entirely unselfish tribute. He may be honest from policy; benevolent for the relief of unpleasant sensations that wretchedness awakens; beneficent for the glory following it; prayerful that he may avert hell, or purchase Heaven; but to love and cherish his fellow man as himself, is to be more than human—this is divine.

Love is a true friend that never forsakes us while God is with us. When our horizon is overshadowed with darkness, there will love be to give each cloud a silver lining. Love with us, our star of hope shall never set, nor our skies ever be without the bow of promise! Whose love rules, the skies are all serene; with moon and stars brightly shining, as the greater and lesser angels that proclaim the glory of God. When hate usurps, then fierce winds, dread thunders, red lightnings flashing, hold fearful revelry.

Love is day, bright, beautiful; hate is night, chaotic, fearful; love is life, glorious, immortal; hate is death, impenitent, terrible; love is the tropic with its balmy breezes, spicy groves, sparkling fountains, singing birds and golden skies; hate is the poles with their icebergs and frozen solitudes, where the sun never rises, nor darkness ever sets.

To love only those that love us, our fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, sons, daughters and friends, is purely selfish, and wholly human; to recognize all mankind as our brotherhood, is Godlike; the one is the genial warmth of the domestic fireside, diffusing cheer and solace to ourself, family and friends; the other the sun—fit emblem of its Creator—dispensing light and heat to cheer and solace the whole human race.

To love those only who are lovely or admirable, is equally unchristian. We must love all, and most especially those who would most profit by our love. Wherever love will encourage the timid or reclaim the backslider, warm the cold, or melt the stony heart, humanize the savage, or christianize the moralist, there is the place, then is the time, and those are the proper objects of our love.

Love is the mightiest of all magicians. At her touch the lion becomes a lamb; the stubborn rock gushes with sweet waters; the dumb speak; the deaf hear; the blind see; the desert buds and blossoms an oasis of beauty, and man and angels rejoice that Jesus died not in vain.

God made happiness, and the only conditions on which it is attainable; and man might as well attempt to stay the comet in its flight, as to attain happiness on any other terms. God's law of happiness is love.

Waken the illustrious tenants of the tombs; the renowned lawgivers; the all-conquering heroes; all who worshiped at the temple of fame, and they will tell us that the dazzling heights they had attained above their fellow men, only enabled them to observe, the more conspicuously, the road to happiness they had so vainly sought, winding through lowly valleys down beneath their feet. They had toiled from youth to age for fame as the most certain means of happiness, and died broken hearted, that they had lived in vain—in vain because they had only learned how to use, not love their fellow men. Their dearly-bought fame, like their shadows, followed them only to the tomb, and disappointment is the only epitaph upon their monuments that the touch of time has not obliterated!

Love has a magnetic atmosphere of its own, that attracts to itself everything good and pure, and repels everything unholy and impure. In the presence of one filled with pure, heavenly love, we cannot but feel its inspiration, and become better by its influence.

Jesus did not convert his followers by his eloquence, but won them by his love. When he spoke to them, with the force of reason, of their lost condition, they only feared him; when he spoke to them with the power of love, they adored him.

In the ministry to his fellows, love is the only agency confided to man that is irresistible in its force, and infallible in its operation upon the human heart. Armed with this, he goes forth a conqueror, and doubts flee before him as darkness before the rising sun.

Like caloric and electricity, love permeates all things—no heart so hard but it will penetrate—no spirit so stubborn but it will subdue.

Steel and gunpowder may kill the body, but cannot harm the soul; they may subjugate, but cannot reform; they may afflict, but love is the only power that can save the world.

If we would that our pathway through this world be one of pleasantness and peace; that our every pulse shall throb with joy; that all the golden hours that may come to us here shall be laden with happiness; if we would that our eyes be opened that we may see, and our ears unstopped that we may hear the angels of light, as they sing the songs of the redeemed around the throne of God, then let pure, heavenly love be and abide with us, and become our guiding star to the better land—from the spheres of the lustful and unregenerate.

Love to God.

"With all thy heart."

Love is natural to the human heart. Extremely difficult is it, if not impossible, to find an individual that does not cherish affection for some person or thing. It matters not into what paths of error and sin one has strayed, there is still in the inmost soul a spot that is capable of being affected by the sweeter emotions. Is it necessary to refer to more than one example to prove this statement? Can the gall of hatred be more intense in bitterness than that engendered by religious bigotry? And yet, when indulged in to its utmost limit, its innocent victim recognized, by his prayer for the forgiveness of his murderers, pleading their capacity for something infinitely better.

Love is as varied in its kinds as the individuals who exercise it, and of every possible degree. How strong is the affection of some mothers for their children! They are ready, at all times, to sacrifice their own lives for the welfare of such. But in others how weak the tie that binds them to their offspring! What indifference to their welfare, if not positive aversion towards them! And yet these same parents will exhibit an enthusiastic admiration of a dress, a flower, or a piece of music. It is said the celebrated Madame de Stael could pass through a country of the most enchanting natural scenery, without being attracted in the least by its loveliness. And yet she was a woman of wonderful natural endowments, and of great culture. She possessed a love of the beautiful, but it was that beauty which is displayed in man rather than that which is without him. Intellect possessed charms for her that external nature did not; and she could be enthusiastic over that which pertained to humanity—its antiquities, its literature of all kinds, its past history or present condition.

Love will increase by cultivation, not in the same degree in all, for there must be recognized a natural difference in the faculty of loving possessed by different persons as in everything else pertaining to human nature; yet it will "grow with one's growth and strengthen with his strength," if carefully and constantly cherished. It is often very feeble in its manifestations, and its possessors, instead of fanning into greater life the pure flame, allow it to become wholly obscured by carelessness, or else, by their excesses, to degenerate into that which is altogether unworthy of the name. "Love suffereth long and is kind," but that which is allowed to take its place soon changes to aversion and hatred. Genuine love is free from every taint of impurity, and those who possess it in its fullness "love each other with a pure heart fervently."

Love always has goodness as its supreme object; hence God, who is love, is the Supreme Good. The human heart that is imbued with love cannot fail to love the Infinitely Good. It recognizes God everywhere, and adores him with an unerring instinct as well as with the force of the highest reason. It perceives the Adorable in created beings, especially in such as by increasing culture exhibit the divine traits in their greatest perfection, whether physical, intellectual or moral; and in loving them, love the Divine. It perceives him in the various divinely established relations—father, mother, sister and brother; but especially where these relations, by the purity and permanency of the connecting ties, shadow forth those subsisting in the eternal abodes. It sees him in the outward universe—in the unnumbered worlds that move forever around and among each other with so nice adjustment; in the sublimity of mountain scenery; in the beauty of field and forest, lake and river, tree, shrub and flower; as well in the varied sounds that charm the ear, the colors that delight the eye, or the fragrance that pleases the sense of smell, as in those things that appeal to the inmost faculties of the soul—purity, truth, meekness, kindness and benevolence.

The emotions enkindled by the contemplation of such things are all of a joyous nature. Love is joy to the soul. It is quietness and assurance forever. There is nothing in it debasing, but that which is perpetually elevating. It changes from glory to glory by the inspirations of the Divine Spirit; so that its first degrees, or the feeble flickerings of its primitive light, become lost in the splendor of that which succeeds them, and which will forever succeed; for love to God, who is infinite and eternal, must be perpetually increasing, and the soul whose love at first seemed weak and variable, will, ultimately, by constant growth, become strong and unchanging in love as God himself, so that he could no more transgress the divine law, or fall short of its requirements, than he could annihilate a world.

Such is the nature of Christian love, that which was manifested by Jesus Christ while upon the earth, and which has been experienced by multitudes who have followed him in the regeneration, or the new life of love. This love is consistent with everything that is excellent in the universe, and is incompatible only with sin. "All things are yours," is the emphatic language of the Apostle addressed to Christians. All things, whether on earth or in heaven; for he whom they love with unceasing adoration has all things in himself—an infinite store—which he bestows with unstinted hand upon such as are "made partakers of the Divine Nature, having escaped the corruptions that are in the world through lust."

Religious Organization—Shaker Homes.

A retrospective view of past eras shows that erring humanity has wrought much in harmony in the world, and builded that which must be pulled down and cast away to give place to something better, more enduring, as the race advances to more progressed conditions.

The past has had its prophets and prophetesses; with eagle eyes they pierced the future; and while their hearts were touched and quickened by inspirational power, they foretold the coming of a day when the Highest would begin to show his city which in the Apocalypse is called the New Jerusalem. God's city, builded in the heavens, coming down from Him to earth, "where discipline should be kept in peace," and the sound of war would not be heard, and wherein Wisdom would hide his treasures from the carnally wise and sensually corrupt, and reveal them to the pure in heart, and the meek should possess them. And the Apostle Paul, by faith, saw a perfected, organized body, having one Lord, one faith and one baptism, in perfect unity of feeling, having progressed beyond the childhood condition of being tossed and carried about with every wind of doctrine; a body having many members working effectually for the increase of the whole, in one fitly joined compact.

Such an organization, founded upon divine revelation, is beginning to be known, and as in the harvest the wheat of the husbandman appears, so in due time God is revealed as Father and Mother. No longer we cry Abba, Father; now, true, legitimate sons and daughters are brought forth and commenced to build the New Jerusalem according to the pattern formed in the heavens. The lessons of past ages have not been wasted. The present is a time of deep searching and inquiry, and to a great extent, of religious aspiration; and thousands are positive dissenters from all popular creeds, and are seeking for an organization that shall combine the efficiency, purity and simplicity of the true church of Christ. The light of divine truth is shining upon humanity, and a spiritual power is at work that will shake the false systems that man has builded. Those who inhabit the New Jerusalem, or Shaker Order, must leave the old, and become new creatures in Christ, having their affections placed on things above—forsaking the accidental or partial relationships of earth, and forming the perfect Christian character by living like angels in the resurrection heavens. The ties and affections which bind kindred relations together on the natural plane, are good and useful in their place; but that which was even once glorious, by the law of progression ceases to be glorious, as that which is freedom to-day may become bondage to-morrow.

The spiritual elements are full of signs, which give promise of a greater fulfillment of prophecy than has yet been given—"the heavens hasten"—the angels work, and mortals must work. The spirits call for more of the angelic, less of the Adamic. We need to learn to "dwell in everlasting burnings," until self-pride and all that is not godly and true is consumed in the soul. Those who learn to praise God in the fires of truth, will become so purified and refined as to reflect the image of the purifier. Such, whether on earth or in the spirit spheres, will form a heavenly home of peace, founded upon eternal principles.

JANE KNIGHT.

The Shakers.

PAST—PRESENT—FUTURE.

Shaker life contains nothing so mysterious but which can be fully understood by its subjects. It makes no promises of rewards, nor punishments, excepting the effects of practical life as led by mankind in particular. Whoever can look for the just recompense of their doings, without that expectation of favor, mythical theologians instruct, are men of reason, far removed from superstitious, man-made creeds. And this class have made, are sustaining, and are ripening to sustain, the Shaker Order.

In the autumn of 1776, a half-dozen individuals, from England, entered the wilderness of Watervliet, N. Y., built their log house, and began a life of religious communism, similar to the primitive Christians, relying upon direct communication from the angel-spheres for the knowledge how to do and to be.

They had a testimony to impart, that they knew would be very unpalatable to all, excepting those who had become so thoroughly disgusted with sensuality, and who felt themselves lost to all spirituality; with no hopes of gaining power over that nor improving in this by adherence to the theologies of the times. Fortunately, of this number, there were a few. The times seemed unpropitious for their mission. War was uppermost in the minds of the people. Their gospel taught purity and peace; and those who, from religious motives, would not fight, were despised, fully as much, as are those in our times who will not marry from the same motives. Since the days of Jesus, the world has never seen a Church begin and succeed, which had so little worldly sympathy, nor whose future seemed so full of despair.

This "little flock" boldly enunciated their testimony—which, cutting keenly those desires worldly people love best, raised a storm of persecution; and, for years, they suffered abuses that the people of to-day would hardly believe. The Church grew. Its adherents were a noble class of people, religiously inclined—from that class that were "poor in spirit" and in temporal things. By united efforts, industry, and complete trust in Providence, they soon had a competence, and in less than thirty years inaugurated fifty or more communities, or large families, containing more than a thousand persons, with real estate exceeding a million of dollars' value. Their object was two-fold: First, the accomplishment of their own salvation, beginning with their thoughts and feelings, and continuing to the ends of their fingers—and they found much salvation worked out at their fingers' ends. Secondly, they determined to found institutions where those, who were overtaken by the same convictions as themselves, could gather together and more successfully achieve the practical results of the cross—Salvation. To the Shakers of the past, owe a wonderful debt of gratitude. Counting back fifty years, and those things that were necessarily neglected, in order to establish homes for the body as well as paths for the soul, began to appear as possible and necessary.

Schools for mental discipline began to assume an importance, second only to those valued seasons—deep labors for the purification of the heart. Still the same motto is held now, as of yore: "Seek first the kingdom of God," before expecting "ought else should be added." And could our ancestors have gained for us, an advancement of soul equal to the homes they have provided for us (and this anti-christian idea, "Jesus paid it all, etc.," is very prevalent), then we might, long since, have added many things which those not of us complain because we have not, and do not realize the wherefore. We have, unreasonably, been charged with despising progression into the arts and sciences of the day. "Have you libraries, pianos, Greek, Latin, and æsthetic literature and manners?" is the very common inquiry! But, "What is your soul-advancement?" is abroad, begging investigators! Little as we have progressed into music, letters and arts, we yet realize how true it is, these things do not bring purification—it is "the spirit, Christ, that giveth life!" and other specifications of education are secondary, and we have an eternity to acquire them; we never expect to die! We are, at times, the subjects of a withdrawal of spiritual light; the present is such a season with the Shakers; but as surely as morning succeeds the night, and spring the winter, so surely do we know an increasing light is at hand. We need not half the faith, fortitude nor endurance our spiritual ancestors had, for with our very favorable surrounding comforts we can "wait upon the Lord" in all confidence, though many have permitted their lights to grow dim, and themselves "to go out from among us." Darkness does not reign supreme, as in some past Shaker-history it has so appeared; we are more favored; we are just as hopeful; and the world at large needs our testimony, much more than we need members! We are supposed to be wealthy by many: excepting the millions of dollars' worth of real estate we possess, this is not true. The majority of Shaker Communities have a very lean bank account—in fact, many individuals in New York city could buy out the whole number of Communities, if we would sell! Just why we do not make more money, must be left for another article to show. We are already experiencing the fulfillment of our founder: "Souls will flock to you like doves to their cots, by hundreds and by thousands!" and we have seen more than this number flocking to Shaker principles for years! and, at the same time, we have too many flocking to our temporal doors, who have only those seven principles at heart—five loaves and two fishes. Of

we need only say a few words. Reasoning from causes to their effects, we will not be charged with speculation. We are witnesses of ripe scholarship, in all that adorns earthly life, very common among the people: Arts, sciences, mechanics, æsthetics, etc., are educating the masses. These are finding their theology is not religion; that religion has salvation in it; that salvation will appear as a positive necessity; for they will be touched by the quickening power of the Spirit of God, that will cause all earthly acquirements to appear as dross in comparison to the salvation of the angel-life. Spiritualism will be the science of a new condition; and, all other pursuits neglected until this condition is reached, the use of acquired abilities will return, and together with their souls, be consecrated to the pure purposes of God. We are few and ignorant now; by-the-by we shall be the many and of the most wise on the earth! And as, in the spiritual heavens there are more souls than in earth and hell together, so will these heavens baptize and consecrate the useful of the earth. And none need fear our numerical force, any more than our poverty of numbers; for "Christians never did, never can fight." *

Jesus, the Son of Man—Jesus Christ, the Son of God, Christ the Lord from Heaven.

A want of proper distinction between the foregoing different characters has been the theoretical authority for untold errors in faith and life practice, among professors of Christianity, for nearly two thousand years! Making the child "Jesus," when born of Mary, both Christ and God, bars all possibility of following Christ, and being like him, in purity and holiness; hence the origin of the idea of Christian sinners; the impossibility of living without sin; for it is impossible to be like God! But a clear perception of the distinction of the foregoing characters reveals a possibility to follow Jesus Christ, in living righteously, and holy. Let us then enquire, first, who was

JESUS—"THE SON OF MAN?"

On this subject, there is, probably, no better authority than Jesus himself, and as our space is limited we must narrow our historical research. In speaking of himself, genealogically, Jesus calls himself "the Son of Man." The four Evangelists record about eighty times, Jesus' use of this appellation, and under a great variety of circumstances, as if purposely to forestall all claims for a higher origin which he appeared intuitively to anticipate would be awarded him. According to the original Hebrew Scriptures, not interpolated, Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary, and the Jews, who were familiar with his genealogy, on the occasion of his having performed some miracles, and taught in great and astonishing wisdom (since he was now baptized and had become Jesus Christ), said: "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James, and Joses, and Juda, and Simon, and are not his sisters here with us?" Jno. vi. 3.

The reason why the Jews failed to believe of Jesus as becoming the Messiah, the Christ the Son of God, was because they knew the parents of Jesus; but they looked for their Redeemer to be born of God; and they understood not the second birth.

Jesus himself appears to have confirmed the testimony of the Jews relative to his genealogy, in that he said: "I, Jesus, have sent mine Angel to testify unto you these things in the churches, I am the * * * offspring of David." Rev. xxii. 16. If Jesus was the "offspring of David," was he the child of Joseph? for Mary was of the house of Levi. But it is not our purpose to attempt to prove the genealogical origin of Jesus. It is sufficient to accept his own testimony, that he was the "Son of Man." A Son of Man is the product of man—male and female. Paul said Jesus was of the seed of Abraham; but he confounds Jesus, with Jesus Christ, as it is often done in Scripture. He saith: "Concerning his son Jesus * our Lord, which was made of the Seed of David (not of Levi), according to the flesh." Rom. i. 3. "For verily he took not on him the nature of Angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham; wherefore, in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest." Heb. ii. 16, 17. His brethren, after the flesh, were James, and Joses, and Juda, and Simon, and Joseph and Mary were their parents, and, if in all things Jesus "was made like unto them, who were his father and mother?"

It is, however, very necessary to maintain the distinction between Jesus, before and after his baptism.

After Jesus was born of Mary he lived with his parents, and worked with his "father," according to Jewish history, and at the carpenter's trade, and was subject to his parents (except on one occasion), until he began to be about thirty years of age. On that occasion his mother admonished him by saying: "Thy father (Joseph) and I, have sought thee sorrowing."

But, at the time when Jesus quit his home to preach, a prophet had arisen in Judea, named John, who foretold the coming of Christ to the Jewish nation, and the whole nation was in anxious expectancy looking for the Messiah, the Saviour of the world. John the Baptist taught confession, repentance, and remission of sins, as a preparatory work for the nation, to enable them to receive the Messiah when he should come. Jesus, who had previously felt a call of God to preach a higher, holier, purer baptism than that which John was preaching, went to John to be baptized of him in order to prepare him for the higher baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire of Divine life and inspiration. It thus became Jesus to "fulfill all righteousness," which required that God's work should be performed in order, each step of the soul's progress in grace in its proper place; first, John's baptism into confession, repentance and remission of sins; this Jesus received of John.

After this baptism, the Holy Ghost, the Christ, in visible form, like a dove, descended upon Jesus, his soul having been prepared by John's baptism, and he now became born of the Spirit of God; a Son of God—he was now

JESUS CHRIST.

But, whatever Jesus was by his birth of Mary, whether "Son of Man" or Son of God, it is clear, by this baptism he was not sufficiently a "Son of God" without being born again; spiritually regenerated, in order to become a "Son of God" after the Spirit; for he said to Nicodemus: "Except a man be born again of water, and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God"—that is to say, except a man be baptized with John's baptism, the confession, repentance and remission of sins, and of Christ's baptism of the Holy Ghost, and fire of gospel truth and heavenly life, he cannot see the kingdom of God. Jesus having received these baptisms the first of any man, became "the first born among many brethren" into the kingdom of God, Rom. viii. 29. "The first born from the dead," Col. i. 18, (in the nature of sin.) "The first born of every creature," Col. i. 15, (in the New Creation or Kingdom of God.) Therefore, having the pre-eminence he became the "Son of God" and, at that time, "The only begotten Son of God." But other sons of God have since been born, as Jesus then was, or else he has not had the "many brethren" of later birth.

These brethren (and sisters) consist of all souls who have since been baptized into John's baptism (not the mere dipping in water—the empty sign), but the accompanying confession, repentance and remission of sin; also into Jesus' baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire, and thus have been born of God as Jesus was, and are now become "Saviours" like unto Jesus, only younger brethren, "the Salt (Saviour) of the earth."

But, the baptized Jesus is now become Jesus Christ, or "The Christ of God"—the vicegerent of God on earth, or Emanuel "God with us;" God manifest in the flesh. But his younger brethren have also become vicegerents of God on earth, and God through these also was, and still is, manifest in the flesh. But Jesus Christ is pre-eminently the "Mediator of the New Covenant" between God and man. Yet, the younger brethren, and sisters too, are also Mediators of the New Covenant. But Jesus Christ is the "King of Kings" of a heavenly kingdom, "not of this world," and "Lord of Lords." Of course there must be other Kings and Lords in the kingdom of heaven, even "kings and priests unto God," Rev. i. 6.

These are the sons and daughters of God, who follow Jesus Christ, the pre-eminent "Son of God;" for Jesus Christ taught a new birth for all humanity who would become the children of God, and enter the Kingdom of Heaven; and, to be the least child in the Kingdom of Heaven, at that time, was to be greater than John the Baptist, who was the greatest, then, among natural men; because John had not yet been "born again" of the Christ Spirit, the Holy Ghost, into the Kingdom of Heaven.

Jesus Christ is now "The Lord from Heaven;" "A Quickening Spirit," a Law-Giver in Zion; and "The Elder Brother" of many brethren and sisters—an EXEMPLAR for all who would "be 'perfect'" in righteousness, and is Authority of God to say: "I am the way; follow Me." "I am the Truth;" speak the word of God as I speak. "I am the life;" live as I live, an Angel life, fulfilling "all righteousness." Be at one with God as I have become. And this is the "atonement" (at-one-ment) that I have made with my "Father in Heaven" to do His will, instead of my own will—"Not my will, but thine be done."

The evidences of Jesus Christ's vicegerency and authority as the Divine Law-giver, are his works. "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin." Jno. xv. 24. "If I had not come and spoken unto them they had not had sin, but now they have no cloak for their sin." Jno. xv. 22.

We now have Jesus the REDEEMED; and Jesus Christ the REDEEMER, a High Priest forever, after the order of Melchizedek; that is, an order which does not recognize an earthly genealogy, for neither Jesus nor Jesus Christ had an earthly posterity; he was harvested from the earth, or generative order. And, if Jesus had an earthly parentage, Jesus Christ was a Son of God, begotten and born of the Holy Ghost, who said at Jesus' baptism, after he had become Jesus Christ, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

But, had Jesus been born of God, and been a Son of God by his natal birth of Mary, why had he need to be born again in order to see the kingdom of God, and be a King in that kingdom? What was his second birth into? Or, if he became a "Son of God" by his natal birth of Mary, what did he become by his spiritual birth of the Christ, the Holy Ghost, when the voice said, "This is my beloved Son?"

OF CHRIST, THE QUICKENING SPIRIT.

We have yet to consider that this was the Spirit that baptized Jesus after John's baptism, and was seen in the visible form of a Dove, which lit upon and abode with Jesus, and constituted him a Christ, or, for that time "The Christ," Jesus Christ, an anointed of God; a "Saviour of Men," and pre-eminently their Exemplar. But this same Christ subsequently descended from Jesus Christ, and baptized other sons of men just as Jesus was thus baptized, and made them also saviours of men, according to the prophecy of Obadiah: "And Saviours shall come upon Mount Zion to judge the Mount of Esau; and the kingdom shall be the Lord's." Obadiah, 21. The "Mount of Esau" was the mount of flesh, or generative plane of humanity. And, as Jesus by this Christ baptism became Jesus Christ, in like manner all those thus baptized "Saviours on Mount Zion" became Christs; hence, we have Peter Christ, Matthew Christ, Luke Christ, and a host of other faithful Saviours, even Ann Christ.

But Christ, "The Quickening Spirit," the original Baptizer was "The Lord from Heaven"—the "Dove"—"The Root of David"—of whom Jesus Christ spake as of himself; with whom he had now become at one, even as Christ, the Holy Ghost, was one with the Father. It was this Christ, by whom God "made the worlds," as stated by Paul to the Hebrews, 1st and 2d. It was this Christ (tho' now, by Paul, identified with Jesus), who was "the brightness of God's glory and the express image of His person"—who was "made so much better than the Angels, as he hath, by inheritance, obtained a more excellent name than they." "For unto which of the Angels said he at any time, thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee?" "And again: I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son." "And again, when he bringeth in the first begotten into the world, he saith, Let all the angels of God worship him." "And to the Angels he saith: Who maketh his Angels Spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire." "But unto the Son he saith: Thy throne, O, God, is forever and ever—a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom." "Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity, therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." "And thou, Lord, in the beginning, hast laid the foundations of the earth (the New Earth), and the Heavens (the New Heavens) are the work of Thy hands." Heb. ii. 4th to 10. This referred to "Christ," the "Quickening Spirit," "The Lord from Heaven," the "Root of David," etc.

But, as Jesus Christ was at one with this Christ Spirit, his Father, it was referred, by the Apostle, also to him; for Jesus Christ said: "I and my Father are One." "He that hath seen me (Christ), hath seen my father." For through Jesus Christ, or Christ manifest in the flesh through Jesus, was the Fatherhood of God revealed; and, through the first anointed female, who was baptized with this Holy Ghost Christ, was the Motherhood of God made manifest to mankind.

But, this same Christ is also transmissible to other sons of God, aye, and daughters, too, who become the followers of Jesus Christ, even as Jesus Christ prayed: "Holy Father, keep, through thine own Name, those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one as we are," Jno. xvii. 11th. Thus, to portray, in one view, all these special characters, we have synonymously:

First. Jesus—Son of Man; of the seed of Abraham—flesh and blood; who could sin, if he would; having a sinful nature; who said: "Why callest thou me good?" Offspring of David; who had to be born again—became Second. Jesus Christ—the baptized Jesus—the Son of God—became a quickening spirit; of the Seed of God—who could not sin—(being redeemed from sinful nature); one with the "Root of David;" Born of God—the first begotten from the dead—the "first born of many brethren;" sent of God—anointed—Saviour of the world!

Third. Christ: The Pre-eminent and original Son of God; THE Quickening Spirit; THE Root of David; Baptizer of Jesus; who made the worlds (of the New Creation); and the (New) Heavens are the works of his hands.

Monopoly.

All superfluity is fruit of sin;
 The palace rests upon a thousand huts:
 The hand that seeks unbounded wealth to win,
 By each success, some door of blessing shuts.
 By each success some misery is sown,
 Some sorrow for the future day to reap;
 Some guilt is kindled, that, when years have flown,
 Shall through the heart like streams of lava sweep.
 Monopoly is but the largest theft,
 The robbery that swells beyond the Law—
 A subtle power which hath the earth bereft
 Of that sweet good which its Creator saw.
 It is a blight upon the human race;
 It fills the cities with their dens of shame;
 It sits a threatening fiend in every place,
 That honest industry might rightly claim.
 The Angels see it, and their eyes are stern,
 Yet full of pity for the poor and weak:
 Before their tribune how shall conscience burn!
 And who will for the grasping dare to speak?
 Ah, who could plead the cause of him who made,
 By usurpation, want's appalling pains?
 When shall his crimes from his own vision fade?
 And what forgiveness could remove his stains?
 Not till the dwarf'd and smitten thrive and bloom,
 Not till the crushed and thwarted rise to life,
 Not till his spirit toils revoke the doom
 With which his earthly deeds were ever rife;
 Not till all marks of penury depart
 From souls whose mortal destiny he made,
 Not till the depths of his own sordid heart
 Break forth in sympathy—in loving aid.
 O, not till then can he the past forget!
 This is atonement that will never fail;
 For, by this law shall sin's dark train be met;
 And through this law shall deathless truth prevail.
 The Angels say to every heart: "Do right!"—
 Though man-made systems may sustain the wrong,
 Guilt shall be guilt, in God's impartial sight;
 And not less heavy carried by a throng.
 Before the Angels, pomp is types of woe;
 The gorgeous fruitage of a poisonous tree,
 Whose cruel roots luxuriantly grow
 From hearts long buried in fell misery.
 With deep compassion, over earth we trace
 The ills that through Monopoly have come:
 One spot is radiant—it has no place
 Within the borders of our sacred home.

CECELIA DE VERE.

Good Fruit from a Bad Tree.

If such a thing were possible, it would seem to be the teaching of the following extract from a letter recently received by one of the Brethren, from a popular Western Minister:

"I do not believe a bit, you know, in your peculiar notions of the separation of the husband and wife, or of the isolation of the sexes to the destruction of the marriage tie, and so at last of the whole world for lack of a new generation. I am quite sure the canon must be all wrong that would leave this good, green earth as bare of human beings as the moon.

"But you have solved one problem. I take you to be the most honest artisans; the most upright dealers; the most harmless livers (if that is a merit); the most comfortable, and, as I hope to find when I see you, the most generous people in your ideas and habits I have ever heard of."

The above is quite characteristic of the man, and at the same time shows how very little believers are understood, by those even who, of all men, should have a correct knowledge of a Faith which, according to his own testimony, incites such excellent Practice.

"By their fruits ye shall know them,"—is as true to-day as when uttered by the Saviour.

It is strange, after so much has been spoken and written to inform the world that we do not condemn marriage in its own order and place, for the children of this world do and will continue to marry, and if they would not abuse themselves and the laws of nature under the cloak of "sacred" matrimony, the Shakers will not find much fault, and some of them would feel much more respect for themselves, and be better fitted and prepared to receive the pure testimony of Christ's second appearing, and its Resurrection power, which elevates the mind above sensuous passions and desires.

It may be a question whether we ought to be required to stretch our "generosity" so much as to be patient under so much misconception and misrepresentation.

Evidently, this is no time to slacken our hand, but, by "THE SHAKER," and every means in our power, "Let the tide of Truth roll on." Amen. JOHN WHITELY.

Radical Christianity.

The adjective in the above title would be superfluous were it not the fact, that what is now called Christianity, is exhibited under various aspects, some of them wholly diverse from others. It becomes necessary, then, in order to discover which is the genuine, and which the false, to compare them with Christianity in its original feature, if it is possible to ascertain what that is. We have records purporting to have come down to us from its primitive times, and to have been written by those who were the intimate associates of its founder. Though these are not entirely free from errors, from contradictions apparent and real, yet, on the whole, so uniform are their statements respecting what was taught by Jesus Christ and his immediate disciples, that all who profess to be Christian teachers appeal to them as a standard to prove the truth of their own doctrines, however great may be the diversity exhibited by these.

One of the most prominent statements in these records, largely dwelt upon by some of the writers, is that the gospel or religious system of Jesus Christ, is the manifestation of the power of God for the salvation of men from sin. There can be no doubt that what has, for ages, been called Christianity, has been a power in the earth, and is, at the present day, as potent in its various organizations and methods of inculcating its doctrines upon its immediate subjects and of spreading them throughout the world, as any other power in existence, whether religious or political. But a question very naturally arises in the mind of every one who prefers practical religion to mere dogmatic theology or to any display of worldly dignity and authority, whether the immense power which has been in existence for centuries, under the name of Christianity, has been the power of God unto salvation, or something else. The question is one to be decided by the student of history, and, of course, its investigation is not of a nature to come within the limits of a brief essay. But the earnest and careful enquirer after Christianity, as taught by Jesus and his apostles, cannot fail to see that, as presented to us by these original records, it is eminently practical and experimental, aiming at a radical and thorough change in the lives of all its subjects. He learns from its teachings, both the simple and direct precepts of Jesus, and those expressed in the more elaborate writings of the apostle Paul, that the Divine power is always bestowed upon those who render obedience to the requirements of the gospel, and invariably proves itself by its effects.

It matters not whether Jesus or Confucius, or any one else first gave utterance to the golden rule—"Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." Jesus Christ reduced to practice this and other important precepts so difficult for men generally to exemplify, and showed how others could do the same. Such practical teaching commends itself to the judgment of all who desire salvation from sin, and leaves no excuse to those who refuse it obedience. Hence, the propriety of the words he uttered in his final charge to his disciples: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature; he that believes and is baptized" with this Divine power, "will be saved, but he that believes not will be condemned"—by his own judgment and conscience, for not accepting that which he is assured will save him.

The radical precepts uttered by Jesus on the Mount, have a value that they would not have had if they had not been reduced to practice by himself first, and subsequently by his early disciples. We should have been inclined, had this not been the case, to class some of them among mere abstractions or "glittering generalities." Even as it is, many, if not the most of those who profess to be his disciples at the present day, practically reject them. And why? Evidently because they are not "endued with the power from on high," which they need in order to carry them out in their lives.

It will be found by those who carefully look at the matter, that the greatest miracles performed by Jesus Christ were not those which he wrought upon the bodies of men, but those which he exhibited in his sublime life, so much above the ordinary passions of human beings. It is not to be wondered at that some, ignorant of the power which he possessed, should have said he was destitute of the affections common to humanity. The truth is he was beyond their comprehension. But there is nothing more mysterious or unnatural in this than that a Newton should be beyond the comprehension of a mere tyro in mathematics. Let them be "baptized with the Holy Spirit, even with fire," and they will discover their error. They will learn the superior power of his spirit, and will be able to prove from their own experience the wisdom of his most radical sayings.

To have lived a celibate life was not an original thing with Jesus—thousands had done the same thing before him, and from religious motives; but the being "born from above" as he expressed it in his conversation with the Jewish Senator, or, being elevated to the life of the heavens, was, if not a new thing in the earth, yet something extremely rare. He—to use his own figurative language—though the Son of Man, yet came down from Heaven, and still was in heaven. Celibacy was an adjunct of the first stages of that new life, a necessary step to its complete attainment, but necessary only as repentance and confession of sin are requisite to attain it; because the sensuous life of man is limited in its nature, adapted only to partial affections, while the heavenly life is universal and eternal.

But it may be asked, is not such a life that of the mere recluse—the ascetic? It may seem so to the one wholly absorbed in worldly gain and ambition, but not so in reality. Jesus, though he lived the life of heaven while upon the earth, yet was a person of the most active benevolence. He was not an ascetic, except in the original signification of the word, being a practical worker, with his hands, his head, and his heart. The meek, he declared, shall inherit the earth. They are its inheritors in the best sense of the word; for who so worthy of its inheritance as those who cherish and cultivate it instead of laying it waste by indulgence in the passions that are perpetually disinheriting such as think they have a claim to it by discovery, conquest or entailment? They are its lords, “to the manor born,” rather than the devastators who have undertaken to parcel it out among themselves for their exclusive possession, and they will continue to occupy it, as rightful heirs, dwelling in a “peaceable habitation—in quietness and assurance forever.”

W. H. BUSSELL.

AUG. 20TH, 18.—The speaker lies on a bed of sickness.

“My soul is weary. My life is a constant combat of conscience with sin. I am so weary, I feel it would be a relief to die; and yet, I fear to die. Yes, whatever may be my profession to others, I must own to myself that I fear Death. Thou knowest, O, Father, that I have honestly striven to live up to the precepts of Thy dear Son. Yet, strange it is, I don’t half believe in his existence, or in a future state. I cannot comprehend my own state; I seem to believe and not to believe. I see now: My reason is convinced, from the evidence which appeals to it, that there is a future existence, and a God; and that Jesus is His Son; and that his precepts are the bread of life; but I cannot realize these things. I can consider, and speculate upon these things, but they present nothing to me that I can be sensible of. I want to feel a communion with the Divine Spirit. But, stay; the Church, to which I belong, is steadfastly opposed to such communion. I shall get soon to be that absurdity—a mystic. Hang the Church! and all the Churches! I don’t believe in them; they can give me nothing to satisfy me. I want peace, and they give me unrest. Why, O, God, can I not have Thy Spirit dwelling in my soul, like Thine Apostles of old? Why is this, O, my soul? A voice answers me: ‘It is because of Sin!’ Yes, I know I have sinned; and I know very well what Sin is, though I can’t explain it; and I know that as soon as I get up from this bed, I shall be at it again. But it is ridiculous to say I must not sin. How can I live without Sin? The Churches all say we must sin. I will own it, I am quite puzzled. O, my God! must I ever struggle like this, and yet find no releasement?”

Enter, elderly, socialistic-materialist Friend.

“Well, my dear boy, does your philosophy support you, as you contemplate Death?”

“O, let Death come, he has no terrors for me!”

“Well, have you thought upon my remarks on the singular superstitious institutions of this extraordinary time? To me many of them present much that is well worth study.”

“I have considered your remarks, especially on ‘The Shakers.’ Pray, repeat some of their peculiarities.”

“They dance in their worship.”

“Ridiculous!”

“They believe Christ has appeared a second time, in a woman.”

“Blasphemy!”

“They have all things in common.”

“Fiddle-dee-dee!”

“They do not marry, and have no criminal intercourse of the sexes.”

“Hold! Hold! or you will send me to the popular King of Terrors sooner than need be. My curiosity, however, is excited, and, if I recover, I will go and see these Shakers. It will be deeply interesting to me to witness, in actual life, the extremest phase of hypocrisy and fanaticism: for, as a student of human nature, I know these two can exist together in one mind. But, friend P——, I will bet you that, in three weeks, I will find out the humbug. Before I go, I know enough of human nature to be certain I shall find just this:

The most fanatical and the weakest are tyrannized over by the most cunning, who work on the low fanaticism of their weaker companions, and who indulge themselves secretly in those enjoyments which they profess to despise. I have no faith in human nature. The fate of all these attempts to get above the world is this: the attempters start with much real earnestness of purpose, and with a great deal of effervescent enthusiasm; but, when they come to the daily life, the earnestness and enthusiasm sparkle off, and leave the old, old sediment. Again, away from the world, the mind becomes contracted, and preys upon itself, and the necessity for excitement and novelty, which is inherent in the human heart, will have satisfaction; hence hypocrisy. The mind, crushed into itself, will find, in low ambition, and in paltry selfishnesses, an activity which is, in the outer world, more healthily exercised on the legitimate duties of life!”

“Well, go, and I prophesy you will much alter your opinions!”

PART II.

ARRIVAL.

SEPT. 14TH.—“What a remarkable air of calmness, and of neatness is around the place. Surely, iniquity cannot exist in such repose. The genius of the place is, evidently, Order. But, ‘still waters run deep!’”

MEDITATIONS AFTER CONVERSATIONS.

“I am quite surprised! I have failed to detect, in the countenances of those I have conversed with, that mixture of cunning and of acerbity that I expected. There is a candor, and a calmness of demeanor, which, if assumed, must stamp them as the most consummate of hypocrites. I have witnessed many phases of human character; I do not think I could be so easily deceived. I am favorably impressed; yet, I will ‘speer’ round. With reference to their doctrines, they don’t seem to attach so much importance to those things which I think absurdities, as to that which I know is not absurd, but impossible, namely: that they live, day by day, without sin. They do not call themselves saints, nor use canting expressions, which I loathe. But I begin to feel I’m somewhat on unsafe ground. This may be the work of God. I don’t much like to play tricks with it. I’ll examine it to the bottom. I will work with them daily, and I will search their writings.”

MEDITATIONS AFTER EXAMINATION.

SEPT. 28TH.—“I am convinced there is truth here. But it is so wrapped in a husk of absurdity as to conceal it from the general view. I see clearly from a study of the doctrines of Jesus, and from the writings of Paul, and of the other scriptural essayists, that celibacy is a virtue, and I now inwardly resolve that I will never marry. I wonder if I shall keep that resolve; I should say it is one hundred to one against it. As to the people, they have almost killed me with kindness. I could almost weep to find such disinterested affection as they exhibit. I begin to have a little faith in human nature. Here are no bolts nor bars; in fact, now I think of it, tyranny is not possible in America. I can see they are willing spirits, held together by affection.”

OCT. 5TH.—“I feel strongly inclined to try an experiment: Some of my sins are a burden to my soul; I will bring them to the light, and observe the effect upon myself.”

OCT. 6TH.—“I have confessed those sins, after earnest prayer, and I certainly experience a comfort and satisfaction that I have never before found. I feel greatly interested. I am inclined to go on with the work, and to let everything else take its chance. This seems to me to be the very thing I have been in search of. I begin to feel a new feeling, as if it were possible to gain a communion with the Spirit. But it is too absurd to suppose I could live with them, or that I could even join them. What! me, who have always prided myself on my refinement and social cultivation, to hop, and to skip about with a pack of lunatics! I won’t do it! Consider my dignity!”

OCT. 8TH.—“The more I meditate, the more am I inclined to join them, that I may continue what I have begun, and see where it leads. I feel an internal power grasp me with an iron grip, which seems to assure me that here I shall find what I am in search of.”

OCT. 15TH.—“I have now united with this people; and, if I understand what I have to do, I must make a stand, in myself, against that nature of lust, of malice, of deceit, and of pride, which I inherit jointly with the rest of mankind. I will make such a stand! Father help me.”

OCT. 30TH.—“I don’t feel much success yet, in standing against my interior weaknesses; I feel I haven’t cleaned out the sanctuary, so I will bring to light every sin I know of, and see the effect.”

Nov. 5th.—“Marvel of marvels! I begin to feel an extraordinary internal power, which enables me to turn my thoughts from evil, and to steadfastly contemplate good. I will throw my all on this work! I begin to see my way! This new power is bringing to light all the sins of my life! I will give myself up to this influence! I will strenuously exert myself to get free from sin, and from the very nature of it! What a marvelous work! I am amazed! I will humble myself even to the dust, O God, in thy presence. Oh, help Thou thy servant!”

Dec. 1st of the year following, this entry appears:

“Oh, what is this within my soul,
That seems to make my passions dead?
A flow that o’er me seems to roll
Like liquid fire from heaven shed!
It is a subtle piercing flame,
That makes me labor into life;
That gives me power o’er all my shame,
And brings me lasting peace, for strife.
Shekinah of the soul!
Golden glory, tho’ unseen!
Move in me, take control,
Abide my soul within.
Oh, this sweet communing
With the heavenly powers above!
Oh, this is ever tuning
My heart to sacred love!”

THOMAS I. STROUD.

Love Omnipotent.

No dark’ning frowns, no boding fears,
When love confronts the foe;
But cheeks still wet with passion’s tears,
With friendship’s smile shall glow.

Hate is the moonless, starless night,
Where gleams no dawn of day;
Love is the morning, glowing bright,
That charms dark night away.

Hate dreams of lands beyond the sky,
Where kindred furies are;
Love tells of fairer homes on high,
And waits to guide us there.

Hate cannot curb the human will,
When passion arms the foe;
It may Love’s sunny fountains still,
But cannot make them flow.

When human wit, and human art,
Where Hate inspires are vain,
Yet Love, but touch the stony heart,
And foes are friends again.

Then let us soothe each stubborn will,
Till with our own it blend,
And love our every foe, until
Love makes him all our friend.

A Search for God’s Peculiar People.

I find in the Religio-Philosophical Journal, two searches instituted, one after God, the other after God’s people—his peculiar people—the latter of which, elicited the following:

S. S. JONES: Dear Friend—I am a reader of your paper; and my humble and devout prayer is, that the ever-living and true God, who is Spirit, the great architect of the Universe, whose ways are past finding out, the prime cause of all effects, whom no man hath seen, nor can see, and who will still continue to elude the “Search after God” of poor Friend Frances and all other created and subordinate intelligences; may he overrule and aid you in the work assigned you, and all other laudable and honorable pursuits in the way of progression.

I see in the last number another “Search after God’s people” instituted from St. Joseph, Mo., by Edward Abner Davis. This is one of the best and most progressed productions of the age. This search, please allow me to predict, will prove a perfect success; unless, however, the eyes of the dear man, like many of his fellows, be hopelessly blind by the God of this world, while that of Friend Frances’ “Search after God” has done, and will continue to do untold good; believing that all things are working together, and must, and will continue to work under the supervision of Divine Providence for the elevation, purification and ultimate happiness of the race.

We are now living in the morning of the great Sabbath of the world, in which man, who is a figure of him that was to come, and who is male and female in the image and likeness of Him that made him; for the work of multiplying hath begun to cease from his own works (procreation) as God did from his, both on Sunday. The work of the old world was finished on Sabbath; the work of the new world will be finished on Sabbath also, and is now in a marvelous state of progression. Just look at the surrounding co-operation of the signs and facts of the times; and let all parties hasten conditions preparatory to honorably and profitably meet coming events.

God’s people—his peculiar people—under the hallowed influence of the laws of the spirit of life, entered into the work of cleansing the temple under the auspices of the American government, formed themselves into a body in the way of holiness in the year 1792, precisely upon the same principles of the primitive pentecostal church; who first became pure, then peaceable. This important event proves, first, that E. A. Davis could not find “God’s people—his peculiar people”—where he sought for them, for the simple reason, that the son of perdition still held the temple. Second, that Christ does not, will not, and cannot dwell in a dirty house or temple, for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are. Third, that Christ has returned the second time without sin. Fourth, that the days were shortened, and that too, for “God’s peculiar” people or elect sake, 208 years; and let the members of this heaven-born association thank the Lord, that they are now no longer under the painful necessity of praying “Thy kingdom come,” for they now move and live in harmony with the general assembly and church of the first born that are written in heaven; and now preach and sing the fact, that now is come salvation and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ; and claim to be an association of incarnate spiritualists of the pure, unadulterated, primitive Christian stamp, and are now living in some of the very houses, and enjoying some of the very fruits, of some of the very vineyards, that God told the prophet Jeremiah, his peculiar people should build and plant, together with the hundred fold, that Jesus told Peter his peculiar people should hold and enjoy, and this is the only order of people under the heavens, that ever did, or can possess the hundred fold of houses and lands, etc., with the title to a happy future existence in consideration of their sacrifices for Christ’s sake and the Gospel.

Dear friend Davis, like good old Nathaniel, come and see—see God’s peculiar people, a people to be wondered at, a company of virgins, both old and young together, whom the prophet saw go forth in dances, led on and governed by the same Prophets, both he and she, the true antitype of Adam and Eve, the Lord our righteousness.

Come, and see, and judge for yourself, for “ye shall return and discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not; for by their fruits ye shall know them.”

Your friend,

G. H. RUNYON.

Life in God.

We cannot change God. The great benefit of prayer consists in the possibility of changing ourselves, and coming into harmony with heaven.

We cannot commune with God without sincerity; we cannot ask His aid without the purpose of doing right; thus by continual prayer we accustom ourselves to seriousness, devotion and truth. In this way, we gradually attune ourselves into the love of righteousness, truthfulness, and the love of our fellow-beings. When in harmony, or conjunction with the grand Luminary, we receive the rays direct, just as the sun shines on our bodies, when no clouds intervene; spiritually we feel the influx creating a congenial influence; the divine rays permeate our souls; our bodies sympathizing and partaking; the whole man becomes homogeneous under the benign influence. In a large assembly, all fervently engaged in prayer, the united spirits produce a powerful force for good; we may say, almost irresistible; thus, all engaged are partakers of the common good, enjoying the benign benediction.

In a city of infidels, their spirits can be felt, and become oppressive; like a black cloud overshadowing earth, portending calamity, the sympathy of evil with evil gives the painful idea of history, how large cities become so desperately wicked! The youth and children breathing the contagion, grow up, and fill the decimated ranks in the polluted and besotted precincts of vice and misery. For this reason the saints should make a united effort, joining their feelings and blending their souls in holy invocation; beseeching the heavens to give us their powerful aid in withstanding and staying the torrents of earth!

Love, among God’s people, is an abounding and abiding treasure, on which the members are continually drawing, and the stores thus drawn, are paid out and add to the circulating medium; in this way a united blessing is continually going the rounds.

How long, may we ask, before the general practice of the divine attributes will convince men and women of the potent efficacy of choosing the good and of refusing the evil? Good universally produces good, and will, in the last practitioner, to the endless ages of eternity, causing unceasing happiness! And evil will, in the same ratio, produce its kind, propagating misery and unhappiness, so long as people continue to be willing devotees to a life of wretchedness!

Strange! yea, very strange, why people cannot see and feel the consequences of sin, and return and make choice of a righteous life!

We appeal to the consciences of men and women, if they have not felt a blessing in the practice of the divine nature; and condemnation in a sinful life?

Men and women, in their normal condition, can bear testimony to these unfulfilling facts; in speaking the truth, the simple truth, the man is satisfied; he feels he is right, has done right to his fellow-being, and all will be right in their future intercourse and transactions; and cannot possibly harm anybody in the divine precincts of truth; but, like a ray of light, truth passes directly on through the consciences of men, to its destination. If all the conditions and intercourse of human beings were predicated on truth, the results would be just, satisfactory, and harmonious.

Justice is nearly allied to truth, and may be said to be concomitant; every person feels that he or she should have justice, or their rights in every transaction, and are not satisfied without it; in the common relations among men, every man, in speaking, writing and conversation, wishes to be reported truthfully; so in commercial transactions, he wants full weight and measure, and also the quality, good of its kind; to be delivered punctually as stipulated, at the time and place, in good condition. And it may be said that traffic, or commerce of the world, is predicated on the amount of justice obtained in it, at the time of the importation or exportation. When the parties act in justice, according to the dictates of conscience, the machinery of commerce moves smoothly, carrying the articles of exchange safely into the port of destination; the same honest performance in overland exchanges produce the same good results, leaving no just cause for accusation.

In order that human beings shall do their duties faithfully to each other, it is absolutely necessary that they should keep in a normal condition; no artificial excitements; nothing of any kind, to throw the physical or mental faculties out of equilibrium or balance; these conditions will require total abstinence from all alcoholic and stimulating drinks; also, of the narcotics, and every other substance calculated to confuse the mind.

Truth and justice, in their externals of ownership, seem to come up only to the judiciary, of which law takes cognizance; we must have something deeper; the holy Saviour said, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye should love one another." This higher law covered the whole Mosaic, having a large margin over, on all sides; calculated to take in and shelter all conditions and wants of society. There were many pains, aches and wants in the human family, which the preceding laws did not reach; but the compassionate Lord Jesus alleviated these by the introduction of love into the economy of life, both physical and metaphysical: It was "more blessed to give than to receive; from him that would borrow, turn not away;" the second coat had to supply the neighbor's want and comfort; poor and needy, the sick and infirm, every degree of want and necessity were supplied by love. Love is full of sympathy and kindness; has compassionate tears for the afflicted and distressed, in the most loathsome form; love has a way to alleviate all the distresses of suffering and mourning humanity. Love institutes "Peace on earth and good will to man." "Love worketh no ill to its neighbor." It is the sovereign remedy for all wars, combats, contentions and strifes in the human family; the heart once full of love, there remains no disposition to discord of any kind; the children of earth could and should greet and embrace each other in the arms of love!

"My Kingdom," said the Lord Jesus, "is not of this world, if it were, my servants would fight." Strange, passing strange, that professing Christians have never come to the knowledge of this most important truth; but still continue the most diabolical and scientific modes of wholesale murder! and at the same time kindly and coolly make preparation to be merciful and compassionate, after the atrocious deeds are accomplished. O wonderful Christians! Why not at first heed the voice of God, "Thou shalt not kill!" And of the compassionate Lord, "Love thine enemy, do good to them that persecute you and despitefully use you." These are the laws of the Christian. Murderers are not Christians.

WM. N. REDMON.

Our Picnic Hymn.

Hail to the Gospel, in union cementing,
Hearts that are loving, together in one;
Hail to the voice from the pure heart ascending,
Heavenly Father, thy pleasure be done.
Here with the skies shining brightly above us,
Here from the green grove and wild flowers around,
Here to the father and mother who love us,
Let our glad voices to Heaven resound.

Light as the zephyr that's whispering lowly—
Fleeting as Summer clouds flying above—
Earth, are thy grandeur and fame to the holy;
Time, are thy pleasures compared to our love.
We are united as sister and brother;
Golden the chords that encircle our heart;
Living and loving, for God and each other,
Heaven uniting what man cannot part.

Groves where the frost, and the wintry winds never,
Blight on their vesture of beauty bestow;
Flowers, whose fragrance is living forever,
Bloom but to welcome us whither we go.
Light be our hearts as the merry birds singing,
Anthems of praise as they hasten away;
Glad be hereafter, our memory clinging
Fondly to thoughts of our union to-day.

Christianity

"Should be a brotherly bond of friendship connecting all duties and regulations for spiritual and temporal interests, and uniting all mankind into one social bond of union."

CHRISTIAN GOVERNMENT.

"The reigning system of Christianity ought to have been a true and pure theocracy—religion ought to have settled all disputes among Christians, and not the judiciary tribunals. The elders as Shepherds, as Fathers, should correct faults with energy and love; and promote, by their own examples, the cause of virtue and good conduct."

SUCCESS IN CHRISTIANITY.

"Whoever pursues Christian principles diligently, will obtain the Kingdom of God; for that cause cannot come to nothing, nor be always oppressed, which a number of truth-loving souls persevere in through life and death."

TEST OF RELIGION.

"The purer the principles of religion are, the more strictly will it promote the welfare of community; and this is the most true and infallible test of the present religious societies."

OPPOSITION TO TRUTH.

"The more obstinate and stubborn a man or a nation is disposed towards principles of righteousness, the more severe and the longer will they have to bear their judgment, and suffer their loss, and, consequently, will arrive later at the goal of redemption from error."

"The interior of humanity must become the exterior, and all its abilities and faculties must be manifested and unfolded."

"Many a good fruit grows in a hard shell. Everything begins small, and whatever is true, ends great."

"The spirit of the age abhors needless works of vanity and self-interest."

"The career of time advances, and the will of God is fulfilled in defiance of the contumacy of men; and the more they engage in controversy and opposition, they reciprocally and gradually, among themselves, smooth off their ragged sides and corners, until finally the truth is acknowledged, and the social life is granted to be the best and the most advantageous."

"To test the principles of any party whatever, either political or religious, we must enquire: Do they tend to the promotion of human happiness?"

"Many enthusiasts, by their fanciful ideas, and fine-spun speculations, have formed to themselves a heaven, and a kingdom of God, which nowhere, in reality exists, and is nowhere to be found, excepting in their heated imaginations."

"Mistaken men try to arrange affairs with God, before becoming reconciled with their fellow creatures, by whom they are surrounded."

"That religion is at one with God which makes its possessor first pure then peaceable."

"Christianity is the salt of the earth; and humanity needs salt rubbed in to keep it from spoiling."

"All deeds done to our fellow men not wrought in love, are a curse to humanity—they are murderous."—Selections from Geo. Rapp.

WE learn from the Western Star, Lebanon, O., that our Union Village friends have inaugurated a Lyceum for home interests and individual improvement. We should be pleased to hear the declamations.

THERE is an association in N. Y. city which is organizing under the impression that cooperation is to be the saviour of the nineteenth century. They claim to have received this impression from the welfare exhibited by those of us who are denying to ourselves, the selfishness which acts detrimentally to human interests. We doubt their willingness to let self-denial prove a success in their work of cooperation.

Keep Doing.

Perhaps there has never been a time in the history of our race when there was so much need of true, earnest workers as at present. As patient, loving parents await the growth and development of children, hearing with the foibles of childhood and youth, guiding, instructing, reproving and holding them in check through the period of young, immature life; and, as the husbandman watches the growth of his fields and gardens, and anxiously, yet patiently, waits for the glad harvest-time when he can gather from the seed sown, a large increase; so have the Eternal Parents of the Universe watched and waited for the growth of the race; every part of God's creation has been growing, changing from grosser to higher forms of life, and is becoming more sublimated.

During the last two decades, it would seem that all things have combined, throughout the realms of mind and matter, to hasten the fulfillment of the visions of ancient seers, who, touched by inspiration's holy wand, and warmed by the celestial fires which are kept burning continually on the altars of truth in the inner worlds, pointed to a golden age, a millennial period, when truth would displace error, and light would dispel darkness, and when there would be a gathering together of the saints, who should build cities and inhabit them, plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them. Intellect has been quickened; mines have been penetrated, and, by the aid of man's intelligence, have poured forth their treasures of wealth—gold, silver, iron and coal—by means of which, facilities for travel, trade and commerce have been increased many fold. Moral, as well as physical forces have worked powerfully to aid in removing great wrongs which existed in the American nation. War, although direful and demoniac in its nature, grappled the slave power, and severed the chains so strongly riveted. It may take a generation to efface the bruises and scars that chattel slavery has left upon its subjects, but its power is broken. The nation passed through a severe ordeal—a deadly contest; but, perhaps, it was the only remedial agency that could have reached the disease which, like a cancer, was gnawing at the vitals of the nation.

The heavens have also been opened; Angels from the interior, spiritual world have descended to earth, and mortals who were the most spiritually progressed went forth to meet them with a joyful welcome. Others, less progressed, whose mental and spiritual vision was beclouded, because of their strong love of, and attachment to, outward natural things, have stood doubting, halting, between diversified opinions. While yet another class is strongly allied to sensuality, yet boast of intellectual attainments and scientific knowledge, but includes lovers of pleasure derived from the sensuous appetites on the low, animal plane of existence, deride and scoff at God's messengers sent to teach the higher truths; and such, if convinced at all of inter-communings between Angels and mortals, must be met by gross manifestations through ponderous, material objects.

But, Oh, the change, the mighty change, that has been wrought in Christendom, in the thoughts, in theology, and in the modes of reasoning. True, the effect upon life has not been practically what may be desired; but coming events are casting strong shadows before.

New truths have never found favor with the masses. Persecution has always been a concomitant of newly-revealed truth in all ages. The prison, the faggot, and the rack, have stood to defy the progressive powers, and the agents of those powers, to keep them from doing. But, when the heavens have opened, and spirits have descended to earth as messengers of truth, whether in form of a dove, or in the semblance of a pillar of fire, or of the word of testimony, which proceeds out of the mouths of saints, there is an opposing spirit which makes war with those who have the testimony of Jesus, which is not only a spirit of prophecy, but also a swift witness against all works of iniquity. There have always been those who, Gideon-like, have triumphed over the dark powers of the beast and his image, which came up from the bottomless pit of unsubdued passions, who would not league with them; and though the arm of civil power was raised against them, and sentence of death was passed upon them, they loved God and his truth, and feared Him more than mortal power that was only able to kill the body; and they kept doing until they were cut down by the hand of persecution, and other media came forth in their places. Truth has lived and worked its way from age to age, and now we have outgrown the old and grosser forms of persecution, and we do not fear the prison nor the flame; but, to-day, the same spirit works in a more subtle way; and were it not that spiritual media are numerous, and the influx of spirit power so universal, flooding the land with light, and the proofs of their mission so strong, the force of popular public opinion would be the guillotine of to-day, and the reputation of the subjects of new increasing light would be suspended from a scaffold which priest and laity would unite in building, as for the old against the new.

The grosser forms of persecution intensified the zeal of the martyrs, but the subtle agencies of the present time are more to be feared, because the opposing spiritual forces in the unseen worlds lend their aid and stimulate the opposing forces in those who are still in the material form.

It would seem that this is pre-eminently a time for work; the field of labor is large, and let everyone keep doing; if but little be accomplished in the right direction, that little is better than nothing, and better than inaction.

The Seers and Sages, Prophets and Martyrs of the past, to you we will sing requiems of praise, and render thanks, while we pledge ourselves not to stone or kill the Prophets of to-day, but with them work—for God and humanity. Keep Doing. A. DOOLITTLE.

 The R. P. Journal has intimated so strongly that J. M. PEEBLES was the author of "The Moral Aspects of Spiritualism and Shakerism," in the July No., 1871, that we here give it authoritative denial.

Peace-Making and Thankfulness.

BY F. W. EVANS.

As a people, we have much whereof to be glad, in our present relations to "the world" without. Like all Reformers and Prophets, we have had to pass through the stereotyped phases of opposition to the introduction of a new system of thought and action among mankind.

Ridicule and contempt have had their day; active persecution, legal and illegal, injuring person and property have passed, and are no more. Misunderstanding of our principles, objects and hopes, remain, to give rise to the slanders and misrepresentations, as the present form of opposition to Shakerism (whatever that may be or mean), is what we have to depend upon as the "seed of the Church," so far as evil is the agency.

Thankfulness is our predominant feeling (as a people) for present relations to those without. This civil Government is the only one upon earth that would be civil to so radical an organization as Shaker Communities.

All the "Church and State" persecutions, for the last two thousand years, have been for some one or more of the principles of Shaker, religious faith. "It is the Lord's doings" that so just and untheological a Government as that of the United States exists to-day. It has no theology; may it ever so remain: a home for all peoples, nations, kindreds, and tongues; where they can meet upon terms of perfect equality, so far as theological rights are concerned. The believer in one God, in no personal God, in three, or a thousand Gods, are all equal before the Law. This is a great and glorious blessing; "extend it, then," until all of earth's inhabitants are accountable to each other for their works alone; leaving all matters of belief or unbelief to be settled between themselves and their own consciences. This will never prevent those of similar faith, in any views or principles, from gathering together as they list.

As an evidence of the growing good will towards the Shaker, I quote from a letter just received: "I am a stranger to you, but I know your people and your principles. Your ways are ways of purity and peace; and you have good reason to be glad. There are few people among the learned in the world, who do not envy you, and long for such a fraternal feeling as exists among you. It is plain to the worldly mind that you exemplify your belief by your works." After stating that he is a Methodist, he says: "I have not yet felt the power of the spirit of religious worship so sublime in any Methodist Church as I have in the simple Shaker Meeting House. Many people in the world would have a different opinion of Shakerism, if they could become 'pure in heart;' without that, no one is allowed to partake of that spirit that has sustained the United Society called Shakers, for so many years. My love to your Church." Mass. * *

From Minn: "Kindest of Friends, F. W. Evans, I wish to take the "Shaker" another year; the truths therein contained do me much good. I have been used to introduce truths new to many minds by its circulation; remember me in your highest aspirations for good."

From New York City: "I enclose one dollar, to renew my subscription for two copies of that Christ-like publication; for certainly, if the mission of Christ was to bring Peace and Good-will amongst men, teachings and example are a practical exemplar of his mission. The Christian Clergy preach peace, but there is no peace where they are; the Shakers have peace in all their borders. The little paper is good, and is necessary to let your light shine before men; and, like the sun, it only needs circulation to do so. Mormonism, which is the very contrary of Shaker Christianity, appears to be going down to hell. Its prototype is Judaism, and is of the earth, earthy and animal; but Shakerism is spiritual, and of the spirit, and must live forever here and hereafter. Every brother and sister in every Shaker family, should write articles for publication in the Shaker.

"Is not the Christian world, so called, a horrible spectacle of crime, vice and suffering, in every department of civilized life? Prisons, jails, penitentiaries, murders, swindling, frauds, falsehoods, villainies of every kind, mental and physical! I do not see much of real Christianity in this city, though there is abundance of preaching. If your people could see the worrying, fretting and quarreling, contention and crime, and evils of all kinds, in the Christian civilization, so called, they would bless Providence that there is a home of peace."

These are a sample only of what we receive, going to prove that the Protestant world are coming to look upon the Shaker institution in a true light—a medium of temporal and spiritual good to the nation in which it is located that the people thereof cannot afford to do without.

In the State of Maine we have a little society who wish to change their location, but the people around are unwilling to part with them. Jesus said, "Ye are the salt of the earth." If this be so the salt should be kept in good ~~and~~ and the two should be in proper relation with each other.

There is plenty of room for all the Shaker communities that people can be found willing to establish and support; and so far from "running the world out," as used to be charged, the extension of the Order, and its influence upon the reproducing people, is all that will keep the race from destroying themselves by population-checking practices, such as are known as the "Social Evil," or by war (civil and national) that always grows therefrom.

Here is a copy of a letter from one young believer at home to another one in England:

"MOUNT LEBANON, Jan. 7, 1871.

"DEAR BROTHER JAMES—Almost three months have passed since I wrote to you. They have gone very fast, as I have been quite busy all the time. Our religion is decidedly practical, and therefore requires practical work. The teachings of the first founders of our system inculcated that principle in a most remarkable degree. One of the counsels of Mother Ann was: 'Put your hands to work, and your hearts to God.' And so we do. We work, not only because we like to do it, not only because we love one another, and, therefore, want to help and assist one another, but because we see the God-principle in it. God is love; and true love is active—active in self-sacrificing and devoted work for the good and happiness of others.

"During the short season you staid here, you went with us through our daily occupations; they are, of course, very different now from what they were then, in the fall. Perhaps you would like to hear a little about them. In the winter we pass the most of our time in our shops. Only a few favored ones, the happy farmers and teamsters, are still out, drawing their logs and bringing home the wood that you are coming to help us saw and split next spring. I fear they would not think much about the favor of a day like this, when the mercury stands 20 below zero in a Fahrenheit thermometer, and the north wind would call forth thrifty colors on their cheeks. Such a clear, beautiful day you could never see on that foggy little island of yours, so you had better leave it, as soon as you can, and come over here.

Now we will go through the shops; we have many such to answer our needs. Here is our printer at work, that old brother you remember, with a little bent body and the active speculative mind. Here is our carpenter, with his lumber and chips; a great heap of the latter, showing that he has done a good deal of work. Here, among all this machinery and iron-ware, is our comfortable looking little blacksmith. His enviable business is to mend all that the rest of us break, and to fix all that we put out of order. Do you wonder that his face is so bright, and his smile so pleasant, when you know that he has had so many good opportunities to practice patience and other Christian virtues? Then come the shoemakers, in two shops, both full of sunshine. In the one dwells that venerable old brother, with the silvery hair; he who cut the carrot seed swifter than any of the rest of us. In the other, we feel the inspiring influences of more youthful powers devoted to a holy cause. While we speak about the shoemakers, it comes quite natural to think of the tailors. Well, the sisters are our tailoresses, and they are excellent ones too, as this is about all they do. There are two more shops that we have not yet visited; one of them is the broom shop. Do you remember, Wilbur, that tall young brother with the open countenance and the bright eyes? He is our broom-maker, and he turns out a good many every day. Now there remains only the seed shop: that is a very important place. If you only had known how much trouble we take about those seeds you helped us gather in last fall, you would have considered more than once before going to England. When we have got the seeds thrashed and well cleaned, we take them to the shop and put them up in little paper bags to send to our customers. What a job that is! One cuts the bags, another folds them, a third one prints, a fourth one pastes them, a fifth one put in the seed, a sixth seals them up, a seventh puts them in the boxes and off they go, to our great rejoicing. One more has to go and collect the money for them, and that is the worst of all.

Now, what do you think of all this? I do not know how my description may appear to you; but I do know that the reality is very pleasant, very beautiful to me, to us. Our system stands unequalled. The spiritual man never yet arrived to a higher plane. The natural man never will understand it. When you come to taste its sweets, you will be heartily welcomed by all of us, and especially by your friend and brother,

EMIL BRETZNER.

EDITOR OF "THE SHAKER:—Presuming that "THE SHAKER," being liberal as well as radical, will permit defense as well as attack, oblige me by inserting this:

1. Among the nations, the Israelites were the most advanced in spiritual growth and receptivity.

2. Jesus, of preternatural birth, was the acme or culmination of that growth.

3. A highly-organized person has all the phrenological organs well balanced; the basic, or sensuous, being under perfect control of the superior or spiritual organs.

4. Jesus, being the acme of the spiritual growth of a peculiarly chosen people, the nation of nations, was the Man of men and, therefore, of necessity, must have been most highly organized and constituted, and so was well balanced from his childhood.

5. A child having all its organs well balanced, being highly organized and constituted, and, being under the best moral and spiritual training, especially the training by angels and holy spirits, will not sin.

6. Jesus, I think, was preëminently such a child.

7. Therefore, in my opinion, Jesus DID NOT SIN, neither was guile found in his mouth or heart.

Thine, for justice,

PROPHETIC ORDER versus ORGANIZATION.

Progress implies imperfection, or unattained perfection, in an individual, or in a body. Prophecy is based upon the idea of progress. Now, as the last and greatest of Jewish Prophets was Jesus; and even his "testimony" is affirmed to be "the spirit of prophecy" itself; the conclusion is logical, that the organizations resulting from his teachings and precepts, were not a finality, but that prophecy and progress were still the law, not less than the hope of humanity; consequently the disintegration of Christian organizations has been as uniform as their formation down through the ages, and is still more potent and actively operative to-day, than at any previous period of mundane history.

The first spiritual conference organized in New York, by Partridge, Brittan, Benning, Gray, Halleck, and others, was itself a protest against all organizations, not even a chairman being in order. Babel buildings are falling before the angel of Spiritualism; the Prophet—SHAKER CHURCH—alone remains in the land, to witness the dissolution of all things—the overthrow of kingdoms, nations, peoples, tongues, and Churches—upheaval, "turning things upside down."

THE PROPHET.

Who is the Prophet? and whence does he derive his almighty power and authority, that he alone remains, amid "the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds?" The Prophet, before whom kings tremble, and become as suppliants. "Pray for me, that the things which thou hast spoken come not upon me," is the voice of the despotic tyrant no less than of the necromancer. Samuel the Prophet made and unmade kings in Israel.

When Benhadad, king of Syria, was sick, "he sent Hazael to Elijah, a Prophet in Israel, to inquire of the Lord, taking with him forty camels' burthen of every good thing in Damascus," as a present, and received for answer, "Thou mayest certainly recover, but the Lord hath shewed me, that thou shalt surely die." He then informed Hazael that he would become king of Syria, and what he would do in Israel. To Saul, Samuel said, "The Lord sent me to anoint thee king over Israel." Again: "Anoint Hazael to be king over Syria, Jehu king over Israel, and Elisha to be Prophet in thy room."

David also was thus anointed king. The Prophet Moses "poured oil on Aaron's head, and anointed him high priest." The higher law in Israel was, that no king, or high priest, was equal in power to, or safe from being supplanted in office through, the order of Prophets. Could anything be more pertinent than the inquiry, Who is the Prophet, and from what fountain does the spirit flow that the anointing oil typified? This is the more interesting from the fact, that the gift of prophecy was common to the race, and was thus unlike other powers peculiar to the Jewish organization, all of which were exclusive, and made the Jews themselves the most separated and isolated of all people, "dwelling alone, not even being numbered with the nations."

PROPHETIC GIFT UNIVERSAL.

So that a Prophet, when once his character as such was established, was no longer held as belonging to any particular people; but, as we have seen, was sought unto as a representative man, ranking above the officers of all human organizations, however divinely appointed by tutelary deities. It was this conflict of authority between the Prophets and the organizations, that caused the former to be so often stoned and killed. "Which of the Prophets have not your fathers killed, and stoned them who were sent unto them?" "It cannot be," said the iconoclastic Jesus, "that a Prophet perish out of Jerusalem:" and himself did not elsewhere die.

The high priest, king, and priesthood, were "the powers that be," who had been appointed of their God. From that stand-point, what was a Prophet, but a rebel against the existing organization, or a martyr under it? By the law of self-preservation—the first law of nature—did he not deserve to be persecuted and killed?

There were some thirty men, immediately preceding Jesus, each of whom claimed to be "some great one"—the Messiah of the Jews. These had worn out the patience of the Romans, so that Jesus was summarily dealt with. Gamaliel refers to this class as those who had made much trouble, coming to "nothing" but their own dispersion or destruction.

As the mushroom grows out of the dunghill which has hitherto produced only toadstools, so does the true Reformer and Prophet grow out of those elements which had previously produced a crop of spurious or imperfect Prophets and Reformers, for all of whose idiosyncrasies, short-comings, and crudities, he is held responsible. "Save me from my friends," is the fervent prayer of every genuine Reformer or Prophet. The half-way Christian, who cries "Lord, Lord," worshiping Jesus as one of the Three Gods who died to let him live in lust uncondemned, of all others, is the greatest sinner, and the least known of the Christ Spirit

Abraham, the father of the Jewish nation, who, by common consent, is held as the type of Jesus the Messiah, was himself a Prophet and friend of the Hebrew God. He met Melchizedek, who (under the popular ruling) was a heathen; but he was "king of righteousness," a "king of peace," a celibate; being "without father and mother, and without descent, beginning of days, or end of life, made like unto the Son of God (whoever that may be), and abideth a priest continually." In plain English, Melchizedek was a Christian, who had not only been ministered to by the Christ Spirit, from the seventh or resurrection heavens; but he had incarnated that Spirit in his character, and was a "high priest of the Most High God." Unto him, poor heathen Abraham very properly confessed his sins, which thenceforth became an established Jewish ordinance. He also paid the sacrificial tithes to Melchizedek, not only for himself, but for all the Levitical priesthood (yet in his own loins) down to Jesus, his descendant and antetype, who confessed his sins, if at all guilty, to John the Baptist, the Christ Prophet, as did Abraham to Melchizedek; for John was the antetype of Melchizedek, as was Jesus of Abraham.

PHYSICAL WAR CONDEMNED.

Abraham had just returned from the "slaughter of the kings," when Melchizedek, "the king of peace," taught him that war was animal—brutal; and wrong for him, and all that should proceed from him.

It took two thousand years for Abraham to reach that gift of peace in the person of his descendant, Jesus, who, under the law of Prophecy and Progress, became the "Prince of Peace," and was anointed king of righteousness; for "he loved righteousness, and hated iniquity;" and the Christ Spirit also "anointed him with the oil of gladness above his fellows."

CELIBACY.

It is said of Jesus (prophetically), "His life was cut off from the earth, and who shall declare his generation?" he having no physical (or natural) posterity, like Abraham; but, like Melchizedek, he too became a celibate, forsaking his earthly generative relation of father and mother, of brother and sister, for those who knew and did the will of God, this being eternal life, and not confined to earth, made him without descent, beginning of days, or end of life; thus receiving the kingdom of heaven as a little child, precisely as the Shakers of our day commence their spiritual travel.

PRIESTHOOD.

Melchizedek was "made like unto the Son of God." "Thus, after the similitude of Melchizedek, there ariseth another priest, and another priesthood. For Jesus is made a priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek," outside of the Mosaic Law, yet including it as a "schoolmaster," to prepare souls for the Christ Order—the Christian life.

UNIVERSAL CHURCH.

Thus does a ministration from the innermost (or seventh) sphere end the world of generation, physical war, and private property, to all nations, in all times, and in all worlds.

"Jesus was made higher than the heavens" of generation, or the angels in them; from which alone the Jews had received their ministrations. Nor do the generating, war-riving Gentile Christians receive ministrations from any other than generative heavens and hells.

REPENTANCE.

John the Baptist, the greatest of Jewish Prophets, the Melchizedek of his day, who told the soldiers to "do violence to no man," was the minister of baptism to Jesus, who came to him acknowledging the order of confession, as Abraham went to Melchizedek, and as Ann Lee went to James and Jane Wardley.

COMMON PROPERTY.

Melchizedek and John were each a minister of the Christ Spirit, "the second Adam, the Lord from heaven." Abraham paid tithes of his property, thus acknowledging that it all belonged to the Lord. Jesus gave the whole, retaining not anything. "All things commou."

PEACE.

When Abraham and his posterity—all true Jews—did fight, it was as spiritual mediums, always (like Moses and Elijah) depending upon the spirits to slaughter their enemies. But Jesus would not call fire down from heaven, as did Elias, to kill; but learned of the Christ Spirit to do good to all—evil to none; and to be "first pure, then peaceable."

PROGRESSION OF PRIMATES.

From the day that Melchizedek blessed Abraham, the Jews traveled towards Christianity—progressed. As the result of that progress, Jesus, probaby the best of Jewish boys, progressed towards Christianity, until he "saw of the travail of his soul, and was satisfied" therewith, by incorporating it into his character, so that the "prince of this world" found nothing of it in him.

CHRIST ANGEL AND INTERMEDIATE PROPHETS.

The intermediate Prophets, between Melchizedek and John the Baptist, were ministers of the Christ heavens. It was this that raised them above all earthly powers and principalities, above the kings and the holy anointed high priests, and the subordinate priesthood, while acting officially as Christ ministers. But themselves, as men, were often far from being Christians. Even Jesus was not born a Christian, but a Jew; "born of a woman, born under the Law," and had to work out his salvation as have all other men; only he had none but the Christ Spirit to help him after John had baptized him. Hence the Prophet Zechariah says that he was shown, in vision, Joshua—Jesus—the high priest, "standing before the Angel of the Lord (the Christ Angel), and Satan at his right hand to resist him. And "the Lord (Christ Angel) said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan. Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire" (of lust)?

CONFESSION OF SIN.

"If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." "Now (Jesus) was clothed with filthy garments, and stood before the (Christ) Angel. And the Angel spoke to them who stood before him (John and his disciples), Take away the filthy garments from him," by confession; and the Spirit said, "I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment. So they clothed him with garments (a work of time); and the (Christ) Angel of the Lord stood by," to help, and said to him: "If thou wilt walk in my ways, and if thou wilt keep my charge, then thou shalt keep my courts, and judge my house." It was conditional even with Jesus the Messiah, to whom Christ first appeared, to begin the work of human redemption. And we have still the Spirit of Prophecy and the laws of Progress operative unto the second appearing of the Christ Spirit in Woman, as the first had been in Man. That second appearing has been and is often prophesied of.

"Hear, O (Jesus), the high priest, thou and thy fellows that sit before thee (Christians); for they are men wondered at. For, behold, I bring forth my servant, the Branch." "A rod"—Jesus—"shall grow out of the stem of Jesse; and a branch"—Ann—"shall grow out of his roots"—the Gentiles; "and to her shall the gathering of the Gentiles be; and his rest shall be glorious."

"For, behold, the stone—(Branch)—that I have laid before Jesus; upon it shall be seven eyes: behold, I will engrave (by revelation) the engraving thereof, saith the Lord of hosts, and I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day."

"In that day, saith the Lord of hosts, shall ye call every man under his vine, and under his fig tree." There shall be co-operation in the civil Government; and also Communistic elements, out of which shall grow Christian Pentecostal Communities of Gentiles, with "all things common," as the body, and an abiding of the Christ Spirit as the soul, of the Universal Church.

THE MAN JESUS.

Moses was a Prophet of the God of Israel, but he had a vision of the Christ heaven, which was "the (spiritual) mount" and was told to "make all things (in his natural order) after the pattern" of what he saw there; that it might serve as a prophecy of the spiritual order yet to come on the earth, to succeed, include, and supplant himself and Dispensation. Moses said, "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet, from the midst of thy brethren, like unto me; unto him ye shall hearken." Such was Jesus, who came teaching a higher law than the Mosaic—more spiritual.

CHRIST.

Jesus asked, "What think ye of Christ?" "Whose son is he?" They said, "David's." "Why then does David, in spirit, call him Lord?" "How is he David's son?" Now, inasmuch as Jesus never objected to being called the "Son of David," it is self-evident that he knew the Christ Angel to be a distinct person—the second or spiritual Adam—through whose agency he became a "Son of God;" and "to as many other men as receive him, he" and his successors "give the same power to become sons of God."

SPIRITUALISM.

If Paris were a spiritualist, she would comprehend, that, in killing "the Communes" by hundreds, she is increasing their power to injure her; and furnishing them with the strongest motive to use it—vengeance. Can not she read? or is she "drunk with blood?" "How long, O Lord, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood?" asked the martyrs. Until your fellow-servants, the Prophets, that shall be killed, as you were, is fulfilled. In other words, until an infidel Government succeeds the Church and State Governments of Christendom—Republics that are untheological.

THE BRANCH, ANN LEE.

The "Two Witnesses"—male and female—inspired from the Resurrection—Christ—heavens, to "prophecy in sackcloth and ashes, under persecution, during the "1260 years" rule of this "Wilderness" Christianity, closing in 1792, when the untheological civil Government of the U. S. ended the power of Babylon priests to kill the Prophets. Up to this period, the spiritual truths of their testimony had "tormented" the Church-and-State organizations, whether Catholic, Protestant, or Greek, in all of which are interblended War and Peace, Marriage and Celibacy, Riches and Poverty, Churches and Barracks, Monastic Institutions and Houses of Prostitution, Charitable Orders and the Inquisitions of Rome and Naples, Prisons (like the Tombs and Ludlow jail) and a hireling Police, with a hireling Priesthood, under a "One God" and "Three God" system, which prays continually for the second coming of the man Jesus—as Christ—who, now that he has appeared "in ten thousand of his saints," proves to be the English woman Ann Lee; and "to as many as receive her, she" and her successors "give power to become "sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty."

Thankfulness.

"In everything give thanks, for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you."—2 THESS. ii. 18.

Mark the reason why we should be thankful for all things: Because it is the will of God. Let me ask myself this question: Am I thankful for everything? Am I thankful for that which displeases and crosses, as well as that which pleases and comforts me? Do I make a blessing of everything? Do I rejoice when persecuted? Do I pray for my enemies or persecutors? Am I thankful for the opportunity of giving up all for the gospel? Do I thankfully give up my own will, my feelings, words, thoughts, and actions, to be governed by the Gospel, through my accepted Lead? If I do not thankfully give up all these, then I do not give thanks in everything. But I can go farther, and say, that I am not only thankful for the opportunity of giving up all; but that I have done so, and am thankful I have given up Father, Mother, Sisters, Brothers, Wife, and child, with all my relations, and worldly goods; and also that spirit that desires the continuance of such relations; and am ready to give up my own carnal life in all things, and be thankful for the opportunity.

Therefore in everything I give thanks. My particular thanks are due to you, dear Editor, and Correspondents, for the genuine spirit of comfort I derive from "THE SHAKER."

Living Comparisons.

The rolling river as it flows
From glacier fields on high,
Dissolving from the mountain snows,
Like dew-drops from the sky,
Leaps dazzling in the yellow sun,
Rejoicing on its way,
It spans the chasms, one by one,
And crowns them with its spray.

Exulting in its new-born joy,
It bounds from hill to plain;
No heights impede, no depths destroy,
Nor gathering winds restrain.
'Tis thus when dawns the better Way,
With brightness on the soul;
Our hearts will bound like Lambs at play,
Or ocean billows roll.

But as Love's current grows more wide,
More gently will it flow;
Though strong as moves old ocean's tide,
Yet soft as falling snow.
Each golden sun, each silver star,
Swift as its mystic flight,
Moves through the azure fields afar,
Still as the voice of night.

Far down within the bosom deep,
Where minist'ring angels come,
Where faith and hope their vigils keep,
There is devotion's home.
Thence from each pure and trusting soul,
Doth grateful incense rise;
Unspoken, thence heart anthems roll,
That gladden fairer skies.

Pure gospel life is like a stream,
That moves with even tide;
No lightning-flashes o'er it gleam,
No cataracts divide.
But mirror'd in its waters bright,
The smiling stars appear,
Like jewels from the crown of night,
The Angels scattered there.

Thus may the current of our love,
Like some fair river flow;
Though brighter than the skies above,
More deep than seas below.
And while o'er Jordan's rolling stream
The glistening fields we see,
Serene as is an Angel's dream,
May our devotions be.

THE BHAGVAT-GEETA, sent us by The Religious Philosophical Publishing House, is a small, but invaluable work to the student of antiquity. The work is no doubt a Brahmic production; but the curiosity that afflicts one continually, is the wisdom prevailing in it, and to think this was prevalent so many ages ago!

REJOINDER.

In a late number of The Christian Advocate, Dr. Curry, Editor, there was published, as original matter, an article copied from Scribner's Monthly, entitled "SHAKERISM"—reflecting very audaciously and untruthfully upon THE SHAKERS. We wrote the subjoined article in reply, by which the readers of THE SHAKER can judge the Unchristian Advocacy of principles, in the article to which we reply. Our reply was refused publication, and the refusal of the Editor was accompanied by the following remarks:

"It seems to me, you ask very much of us, when you call on us to allow you to defend in our columns a system that convicts our parents, ourselves and our whole people of criminal carnality. You may think your system an eminently spiritual one; we do not, but quite the contrary. * * * Without any wish to shorten your liberties, but still looking upon your system as a bad one, we are content to let you enjoy your peculiar notions," etc. These views are such, that no sincere Methodist, being acquainted with The Shakers, would willingly coincide with. By them we are able to judge what the spirit of intolerance would do with us were we not so favored by the Providential Constitution of the U. S. It would crucify Jesus as readily to-day as ever; and knowing how soon the Constitution of the U. S. would take a sectarian turn, when once the opening wedges of "God" and "Christ" are entered therein, we are unreservedly and vehemently opposed to any amendment that will give the Constitution of the U. S. any theological signification, or that would make it an unfit instrument for the Jew, the Mohammedan, the Christian, the Infidel—of any religion or of no religion. And we warn all, that any sympathy with such amendment, adds weight to the bell that will sound the death-knell of our free government, if it is ever destroyed. Now for the rejoinder:

Shakerism's Defense.

Editor Advocate: In your issue of Dec. 28, is an article entitled "SHAKERISM." To remove prejudices created thereby, and to prevent further misconceptions, we ask your kindly consideration and publication of "SHAKERISM'S DEFENSE." We are well acquainted with the author of "Shakerism" in The Advocate, having harmlessly experienced other intended rebukes and sarcastic lectures upon Shakerism from his pen. We do not blame him—we do pity him—and all others failing of a true comprehension of real Shaker polity. In one of Holland's lectures, he observes: "I believe God loves the Shakers, but I do not think he admires them!" Now, we do not ask admiration of our worship, our dress, nor of our self-denying testimony; but if all good Methodists will love our lives, we will be satisfied with them. In THE SHAKER for last November, we wrote upon "The Difficult Lesson,"—being learned by us, and by us being taught to the world at large. We find Dr. Holland as ignorant of this "Lesson" as the generality of readers, though he has had very favorable opportunities of learning it.

The worshipful exercises, which we permit strangers to witness, we are aware, excite, in the minds of those misunderstanding them, less reverence than we feel; and in the very worldly-minded, mirthful derision; and such would mock the movings of the good Spirit in a Methodist Church, or wherever else manifested. And yet, while many thousands annually visit our meetings, coming, mayhap, with fun in their hearts; still, we believe, the majority "tarry to pray with us" that the right will prevail. Of the continuance of our Public Meetings as a successful missionary enterprise, we have a personal doubt; and while expecting (not announcing) their discontinuance at no distant day, we believe they have done much good.

As in "The Difficult Lesson," we repeat, that the position of the Shakers on the subject of Marriage, is very much misunderstood by even the vulture-eyed philosopher and the lion-hearted reformer.

The two planes of existence we present to the world, both right in their individual spheres, give to marriage all it sacredly demands, and more than it physiologically gets; and at the same time assert that Marriage is an earthly institution only, and does not belong to the spiritual heavens—neither "heaven on earth" according to Christianity, nor heaven "in that world which is to come." No Shaker, having been baptized with fire and the Holy Spirit (and these are what make true Shakers), ever "acknowledged that the society of woman, in the intimate relations of a wife, would be inexpressibly sweet to him," nor many similar assertions in your article on "Shakerism." Any person who does not realize greater blissfulness in being "a cunuch for heaven's sake," is not a Shaker! and if making the profession, is either an infant in the faith, or a designing hypocrite, seeking the "loaves and fishes."

We do "assume (and know), that we live purer lives in the abstinence of marriage," when complying with the injunctions of our faith to chasten every deed, word and thought that would excite sensuality in the flesh! Can you look upon such a system as a bad one?

While we look upon marriage as honorable in its place—yet that place is outside and beneath a Christian life—and those engaged in it as respectable when properly respecting it; yet, to us, there is a sphere as far above the reproductive, as our estimates of heaven are superior to our estimates of earth. Few, if any good Methodists believe that the Angels marry; and can they object if the Shakers pattern the hosts of heaven in this respect? Certain it is, that as individuals approach Angelhood, they are adopting Shaker principles, consciously or otherwise.

The Shakers do look for a reward; but not after the storehouse or hay-stack theory, but in the effects upon their characters, of the causes they engage in; and we realize daily, sufficient reward to repay us for all the cross we endure from the absence of matrimony; hence the cross, so apparent to the devotees of marriage, disappears to the thorough-going Shaker. To the Shaker,

"The pleasures of an earthly life can give no peace of mind;
But the gospel is full recompense for all we leave behind."

"The sweet sinfulness of marriage" is a term we never have used, and bearing as it does the mark of the beast, we will not adopt it.

A man is what he makes himself; whether level with or beneath the brute creation, or as you give us the credit of aspiring, "preëminent among the saints!" By refusing to fall in love with the earthly, and by rising, cheerfully, in love with the Angel-life, we do not "insult our own nor others' parents!" they, under the light of God manifested to them, did rightly; and yet they were (unconsciously) not Christians!

That which was proper before the advent of Christianity, or the adoption of the Christian profession, becomes, in as many respects as the systems differ, very improper afterward; and to full Christians, the elements that would make of us, first, husbands and wives, then fathers and mothers, and necessitate the gathering of private property for the sustenance of all that is "mine," are unchristian elements, however absurd or unpleasant the ideas may be to the mass of professing Christians!

We claim an increase of light beyond the illuminations of our parents; and in the face of this would fall under a condemnation our parents could not know of, should we now do as they have done; and our personal feelings strongly object to the proposition "that our virgin Sisters become Mothers" by any power with which we are acquainted. In these opinions, "the Shaker may be mistaken," but we opine not. The wholesale slaughter of virgin purity, indulged in by the writer of "Shakerism," wherein he styles, it "a damaging thought among the Shakers, celibate priests, monks and nuns," reminds us how wide-spread is sympathy for us, and how sincere are the imitators of the virgin spirit of our Lord.

"Marriage peoples the earth," said the sage, "but Celibacy increases the forces of heaven." While admitting the good of marriage, we as readily assert its corroding effects upon true, spirit growth, and for the acquisition of the superior good, reject its good and bad together. And why find fault with us, and not with our much adored exemplar—Jesus? Dr. H. would not write such scurrilous remarks of the celibate Jesus—why of us?

We hate the selfish spirit of the bachelor worse than he does. If we are engaging in aught that Jesus did not, or which he failed to predict would come to pass, then we are not his followers. We also recognize the heroism displayed by the missionaries of the various sects; while we are positive that carnal men and women will face all other dangers, rather than "crucify the flesh, with its affections and lusts," in their own unregenerate hearts. So far as the inuendo goes, that "marriage would be a greater personal purity on the part of the Shaker," that charge of secret sensuality lost all its force, years ago. The sum is this: Could we enjoy the felicities of matrimony, exceeding the most finely drawn picture of the most exaggerative, sensual novelist; and could we produce offspring as perfect as was Jesus, we should feel no more permission to engage in either, than we now feel, when "incompatibility of temper" is so nearly universal, and when less healthful progeny than cattle is so general. "Our lives are cut off from the earthly," as was our exemplar's; and having transcended the procreative plane, we experience the transmutation of our natural abilities into spiritual relationships.

We judge, Ed. Advocate, that the writer of "Shakerism," if not your honor, has more faith in real Shakerism than he is willing to practice.

By your help we would place this article into the hands of every Methodist, and its substance in the hearts of all liberal thinkers.

Trust in God.

O Lord, in thy temple my soul shall abide;
Though sorely afflicted, in thee I confide;
Though stripes be my portion, intensely to feel,
The hand I will bless, that hath power to heal.
Lord, fashion me, subject to thy righteous will;
Yea, search me, and try me, I will love Thee still.
Deprived of treasures and friends dear to me,
My soul must be saved, and I'll still cleave to Thee.

Though early companions have sought the broad road,

Yet nearer, still nearer, I'll walk with my God!
The way may be narrow, the passage be strait,
Yet the city of God lies through the straight gate;
The weak and world-loving, may quail at the fire,
That's kindled in Zion, for a purifier;
In this cleansing furnace of God I'll be tried,
Though intense be the heat, yet in it I'll abide.

The gold will not perish, though dross be consumed;
The purified only, by heaven are owned;
Prepare me thus Lord, for that rest which remains
For the people of God, without blemish or stain.
In the first resurrection let me have a part;
Impressed be the image of Christ in my heart;
Inspired by Angels with meekness and love,
Endowed with wisdom that comes from above.

O what avails pride, or the pleasures of sin,
Their fruits are all bitter, remembrance a sting!
A justified conscience, a heart that is pure,
Yield pleasures abundant, and these will endure.
Heart and voice all attuned, grateful praises I'll sound,

On the Zion of God, where salvation is found.
Bright Angels bear witness, my vows I renew,
Of a full consecration to God I'll be true.

OTIS SAWYER, ALFRED

Eternal Damnation.

I have experienced much heavenly joy from enlightenment respecting this subject; and believing, dear SHAKER, that what has been so comforting to my own heart will be equally comforting to that of other hungerers after truth, I venture to offer the following remarks.

What a fearful consideration to the feeling heart! The damnation for ever and ever of a human being! It is of the utmost importance that we should comprehend the nature and the consequence of that most awful sin, of which the result is, by many, supposed to be eternal damnation. Let us approach this consideration with feelings of reverent hope.

First, the Evangelists' report of Jesus' sayings on this subject are to be considered. Matthew's account (xii. 22-37) is the fullest. According to him the circumstances were these: Jesus, in a house in Nazareth probably (Matt. xii. 46; xiii. 1; Mark iii. 27, 31), had healed a blind mute. This miracle, no doubt, seemed to him to be sufficient to convince hearts of flint; but the cold and supercilious pharisees and scribes—some of whom had real faith in him, but from self-interest confessed him not (John xii. 42)—sneeringly said that he did those mighty works by means of devils: as some, in this day, say the Shakers at present do their mighty works. As Jesus read these thoughts in their hearts, what bitterness of spirit must have been his! He had not yet overcome (John xvi. 33); he still could feel some human anger. What self-restraint must he have exerted to keep from pouring out upon them his contempt and wrath! But the real bitterness and disappointment of his heart find expression in the cry, 'Ye generation of vipers!' This was uttered in the spirit of John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 7) with a force that must have struck terror into the hearts of those who would not honestly confess their faith in him, but who willfully spoke against their conscience, and who said that his works were of the devil; he denounced on such eternal wrath. Though Jesus had said not long before, 'I am meek and lowly in heart' (Matt. xi. 29), yet had 'the devil left him, for a season' only (Luke iv. 13). When Jesus had overcome, his words were, 'Father, forgive them, they know not what they do.' They knew as little what they did, when they spoke against his spirit, as they knew when they crucified him. What is the meaning of the agony in the garden of Gethsemane, if Jesus did not gain there a great victory over himself? Jesus felt this himself: for, almost immediately after the denunciation, he said (Luke xiii. 30), 'I have a baptism (of fire) to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished.' Are there no souls on the earth who can feel all the anguish of these words?

St. Luke's account of the matter is substantially the same. The only striking point is that, in his gospel, the denunciation is in the wrong place; it is meaningless as it stands, and should be transferred from Luke xii. 10, and placed after Luke xi. 20. No doubt some well-meaning saint of dark times has improved on the evangelist. We must here lament the defects in the gospel records: of the accounts in each, some are defective, others inaccurate. Where there are two, three or four accounts of the same transaction, we must bring them together, being careful to read them all by the greater light of this day, compare them, and extract the truth. Now, St. Mark's account contains a striking qualification. The words are, 'hath never forgiveness,' yet is only 'in danger of eternal damnation.' One would suppose the words 'hath never forgiveness' to mean the same thing as 'eternal damnation'; yet, there come in the strangely qualifying words 'in danger.'

Next, the commentators on the testimony: St. Paul (Heb. vi. 4-8) says of 'those who have tasted of the heavenly gift, if they shall fall away, it is impossible' (so it seemed to him) 'to renew them again unto repentance'; he also says, 'they are like bad soil, and nigh unto cursing.' Again: he says of those who sin willfully after having come to a knowledge of the truth (Heb. x. 26), that 'a fiery indignation,' or literally, 'πυρὸς ζήλος,' a zeal of fire shall devour the adversaries.'

St. John, though his gospel seems to be especially devoted to the spiritual teachings of Jesus, does not mention, in that place, this imprecation by Jesus; but he has a few indefinite words in his general Epistle, which may bear on this subject. He says: 'There is a sin unto death,' and 'I (John) do not say that he (the sinner) ἐρωτήσῃ περὶ ἐκείνης,' may solicit for that.'

Here we have before us all that is contained in the Gospels and Epistles of the New Testament on this subject. It is clear that the sin against the Holy Ghost is committed by three kinds of sinners: by those who, blinded by their own lusts, speak and act against the work of the Spirit; by those who, contrary to the convictions of their conscience and from selfish motives, act in the same way; and by those who, having tasted of the heavenly gift, become barren by willful sin, and thus turn from friends to adversaries.

Jesus said, in a masculine, unqualified way, out of the bitterness of his heart, 'Those who say a word against the Holy Ghost are in danger of eternal damnation.' This Jesus said, and this Peter illustrated, drawing his prophetic power from the spiritual force of Jesus ascended (Acts v. 5). Yet we must observe that though Peter tells Ananias he has lied to the Holy Ghost, and though he prophesies the death of Sapphira, there is no mention of eternal damnation. They both fall physically dead, overwhelmed with terror at the discovery of their sin, merely losing by their misconduct the privilege to work out in Time the work of that day.

Such sudden discomfiture to persons suffering from heart disease would very easily cause death. God, foreseeing the effect of this event on the minds of after ages, suffered it in connection with Peter's words. It is not to be supposed that Ananias and Sapphira thoroughly understood the nature of their sin: even Peter himself had not entered into the depths of love; for, to enter into those depths requires the full light of truth. The words of Jesus, the illustration by Peter, are a manifestation of Power, the Father in God. But, if there be any meaning in the Bride, which, radically, signifies the principles of the Second Church of Christ, then has the present manifestation through her of Love, the Mother in God, softened the criminal's sentence; or, more exactly, has made that sentence clear. So long as any blind their spiritual eyes by lust of any kind, or willfully and selfishly shut their eyes to the light, so long will they exclude themselves from seeing by the light, both in this world and in the world to come; and the more they kick against the pricks of conscience, the more will they lay up for themselves a treasure of wrath.

So far we have dealt with those who, not having entered into the rest of the heavenly kingdom, do, from their external pride and hypocrisy, lose the joys of loving God during the time of their impenitence. But, when a spirit has tasted of the joys of life, and has walked by the light of the Spirit, yet the soul or flesh, from carelessness, or from willful sin, or from the deliberate shutting of the eyes, involves the spirit again in void and darkness, then is such a case very grievous. Oh, what tender pity ought we not to feel for such souls! Through ages on ages will their pride, their vexation of spirit, keep them from again humbling themselves, and from coming to the fold of Christ. During this time their misery will be tenfold enhanced by their knowledge of the permanence of the very principles they deny, by their knowledge of the joys of the cross. But 'a zeal of fire shall devour them; the flames of the love of God (or, of the wrath of God; the sound differs, the word is the same), which burn in conscience, shall blast out of them that nature which keeps them from happiness; and, when they humble themselves, they shall hear the divine words 'thou shalt weep no more: he will be very gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry; when he shall hear it, he will answer thee' (Isaiah xxx. 19). Yet their work will be harder, far greater their agonies in overcoming the nature of sin, than they would have been had they gone straight through in Time. Dear SHAKER, I take the lesson home to myself.

"I want to be forgiving, and to be forgiven."

When we sing these beautiful words, do they find a response within our hearts? and do we practically carry this out in our daily intercourse with our fellow-beings? Are we not all God's creatures? and have we not oftentimes felt the need of forgiveness? "To err is human, to forgive divine," is one of the truest of maxims. How soothing were the sweet words of forgiveness, that fell on the ear of the erring one, who in bitterness of spirit cried, "Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son!" What were those words? "Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet," etc. Again, we pray: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." The question arises, How can our trespasses be forgiven, if we withhold this boon from others? How touching the words of our Saviour, when, in sorest agony, he cried: "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do!" Let us not only sing, "I want to be forgiving," but cultivate a spirit of forgiveness.

An Original Parable, No. 1.

A certain benevolent judge was continually defamed by a wicked and malicious neighbor, who had taken it in head that the good judge was his enemy, and that he intended some day to imprison and torture him during the rest of his mortal life. The judge was anxious to convince the wicked neighbor that he was his friend. That he loved him and wanted to do him good; but the bad neighbor carefully evaded and kept out of his way. Finally the judge called on a poor, honest neighbor to become a mediator, and sent him to the bad neighbor to assure him that he loved him, and greatly desired that he would put away his enmity, which made him so unhappy. You may assure him, said the judge, that love is better than hatred, and that I long to have his soul filled with love, that we may both greatly rejoice together. The judge also sent the bad neighbor divers good gifts by the mediator, to convince him of his benevolent feelings toward him. The mediator plead so eloquently, and set forth his employer's character in such loving terms, that he melted the heart of his neighbor, and being encouraged by the ambassador, he confessed to him all the hard sayings and evil actions he had said and done against the good judge. Come, said the mediator, go with me and see the truth of my words, and feel the love and blessing there is in his friendship. They went and had a most joyful meeting and the atonement (at-one-ment) was complete. Their friendship grew into perfect love and so ever remained.

NOTE.—The view given in this parable, of the doctrine of atonement, supposes God to be unchangeably good, and that the reconciliation is effected by a necessary change in man's understanding and affections.

But this is not the orthodox view, that will be given in

PARABLE NO. 2.

There was a certain stern and inexorable judge, who plumed himself on the inflexibility of his justice, boasting that he let no transgressor escape vindictive punishment. He had a neighbor who hated and maliciously defamed him. The judge had the culprit arrested and found guilty of a penitentiary crime, and sentenced him to imprisonment for life. The judge had a son, a very benevolent young man who thought the sentence was cruel and unjust. He besought the judge to be merciful to the offender and remit his punishment, saying, he believed he could, by reasoning and persuasion, convince him of his error and bring about an atonement. The merciless judge insisted that the convict had violated the eternal principles of justice, and nothing would satisfy its demands but the vindictive punishment of the offender or his substitute. And said he, young man, if you are sincere and interested in saving that wicked wretch from deserved punishment, you may just take his place and suffer the full penalty of law in his room and stead. So that vindictive justice is satisfied, I care not who pays the penalty. The humane, kind-hearted young man replied: Well I am sure that I am in a condition which enables me to bear the punishment much better than my poor offending neighbor, and if you cannot show mercy nor forgive, you may punish me and let him go free. This blind judge could not see that eternal justice would be more violated by punishing the innocent and letting the guilty go free, than to pardon the guilty and let him go free without punishing the innocent; therefore he accepted the good young man's offer, threw him into prison and made him suffer the full penalty of the bad man's sentence.

Orthodoxy says the son was killed, sent to hell, staid three days and was then let off and restored to life. Reader, which of these judges do you like best?

GOOD FRIENDS OF THE SHAKER: Look out for the pamphlet soon to be issued, from the pen of J. M. Peebles, entitled: "Spiritualism, Shakerism and Free Religion,—which?" There will be hundreds of copies ordered in advance. We want ten.

Who feels interested in the approaching centennial anniversary of Shakerism in America? What do you suggest as a fitting testimonial? How shall the 6th of August 1874 be celebrated?

The Spirit of Intolerance.

It is a common error to believe that intolerance was abolished when the feudal system was swept away or crushed by the invective of a Calvin, a Luther, or a Knox. It exists at the present time with as much force, and is as practical in its results, as when the bold baron rode forth with his armed retainers to levy and slay with all the grim ferocity of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; is just as strong as when Rogers, and Ridley, and Crummer, sung their hymns of praise amid the blazing pile and the hootings of their persecutors, or when Salem judges sent innocent women to the stake. The intolerant baron lives still; he is not mounted upon a barbed steed or clad with steel, nor does he hold the lance ready to enforce his demands; his charger is a "hobby," his armor respectability, and his lance the tongue, the pen, or the purse. Unlike his prototype of the twelfth century, the feudal chief of the nineteenth urges on his retainers from behind the barriers of the journal, or the statute book, instead of leading them on in person and showing a courageous example. The same judges, in spirit, that condemned reformers and witches to the stake, still breathe in our midst. Filled with wise saws and armed with glib tongues, they prate of civilization, free speech, free press, and kindred blessings; declare with emphasis that they love mankind, that is, those that love them, and believe as they believe. Precepts so harmonizing and tolerant are scattered broadcast, yet the authors, by their own lives, belie the words they utter.

Intolerance is part of the human system, as it is also an indication of strength. It drove the Huguenots from France, and the Puritans from England, as did the same elements drive the Quakers from Massachusetts and the Mormons to the desert of Utah. The same story is repeated over and over again through history, sacred and profane, and is being and will be repeated while the human race exists. The strong are born to crush the weak, unless the growth of the latter be so rapid as to defy the efforts of the former.

Keep theology out of the Constitution of the U. S., or this "Spirit of Intolerance" will throw off its mask, give the Constitution a sectarian name, and wage war on those who will not bow down to it. *

Community of Intellect.

Come down all ye high, and ye lofty in Mind,
And mingle with kindred of lower pretense;
Give each one a share of your wealth, more refined,
And serve each a banquet of love and good sense.

Then reach down in mercy, and lift up the lowly,
And cause them to feel that you love them indeed;
Your mental refreshments, then loving and holy,
Will prove a sweet season, from vile passions freed.

Then dwell altogether, and mingle your talents,
By blessing each other, and each being blest;
No one is found wanting when weighed in the balance,
For each, of this heavenly food is possessed.

Then here is the Sisterly, Brotherly kindred—
Community holy, that Heaven will own;
The heights and the depths are in harmony blended,
Cemented by love, to the heavenly throne.

ISAAC BEALS, U. Village, O.

The Practical and the Beautiful.

The Divine creations and their attending laws are all in harmony with each other. This is a necessary corollary from the fact of the existence of the Supreme and Infinite Creator. The Infinite must be in harmony with himself. There can be no infinitely disturbing cause. Whatever apparent discord there is, therefore, can be so only to the finite mind. The All-Wise and All-Good is—

"From seeming evil still educing good,
And better thence again, and better still,
In infinite progression."

As viewed by the finite mind, there are infinite degrees of ascending life. The student of Nature has more than a glimpse of this truth wherever his observations extend. All degrees of life are correlated, having a necessary connection with each other, though this connection, in many instances, may not be perceived by some. There is the same ascending series in human life, all the subjects of which being correlated, so that the apostolic injunction, "Let the strong bear the infirmities of the weak," is of perpetually binding authority. This is in force not only in the Church of Christ, where the law of love reigns supreme, but wherever human intelligences exist. It has reference not only to external needs, but also to internal wants. There is an obligation resting upon the entire community to care for all its members, in respect to the means of subsistence, and the development and constant growth of all their God-given faculties. "My Father works hitherto, and I work," was the language of Him who had a clear comprehension of this Divine law.

There is the same correlation between all the faculties of the human being; and the law of general regard that is in force throughout the Universe is binding here. As in the human race nations and individuals are in different stages of advancement, so in the individual man the faculties are not equally developed at once. Often a few sway the whole man, the others being so feeble as to manifest themselves in hardly the slightest degree. The Divine law respecting the latter is, not to neglect but to cultivate them. Though they may appear as fallow ground, yet that is to be broken up, exposed to the air and rains of heaven, and thus be able to bear fruit from seed sown.

There are many persons who possess a strong sense of moral obligation; are strictly conscientious in the performance of whatever, in their regard, devolves upon them as duty, whether to their fellow beings or to the Supreme Being; but from a lack of growth in the faculty of The Beautiful, they do not experience the enjoyment which another does who feels equally the force of moral obligation, and has, at the same time, an ardent love of The Beautiful. To the latter there is a beauty in moral actions; love, as displayed in benevolence and in a tender regard for the rights and interests of others, is beautiful; purity is a beautiful condition of both soul and body; regularity, whether in external or internal things, is beautiful. "O, how I love thy law!" he exclaims as he contemplates the All-Beautiful, because he sees it as a golden chain extending throughout all worlds and every species of existence in them, uniting each to the other in one Universe of beauty and glory. To him there is great beauty in harmony, mental and moral as well as musical; in a consistent life of self-denial for the sake of a greater good, and in that symmetrical character which is the result of cultivation of every faculty bestowed upon man. He loves to contemplate the unnumbered worlds in the vast expanse, their relations to each other, and their various movements under the guidance of Sure-Directing Force. Earth's scenery, which presents to his view so grand a variety of hill and dale, lake and river, forest and cultured field, is a source of perpetual charm; and old ocean,—

"That glorious mirror where the Almighty's form Glasses itself in tempest," is no less a cause of admiration. He also takes pleasure in viewing the numerous products of earth, whether in the mineral, vegetable or animal realms, as well as in the higher productions of human skill, displayed either in mechanics, in the finer arts, or in science and literature. All these have a practical bearing upon his life, for they serve to fashion his soul to higher conditions, to inspire him with better thoughts, and to urge him on to nobler actions.

In the mind of the person in whom the faculties of Moral Obligation and Love of The Beautiful are equally developed, there is no question whether one should be ignored for the sake of the other. They are equally cherished and cultivated, yet, like every other faculty, under the guidance of enlightened reason. For they give strength to each other. Moral Power has more completeness conjoined to the other fully developed, and Love of Beauty has a far wider field of action in association with Moral Force. This is in accordance with the general law that the greater the strength of each faculty, the greater the strength of all combined. "A three-fold cord is not easily broken," much more, a many-fold one.

But the one who is aiming at the highest life must, in all things, seek his gratification in that which is highest in its degree. That which has in itself the highest use possesses the greatest beauty. The curve is called one of the lines of beauty; but who that is thoroughly imbued with the Spirit of Christ, can view with satisfaction the death-bearing bomb-shell on its way for the destruction of human life or the useful and beautiful works of man, though the curve which it describes may be of geometrical exactness? Two armies in battle array, with their divisions, battalions and regiments, may present a scene of wonderful activity and great regularity of movement, in their various marches and countermarches. Many have journeyed miles to view such a sight, but is there any enjoyment to the Christian in its contemplation? Even the wonderful beauty of earth's scenery must be viewed under favorable circumstances to give satisfaction. There is said to be remarkable beauty and sublimity in the vicinity of the Yellowstone river, in Montana, but Everts, in the thrilling description he gives of his "Thirty-seven days peril," recently undergone there, says: "Seen under favorable circumstances, this assemblage of grandeur, beauty and novelty would have been transporting; but jaded with travel, famishing with hunger, and distressed with anxiety, I was in no humor for ecstasy. My tastes were subdued and chastened by the perils which environed me."

Wesley once made the remark that "it was a pity the devil should have all the best music;" and some religious people have undertaken to convert a portion of what has been used in his service to sacred purposes. But however sweet its melody and lively its notes, there always appears an incongruity in transferring the music which has been used for ages in singing the praises of Mars and Bacchus, to the service of Him whose character is the exact reverse of those divinities.

The fountains of melody are inexhaustible. Let the faculty of music be enlarged and improved by thorough cultivation; let the soul be open to all the highest inspirations, and there will be no lack, in the Church of Christ, of beautiful music, with its correspondingly beautiful poetry, without borrowing anything used in the worship of the deities of the past, however inspiring it may have been to their worshippers. The shrill sounds of the clarion, the more melodious tones of the bangle, together with other instruments used to urge men on to the deadly conflict, may be allowed to remain where they properly belong; yet there are and still will be instruments discoursing the sweetest music that may aid the vocal powers in their effort to chant celestial praises.

W. H. BUSSELL.

Christian Patience.

It is impossible, and indeed altogether undesirable, considering the wickedness of the world, that individual Christians should have no enemies. This will be especially the case with those who possess force of character, and feel strongly the truths entrusted to them. The fearless advocacy of right, the zealous persistence in duty, will inevitably produce alongside of much good report, its reward of slanderous evil report. Now it is very desirable that the Christian should be aware of this, and should know how to meet such circumstances. The highest state of mind that, in this respect, we can attain to is to feel this: "It matters not at all what envious and cunning individuals may say or do against me. I am conscious of my own rectitude. God sees my heart, and gives me my reward. I feel for those poor persons who try to injure me, nothing but love and pity: how far are they from those gentle feelings of humility and goodness with which I am blest! However they may injure my external reputation, they cannot take from me my internal struggles or the victories I have gained over sin. If any opportunity occurs, I will be very tender to those spreaders of evil reports; I will heap on their hearts the burning fires of love." When a soul can feel thus, and can act on this principle, it has progressed far. But such is the weakness of human nature that, however well intentioned souls may be, few can help feeling wounded by misrepresentation. But any one possessed of ordinary intelligence and power of will can avoid crying out when hurt, however keen the wound. Nothing will give greater satisfaction to a malicious enemy than to see his malice take effect; and it is a point of prudence, if of nothing higher, to foil malice by patient self-restraint. A soul derives satisfaction from self-respect, and it is impossible to feel self-respect if we give way to expressions of annoyance at slander, or if we retaliate on the slanderers in any other way than by blessing. But some will say, especially those whose years have not given them experience, that it is impossible to enjoy life, if all their external surroundings are embittered by the malice of enemies, and if they feel in the minds of those about them distrust and want of appreciation. This at once shows a want of deep spirituality. Until a soul feels that real substantial happiness consists only in conquest of the nature of sin, it cannot feel that calm certainty for itself in which alone subsists that peace which passeth understanding. Moreover, it is certain that, in practical life, a steady and zealous pursuance of duty will produce its inevitable consequence of confidence in the minds of those who are really worthy of our esteem. What a satisfaction it is to look back on the difficulties we have lovingly struggled through! Well-doing is a rock on which the feeble bark of slander will inevitably go to pieces. But the Christian has no right to any enemies except those produced by adherence to Christ principles. The Christian cannot have personal enemies. He hates no one, his heart is full of love; therefore his foes are those only who hate not him, but the life he lives, the truths he advocates; and who would hate that life and those truths in any one? Let us hunger for such enemies, since, alas! there must be wicked people in the world; and since it is better for us that they hate us than that they love us. Again: in the progress of our travail, before the soul has gained a thorough knowledge of itself, the criticisms of enemies are very useful. An enemy discovers a fault of character much more quickly than a friend, and the patient laborer in the overcoming field will gladly note hostile observations, and thus turn to good account malicious shafts. This will be very bitter to the old man in us, yet there cannot be a better exercise: for, the soul will find, when it can patiently listen to adverse words, and can draw therefrom truths pregnant with salvation, that it will possess a divine patience that nothing can shake.

Notes on Plato.

Plato was born B. C. 429 years; and died B. C. 348. His mother, Perictione, was a descendant of Solon; and his father, Aristo, was of an eminent family. He studied eight years with Socrates, and was the youngest of the Senate at the time of Socrates' arraignment; but could do nothing to save his life. Upon the death of Socrates he fled, with others of his disciples, to Italy; where he gave himself to the discipline of Pythagoras, chiefly to the continence, chastity, and knowledge of nature possessed by that school. In his school he thought it all important to accustom youth to "take delight in good things; otherwise pleasures were the bait of evil." "Education should be conducted with a serene sweetness, never by force or violence." His studies did not sour his temper, nor mar his interest in mankind. His ordinary conversation was extremely winning.

He lived single, yet soberly and chastely; temperately; abstaining almost entirely from animal food. He slept alone, and disapproved very much the opposite manner. Of his prudence, patience, moderation, magnanimity and other virtues, all bear good record.

He was wont to say: "See to it, youths, that you employ your idle hours usefully. Prefer labor before idleness, unless you esteem rust above brightness."

Being asked how long he meant to be a scholar, he replied: "As long as I am not ashamed of growing better and wiser." Being asked what difference there was between a learned man and one unlearned, he replied: "The same as betwixt a physician and a patient." Hearing that some one spoke ill of him, he answered: "No matter, I shall live so that none shall believe him." He owed no man anything. He died on his 81st birthday, of old age, which Seneca ascribes to his temperance and diligence.

In his ideal republic he afforded the same chances to women as to men to become its rulers, thus representing the whole interest.

E. H. WEBSTER.

Life in God.

The English translators of St. John the Evangelist, in the first verse, according to the version of an eminent linguist, have made a wonderful mistake; the Greek word "Logos" has two significations, "mind" and "word." Thomas Jefferson says, the translators by selecting "word" instead of "mind," as the representative of the word Logos, have entirely destroyed the meaning, and made nonsense of the evangelist's context.

In accepting Jefferson's translation we have: "In the beginning was Mind or Intelligence, and mind was with God, and mind was God." In thus setting forth the beginning of the Gospel, or Thesis of St. John, we restore the verse to common sense, reason and truth; for mind must precede word, either spoken or written, as word is only an emanation, whether of the Eternal or finite mind.

A right translation might have saved volumes, besides a world of trouble to commentators, and much vexation to the common readers of the sacred volume.

It would require a Nicene Council to make the Supreme out of a word; and one of more potency, to change the virgin Mary into the mother of God; and the still more potent Ecumenical Council to elaborate the old corpulent Italian into the immaculate Jehovah! In the very penning of these awful blasphemies, we feel a degree of compunction, as having taken the most sacred name of the Eternal in vain. However deplorable and mortifying these black pictures may be to the truthful and pure in heart, the nineteenth century may be in labor and travail, and bring forth a monster, of which the world has no conception, in terrible blackness and deformity! Catholicism may be called to restore the "Holy See" to the government of the secular and religious world; a bloody tragedy may ensue, of which the Crusades to the "Holy Land" are as a mere shadow! The civilized world may yet learn to its great consternation, that Catholicism is neither dead, nor dying; but lying in an assumed condition, of which we have a specimen in a certain animal of the west, which can die, at will, or pleasure, and again become reanimated, with the same ease and facility!!

But leaving these hints for future consideration, we find ourselves involved in a labyrinth of theological mysteries; according to modern sectaries, religion seems to have deserted the souls of men and women, and taken up its abode in Ecclesiastical Mysteries. To evolve, or disentangle and straighten out these knots of their divinity, has engaged the best minds of reformed catholicism for ages, and called forth many cart-loads of reformed divinity; writer after writer has puzzled his brains, and brought forth gas only; for the whole anti-christian scheme of salvation by proxy is a myth, an oriental speculation of the Brahmins. If any of our readers are yet in doubts, may we ask them to procure the "Bhagvat-Geeta," or the "Dialogues of Kreesna and Arjoon," translated by the English clerk, Charles Wilkins, of the East India commission; in that sacred volume he will find the whole of the mysteries pertaining to the secular godhead, and many more strange ideas, in conjunction with the triune divinity and incarnation. Also, the corroborative testimony of the Governor General, Warren Hastings, as to the truth of the translation, and the identity of Hindoo mythology and Catholicism. Truth has no place in this matchless chaos of absurdities: still, men are preaching.

The disciples of Luther and Calvin, and a host of others, after a collegiate education, study their speculative theology, or Brahminism, under some of their renowned Drs. of divinity, and being duly ordained, according to creed, go forth to teach, and spread paganism through the land; and the poor heathen, as we call them, have to be tortured with this miserable, speculative, rejuvenated sectarian paganism!

How long, before rational men and women will learn, that Salvation is a growth of righteousness in the human soul? and that this growth in the divine nature, is to continue to the endless ages of eternity? The Saviour never taught any other mode of salvation; he said nothing about salvation by proxy; nothing of "paying the debt in our law, room and stead;" but redemption from a sinful nature was to supervene by a life of self-denial and the cross; a daily dying to the propensities of a carnal animal nature, by following the Captain of our salvation in the regeneration.

In his parable he said, "I am the vine, ye are the branches, my Father is the husbandman;" thus to grow up in God, and become one with him, in the Divine nature, was the design and intent of the Saviour's mission.

This buying and selling salvation on hypothetical capital, seems too much like speculation, or gambling in matters of eternal interest.

O the folly of a deluded sectarian world! "The blind leading the blind;" and all in the ditch of ignorance, folly, and superstition:—Paganism reigning triumphant in a supposed Christian land; and fanaticism spending millions of money, and much precious time, and many valuable lives; and all for what? Simply to convert the Oriental Nations to their own Religion, of more than four thousand years' prevalence; aged and grey-headed, long before its advent on the shores of Europe.

But there is still hope; the Saviour's Light is again burning and shining, and the nations are turning to its bright illuminations!

Paganism is destined to have an end, and the true God and his Gospel will be known; the gospel will spread to the uttermost parts of the earth; and the heavenly Father and Mother will be honored and glorified by the redemption of their prodigal children; all in their appointed time.

Guardian Angels.

The Shakers do not claim that it is their special Mission to take care of Orphans, although it is said that their conditions in life, and especially those of the Sisterhood, are well adapted to the charge of those little sufferers of earth.

O were our eyes unsealed,
Glad secrets to descry,
What shining hosts would be revealed,
Divinely hovering nigh.

Bright Angels clothed with love,
True Ministers of grace,
In hovering circles gently move,
To guide the erring race.

Their gentle wings expand
In truth it may be said;
The lowliest saint, is rainbow spanned,
The child is Angel led.

And woman also shows
She can be Angel too;
The gentle mind reflects on those,
Our dim eyes may not view.

The garland that she weaves,
Would grace the Savior's brow;
'Tis fragrant as the perfumed leaves,
That by life's river grow.

In dungeons, she is day;
In sickness, solace mild;
To the maimed, a staff; to the blind, a ray;
She soothes the lonely child.

And never doth she send
More golden rays abroad,
Than when she shines the Orphan's friend,
And leads the child to God.

Items of Interest.

"THE DEBATABLE LAND," by R. D. Owen, is a most remarkable work on Spiritualism. Those who are interested in the progress of Spiritualism will not fail of its perusal. The address to the Clergy is a valuable exhortation to thinking humanity. But let no one read who will not understand, or who fears being persuaded. Carleton, New York, is the publisher.

A MAN proves himself fit to go higher, who shows that he is faithful where he is. A man that will not do well in his present place because he longs to be higher, is fit neither to be where he is, nor yet above it.

"LIFE of Victoria C. Woodhull" has been sent us; were it not from the pen of a nature's nobleman—Theodore Tilton—we would incline to the belief that its subject was a myth of the 19th century. Price 10 cents.

AS LONG as men continue to worship an exclusively masculine God, they will never practically acknowledge the equality of woman. Let women teach their children to pray MOTHER GOD, and there will soon be a change in the current of public opinion. Go to the fountain head, if you would purify the stream. The world has inherited its theology from the times when women were considered as the servants or slaves of men—when animal force was predominant, and men's highest conception of God was that of a being capable of executing justice, by force. The higher element of LOVE they had not realized as a moving power in the Godhead, and

hence had not recognized this feminine element in their worship. How long will enlightened women continue virtually to acknowledge their inferiority, by continuing to ignore the representation of their sex in the Godhead? Is this the Nineteenth century, and are the people awake? Who are the heathens to-day?—Moonly Voice.

AMONG our exchanges, we have found none more radical on the vital questions of to-day; none more willing to stand by and build up unpopular, but living truths; none that are willing to do more good to others than is done to it, than the neatly printed and ably edited "CIRCULAR" of Baltimore, Md.

ITEM for meat eaters: An old ox, having done valuable service in one of the Shaker families, was fattened, and brought to the shambles. Walking up to the ring without resistance, he stood, and as if conscious of his past efforts and the impending blow, actually shed tears, until stunned by the butcher! We vouch for this.

ON page 20, present number, top of third column may be observed, a sentence—"Ye generation of vipers"—very commonly attributed to Jesus. Our reading of this in Matt. 3, 7, makes John the Baptist author of this harsh saying. "Search the Scriptures."

THE Phrenological Annual is out. Among other matters, we find a purported portrait of Ann Lee, together with our letter to S. R. Wells. Very few Shakers coincide with the Spirit Artist; but it is very interesting to observe what artists attempt, and phrenologists determine from such attempts.

The Spiritualism of Shakerism.

The Shakers are, and ever have been, Spiritualists. The childhood of ANN LEE was rife with spirit communications. By spirits she became the prepared subject of the Christ spirit, and the medium for its communication to other souls. From time immemorial in Shaker history, spirit communions have been active, operating like the seasons. In their spring, they affected the children and amused the adults; in the summer the adults became thoroughly affected; between summer and autumn there was a flood-tide of communications, when the very atmosphere seemed pregnant with spiritual influences, which affected nearly the whole of society in almost every conceivable manner—physically, and with great power; mentally, and with wondrous performance; spiritually, and with an irresistible conviction of sin; and then we have known of "the full corn in the ear" of Spiritualism's first cycle, and are acquainted with its winter, though never bereft of spirit gifts and manifestations.

The association of Shakers with Spiritualists has been the cause of much comment by the press, and the expression of much regret on the part of those who have a deep respect for the Shakers, but who are avowed opponents of Spiritists and of the spiritual philosophy. We do not wonder at these fears and comments; we should wonder were they not expressed. Spiritualists—the bona-fide class—are now, in their theology, where we once were. The philosophy is doing for them what it has already done for us.

The church multitudes are quite familiar with our radical estrangement from the theologies of every other church; and of our adoption, on the earth, of a heavenly practice in life; which, while the churches are forced to admire, they well know would be death to any other church than our own, should the same life be adopted and be generally enforced. The clergy and laity, generally speaking, are not aware of the elementary forces that are fledging all true spiritualists for their flight into immortal, eternal life. Of these, we are aware, and are far more happy in the dis-enthralment of true Spiritists from erroneous theological bondage, than we have ever been at the emancipation of oppressed races from physical servitude; and equally happy for them as for our own freedom from obstacles in our way of spirit progress. Spiritualism impresses upon its communicants a thorough infidelity to the frame work of man-made creeds—non-communication with the departed; the physical resurrection; the Trinity and the vicarious atonement by Jesus! Upon these, and many other points, Shakers and Spiritualists are of one faith. What has Spiritualism given for what it has taken away? If it has built up nothing, we will still thank God for what it has knocked down. It has confirmed communications between the visible and invisible worlds; and these have broken into myriads of pieces the erroneous theologies of the day. The Shakers have ever found the Books of Revelation open; so do the Spiritualists. In exchange for the physical resurrection, the Shakers and many leading Spiritualists have accepted the practice in life that elevates the soul above the earthly, pro-creative plane, up to the angelic. Both have exchanged the monstrous Trinity for the eternal duality of deity—Father and Mother God! while both are assured that their salvation will never be accomplished by another, but by their own efforts, aided by the reform circles of the spirit world. Both view Jesus as a Jew; made the medium for imparting very spiritual truths for the guidance of true spiritualists' lives. Both see the possibility of other Saviours arising, as did Jesus, above the common lives of the multitude, to testify the necessity of advancement and against error in all that pertains to life.

Thus far have progressive spiritualists followed and accompanied the Shakers. We love them for all the reforms they have made for the better.

Some, in their illuminations of the heavenly relations of "the better land," have mistaken (purposely or otherwise) the fraternal unions there existing, for the free-love tendencies of sensualists; thus abrogating the bondage of marriage by substituting something worse! With these we have no fellowship. Wherein do we differ from true Spiritualists? To answer this, necessitates a reference to the line of demarcation, beneath which we will not go; and above which we are certain every spiritualist who is true to his or her spiritual instincts, will and must ascend. Very few Spiritualists will ever permit themselves to go back to the vomit of theological fooleries they have forsaken. To go forward is the only alternative left them; and so sure as the same causes lead to the same results, so sure are all true spiritualists destined to be at-one-ment with all true Shakers; and all conjoined to the innumerable company of thoroughly spiritualized individualities—the angels. The difference between Shakers and Spiritualists exists in the degrees of spirituality attained to by each, rather than any difference in the principles of life—the Shakers being radically in the advance, having spiritualized strong points in life where spiritualists are yet on the earth.

The time is near, has already arrived to some modern spiritualists, when selfish interests, such as houses, lands, husbands, wives and children—all that is called mine—will yield to the spiritual impress of the pentecostal church. Here we yet differ in too great degree—we plead guilty to a little impatience. Again, Spiritualists, as a body, are not yet convinced how very unspiritual are the lusts of the flesh—how very much beneath the inspiration and aspiration of an angel to engage in at all! The very name of spiritualist should signify one freed from the lusts of the flesh and of the mind—an elevation of character that despises sensual indulgence. Generally speaking, we differ widely here; yet more in practice than in convictions; and none are better aware of this fact than true Spiritualists themselves.

Spiritualism will yet present crosses of self-denial to the believing in its ranks; and then will come the test of sincerity, and moral courage. Many will decline to make the advances called for, while it is in their power to save their earthly, generative lives; while others will lose their unspiritual lives with pleasure, and on the earth begin a life that never needs change to be eternal.

Wherein must the Spiritualist change, here or hereafter, who is surrounded by or filled with the same affections for unspirit-uality that his neighbors, Methodist or Presbyterians engage in, (excepting their theology), that he may be numbered with seraphims? Wherein must the Shaker change? As our aims are both heavenward, whose lives comport nearest with our convictions of the angel life?

Spiritualists will not, cannot ask the Shakers to participate with them in any unspiritual practice; nor need any, friendly to the Shakers, fear their demoralization by associating with those who alone have "despised the shame" of religiously comingling with the Shakers; and, excepting the materialistic infidels (who are not so far from the kingdom of heaven as the so-called orthodox churches), the Spiritualists alone have invited the Shakers to their pulpits, granted them unrestricted liberties to preach, and who have become exstastic over their ministrations. In various reforms, some Spiritualists are in advance of some Shakers; herein those Shakers must advance or find themselves in the rear of advancing Spiritualists. We live in a day of theological revolutions—and these will never go backward—and the cry of the spirit is: "Forward, Shakers, forward!" and to the Spiritualists: "Be true to your convictions of right!" And then in yonder heaven—a condition attained unto here or hereafter, we shall be one in faith and in life. Until then we shall enjoy just that degree of fellowship that proceeds from self-denial to ourselves of erroneous, earthly, unspiritual conditions; by which self-denial we may "walk in the spirit and not fulfill the lusts of the flesh. AMEN. *

Liberty, What is It?

I was led to the following thoughts by reading an article in the January number of the current volume of the Phrenological Journal, entitled POLITICAL RINGS.

While I can approve of much of the article referred to, I must confess that I was surprised at language like the following, evincing, as it seems to, the spirit of bigotry and intolerance. And the more surprising from the candor and liberality usually evinced by the editorials of the Journal, and its progress in liberal ideas, and freedom from intolerance and bigotry, that forms so prominent a feature of the Journal as a whole.

After portraying, to some extent, the evils of the political parties of the day, and of Tammany in particular, it goes on to discuss the means for correcting this state of things in this wise:

"We would require every man—not imbecile, insane, criminal, or idiotic—to take part in the municipal State or National affairs, whether he be Shaker, Quaker, or Communist. All who enjoy the privileges of our free institutions, should be required not only to pay taxes, but to vote and to fight!"

"Should be required," of course, implies

the right and power to compel to the acts required; and a disposition to use the compelling power. Now, as we, the Shakers, are one of the classes named above, and may pass as representatives of the whole, let us look into this matter; as the editor, a little farther on, informs us, that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," civil or religious. And he also speaks, as dear and inalienable, of the right to worship God according to the dictates of our own consciences.

Perhaps the editor is not aware that it is a part of the religious faith of the Shaker order to take no part in the political movements of the times, either municipal, State or National, either directly or indirectly; that, as Christians, we are called to be separate from the world, and that we cannot, under any circumstances, mingle or take part in the affairs of the civil government, or of political life, without sacrificing one of the foundational principles of our religious faith and life. Then if we were to be compelled to do this, contrary to our honest convictions of right and duty, what becomes of the so much boasted liberty of conscience, the right to worship God according to its dictates; which implies also the right to serve God as our faith may lead us.

If the editor is aware of our faith and real position on this subject, I think there is, at least, an apparent inconsistency in the article referred to. If he is ignorant in these respects, we advise him to read the 'SHAKER,' and other publications of the Society, before stating, so positively, what he would do, or what he would compel others to do, had he the power.

But further—"should be required to vote and to fight." We can hardly think so well informed a writer as the editor of the 'The Journal' can be ignorant of the fact that the Shakers, Quakers, and some others of the numerous Communists of our country, have always been averse to war and bloodshed; and have, from motives of faith and conscience, abstained from, and refused to bear arms, or to learn the arts of war as practiced by so-called Christian nations of our day, our own included. And that they have steadily adhered to this course, not only when policy and prudence might seem to dictate it as the path of safety, but also when persecution for this refusal stared them in the face, or fell on their unoffending and unresisting heads; and the strong arm of military and despotic power was stretched out for the purpose of compelling obedience to its requirements; just as the editor would do, it seems, had he the power.

It would seem that so-well informed a man could not be ignorant of these facts; or that he should attribute our adhesion to these principles and exemplifications of our faith and principles in our lives, in these and other respects, to any other than honest conscientious motives; of obedience to the light God has given us; and, that this being the case, he would think twice before he again advocates such an arbitrary and unjust course as that marked out in the article referred to; and that while he prizes so highly the right to worship God, he will at least be willing to accord to others, even Shakers, Quakers, or Communists, the same privilege and the same rights.

HENRY CUMINGS, Enfield, N. H.

Oneness of Faith.

Christ's Church is a school; the spirit of Christ the authorized and inspired teacher, and believers are the pupils. Perpetual revelation of truths, new to the pupils, is the law of eternal progression, the guiding star of destiny for the School of Christ.

The scholars of the primitive school announced a oneness of faith as the governing element in Christ's Church, or School. "One Lord, one faith, and one baptism; one God and Father (and Mother) of all, who is above, and through, and in you all." Eph. iv. 5, 6.

Should the question arise what this oneness of faith has reference to, or consists in, the Prophets and Apostles conspire to answer it: First, to the Divine character of the School, and the authority of the Master. For the Church of Christ is the Heavenly Jerusalem prophesied of by Zechariah xiv. 9, in the day of which "there shall be one Lord and his name one." "And the seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in Heaven saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever." Rev. xi. 15. "And I saw a new heaven, and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away; * * * and I, John, saw the Holy City, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband." The primitive Church, of Jesus and his Apostles, was the church of the bridegroom; the Church of Christ's second appearing is the Church of the Bride, the female dispensation of the coming of Christ. "And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, behold the tabernacle of God (the Church of Christ) is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God himself shall be with them and be their God." Rev. xxi. 1 to 4.

Second. To the harmonious union of the scholars. "For the Church of Christ being "one fold," John x. 16, and of "one heart," Acts iv. 30, will have "access by one spirit" (Christ) "unto the Father," Eph. ii. 18.

Third. To the travel or progression of the pupils in the perception and reception of truth and knowledge of godliness. "But unto every one is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ," Eph. iv. 1; and on "till we all come into the unity of the faith, and to the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." "That ye henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive." "But speaking the truth in love, may grow up unto him in all things which is the head, even Christ."

Thus, oneness of faith refers prominently to the principle of an ever increasing revelation of the truths of God in Christ's Church, manifest through the quickening spirit—Christ. And as truth is eternal, there will be a oneness of faith in all souls who have traveled, or progressed to the same degree of light and Christian baptism, so as to perceive, receive, feel and live the same Christian testimony; that is, those who have learned the same lessons in Christ's School. But these lessons are practical life lessons, taught by facts. "Go and tell John the things ye see and hear" (Jesus). "If ye believe not my words, believe for the work's sake, for these are they which testify of me" (Jesus).

Yet, as all souls in the kingdom of Christ have first to be begotten, then born of God, when they may gradually travel in growth to become of full stature; so infants and children in Christ's School cannot have the same standard of development of faith as attained by men and women of God, yet, "one faith will govern their lives; that is, confidence in, and reliance upon obedience to every degree of revealed truth, for justification.

But the word faith implies more than mere belief; it expresses an inclination of the heart, an impulse and confidence of the soul, while belief is simply an action of the mind, and may be entirely speculative and erroneous; hence, a person for a time may entertain a very false conception, belief, or creed concerning God or Christ, and yet have a true faith, confidence, or trust in Him, which may guide his life in righteousness, so that he will eventually come to the belief of truth only. The expression is often used with propriety, "I have faith to believe thus and thus." Hence, persons of different beliefs, in some points, may live in obedience to the same and one faith. Belief is not always regulated by the reasoning faculties, or the truth of things. Persons often believe, from prejudice and ignorance, things to be true which are very false, or in false principles, sophisms, &c.

"Oh, I've heard him talk

"Like the first-born child of love, when every word,"

"Spoke in his eyes, and wept to be believed,"
And all to ruin me."—Southern.

One person conceives of, and believes God to be a personal being, having form, dimensions, and passions, to which those of man are analogous, thus necessarily finite as to the occupation of space, the wield of power, and the assumption of dignity, therefore not a supreme, but only a superior being. While a different mind cannot conceive of God as a finite being having form, but rather etherial; an inexpressible and inconceivable, subtle, and infinitely dispensed latent power, different throughout all creation—a creative principle; the former of all forms, but surpassing the extent of form conceivable to the human mind—a power that, saith the poet,

"Lives through all life, extends through all extent, Spreads undivided, operates unspent."

One person conceives of evil as originating from an evil god called, in common parlance, the devil, whom they understand to be coeternal with the good God, and equally self-existing, and as independent of the good God, as God is of him; hence, that evil is no more destructible than good. While another mind conceives that some of the created intelligences of the good God originated evil by putting things of God's creation out of order; hence, that evil is not eternal, and the devil can be destroyed. And yet, while the mental conceptions and beliefs of these different individuals so prominently oppose each other, they may all have one faith in the work of God, through Christ, for salvation, and their lives conform to one standard of righteousness. And it may not be anticipated nor desired, that, in all things a sameness of intellectual perception shall be attained, and that the thoughts of all minds shall flow in the same channels. And the saints of the Church of the "Latter Day" have no need to tease their zeal into a foam to make converts to some creed of so-called christianity, by torturing the bodies of unbelievers; nor to bathe their hands in human gore to reclaim heretics; to do what God never attempted to do—make all human minds to think alike!

The history of the ages is bathed in the blood of martyrs to creeds; but creeds—theological dogmas—perhaps the sophisms of metaphysical philosophy—the mere objects of faith, shut and bar the door of revelation from God, and narrow the human understanding to the application of one specific for all the diseases the soul is heir to, and all the doses in the same proportions; they tether the soul to the bounds of the present degree of understanding concerning God and Christ, however far short of the whole truth that may be. They are the fevered pulsations of life that generate those foul ulcers of hatred and strife which have put millions of persons to the sword and instruments of torture and death, because they were heretical to what? Not to a godly life, but to an idea!

While the true Christian faith, a soul baptism of life in God, opens the pathway of unlimited progression in the knowledge and practice of godliness and grace, adapting the gift of God and the means of salvation to the ever varied and changeable vicissitudes of lost souls in every situation, and its fruit is love to the whole family of man!

The final answer, then, to the great question, "What is the essential principle of unity of faith?" is to live wholly to God; "If any man will do His will he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself," John vii, 17. "But whosoever shall do and teach them (these commandments) shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." Hence, "oneness of faith" in the Christian Church, radically considered, refers to the credit and confidence of the mind and trust of the affections of the heart to a truth manifested to the understanding, or illustrated by practical life; for the power of God, of principles, of persons, and the virtue of things, are the only proper objects of faith; and these are substantially learned only by their fruits. If, then, the souls of the children of God, all led and governed by the spirit of Christ, flow together to partake of, and disseminate the feast of His great salvation and redemption to humanity, it is well and it is enough!

GILES B. AVERY.

GOLDEN OPINION OF "THE GOLDEN AGE."—Elder Evans, in a late letter to this office, says: "Of all the newspapers I have seen, The Golden Age has my largest esteem. Its columns fairly overflow with exuberant truth. Among its contributors may be observed men and women who are thoroughly in earnest after truth—a class of reformers who know what truth is, and are determined to find it in its fullness. It deserves success, and I believe will enjoy it."

Which is the Greater?

How is it that Christians place so much stress on the bodily crucifixion of Jesus, and have fixed their hopes for ages in the atoning blood of one man? For certainly the Spirit of God, the essence of deity in the man Jesus, could not have been the sufferer by a physical death. If there is an inherent virtue and an atonement for sin in the Master's physical crucifixion, why ignore the atoning effect of a disciple's dying, and teaching the gathered multitudes through the space of three days, tied to a cross? For whom did the myriads suffer; who endured death in its most terrible forms, by beasts of prey, burnings, and the vilest passions of men? Was it for their own atonement? or was the death of Jesus, upon the cross, but an example to his disciples to suffer all things, even cruel physical pain, to maintain that liberty of spirit which the truth had given?

How vastly exceeding any mortal agony was the mental anguish, buffetings and temptations of which Jesus shared with his brethren! Is that severe ordeal, passed through in the comparatively short space of forty-eight hours, to be compared with the recorded wrestle with the spirit of temptation in himself, after his baptism, forty days and nights?

We believe that many Christians now living can testify by the same spirit to the like experience, in all but degree; who feel that the daily crucifixion of their carnal lives in obedience to Christ's command, "follow me," is infinitely more tedious and painful, humbling, and finally atoning, than to walk resolutely to the stake and burn.

Where ambition finds no room, no patriotism is required; no hero worship allowed nor opportunity given for the display of great and ennobling deeds; nought but the almost unnoticed performance of duties with faithfulness every day to keep the energy of a Christian life at fervent heat—this is certainly a crucifixion with and following Christ; and Christ thus followed, will carry the spirit in victory over all physical pain.

If the prescience of Providence designed for aught the sorrowful, though not uncommon end of Jesus, how much more consistent that he should meet it as an example to his disciples, who could not do otherwise than bleed freely for the principles of the cross, under the power of the savage human nature of that day.

What but the self interest of a deliberate life of sin, contrary to the life of Christ, could so blind the reason and pervert the understanding of the educated, powerful, and apparently pious minds, who have studied the atonement of Jesus for their own hope, and to sustain the hope of others, that salvation in their sins is possible, and that salvation from the practice of sin is not a necessity?

H. HOLLISTER.

Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

Babel Builders.

It would seem that Noah's posterity became quite as corrupt as the antediluvians. Instead of placing their confidence in a life of virtue that would elevate them above judgments, they conceived the idea of escaping by a high tower; and it is even intimated in Gen. 11, 6, that they might possibly succeed. Taken literally, it was a senseless proceeding to attempt to reach heaven after this manner, however much flood might be escaped. But do we not find among so-called Christian sects to-day as much Babylon in theologies and as much error in their anticipations?

No complicated system of theology will save any one, no matter how extensive its display, nor flattering its prospects. Those who build up as a substitute for a pure life any structure of mere faith, will find they are Babel builders; the whole will come tumbling down and necessitate a new foundation. While the only true theology and religion is the practice of Christ's life in all of its self-denials, this being eternal because it is pure, containing no elements of error nor decay. C. DIBBLE.

Shakers, N. Y.

Phenomenal.

The following questions and answers will be interesting to all. One peculiarity will be observed, that the answers were given through a Shaker Sister—A. Z. Potter—months before the questions were propounded, and both purporting to come from the same spirit—Seth Y. Wells. The Shaker Sister writes: "On the evening of March 25, soon after I had retired, I heard my name called distinctly. I arose, went to the door, but found no person there. Soon after Seth Y. Wells came to me, and invited me to go with him. I reluctantly complied. We went to a telegraph office, where were many spirits I knew, and more I did not know. I was requested to copy all that came over the wires. I did so, though the substance was quite unintelligible to me; for, as nearly as I could understand, it was answers to questions some person had put to some other person; who, or what the questions were, I could not tell." The boy did not know of the answers being already given; and yet the questions were given and numbered, seriatim, with the answers.

The following questions were given through the mediumship of a boy 12 years of age, at the house of D. D. Phelps, in Stratford, Conn., September 7th, 1850. The sentences were rapped out letter by letter. The medium was an entire stranger, never having previously seen a Shaker.

Answers were given in vision through the mediumship of a Shaker Sister, on the evening of March 25th, 1850, five months and eighteen days previous to the questions. Answers were given at Mt. Lebanon, N. Y. A. Z. Potter, Medium.

1st. Why are spirits permitted to visit different denominations?

1st. Because, in this merciful dispensation the Lord sees fit to become all things to all men.

2d. Will the Lord manifest himself to all unbelievers?

2d. Yes, He will continue to meet each one in his own path, and show them his power according to their dark views of his all-wise decrees and mysterious doings.

3d. Why are relatives the ones employed to make these communications?

3d. Because there is a more nearness of feeling and affection between relatives, and a knowledge of many things can be obtained in this way, that is beyond contradiction.

4th. Why is there no injury ever done to any person?

4th. This, also, is an indulgence from a forbearing God.

5th. Does the Lord intend these manifestations to become universal?

5th. I cannot answer you myself; but my friend will soon.

6th. Can all persons command the spirits?

6th. No; there will be means provided by a more holy power than we possess; and the spirits will proceed in conformity to the will of the sincere, so far as they have permission.

7th. Will the knockings soon cease?

7th. This almighty work will increase and go on till every nation, kindred and tongue shall taste of the mercy that quickeneth the rod sent forth by a just and equitable God.

8th. Will man have power to control the knockings by defiance?

8th. No mortal will have power to do that; although some have presumed to defy the spirits to give them a satisfactory answer.

9th. From whom do they receive the correct information?

9th. From the angels and spirits of the justified before death.

10th. Why do the spirits not speak without the knockings and other manifestations?

10th. The Holy Spirit suffers it now for a more perfect confirmation; but the power is sufficient without the aid of philosophy or any material substance to act upon the mind.

11th. Is it not confined to any particular people?

11th. No. God nor the Holy Spirit has any respect to person, sex, condition, color nor persuasion.

12th. Then it does not belong to the Shakers only?

12th. No; but their declarations are literally fulfilling; and I doubt not that they, as a first favored people, will rejoice that their fellow-creatures are sharing a similar notice of God.

We have received the following from some friend whom we do not know, but whose sympathies, conjoined to many others, to us made manifest, we appreciate.

A Word in Prose with a Poetical Illustration.

The undersigned is decidedly of the opinion that the so-called "Shakers" have a preponderant place in the economy of the "Kingdom of Heaven," of which the sects in general are, as yet, not sufficiently cognizant. I am quite certain that, in various particulars, I should essentially differ from them; but, for all that, there is a certain principle in their practical formula and vital life which should be specially considered by the religious world at large.

Not to enter into this topic more fully at present, let us test the point in question by the following brief Psalm or Hymn.

To whom is the "door" of the "Kingdom" more fully opened to-day; and who have more entirely entered in to the spirit and practical adaptation of its principles, than have the disciples of Mother Ann Lee? Many of the truer and vital forms of FAITH can speak of "rest unto the soul," but merely from the influence of their beautiful convictions; while in their external relations they are yet attached to "the world," and are joined in with its selfish methods, and fully (?) subject to its corrosive cares and vexations, to say nothing of its falsities, frivolities and ferocities. Such, in sentimental measure and feeling, can sing, in the expression of our rhythmical subject below—we have sought—we have found the Lord—we are happy in our trust in Thee, etc.! but yet what class, like the Shakers, can absolutely and genuinely speak of themselves as "from the world won away?"

"In the soul's calm retreat, safe and blest."
"Till self-styled Christian society makes its system practical and vital in Christ," the special unction of a spiritual song, like the following, will find its most appropriate response from the hearts and lips of a people who are so unific in the spirit of Christ, as are our Shaker friends.

Those who, under the name of Spiritualists, are assuming just now to control the great spiritual movement of the age, can surely lay scarcely the shadow of a claim to any particular appreciation to our poetic theme; it is indeed a question whether they have, in any degree, the estimate of Jesus Christ as the "Master," "Lord" or "Savior," which would enable any of their Journals to publish it as expressive of the finer element of their cause. The real "first fruits" of the spirit movement, however, are up to the point presented in this effusion, and the people of the Shaker Communities can sing the annexed verses from the hearts and voices of true workers in religion and reform.

"KNOCK AND IT SHALL BE OPENED UNTO YOU."

We wait and we watch at thy portals, dear Lord,
We invoke thee with patience and prayer;
We remember the counsel and call of thy word
And we knock—Blessed One art thou there?

Our hearts are not faint though we come from afar,
Though we've struggled and toiled to the end;
For thy love has sustained us—thy door has no bar,
Yet we knock—dost thou hear us, dear friend?

We listen in silence; no sound of thy voice
Has announced that thy presence is nigh;
But we smile through our tears, for in Faith we rejoice,
As we knock—wilt thou now make reply?

Lo! the door opens wide, and Jesus appears
Full of goodness and cheer—come to win;
And he cries, as his hand wipes away all our tears,
"Ye who knock, welcome home! enter in!"

O, happy are we, from the world won away,
In the soul's calm retreat safe and blest;
And to all who yet wander we earnestly say,
Come and knock—and with Christ be at rest.

Providence.

With dark, foreboding thoughts oppressed
I wandered forth one summer's day :
Hoping abroad to ease my breast,
And grief allay.

Deep in a lone and green retreat
I laid me down, with many a sigh;
When lo! a daisy at my feet
Allured my eye.

Methought, with sympathetic smile,
It seemed to pity, and reprove;
And thus my bitter cares beguile
With words of love :

" Sad mortal, cease thy anxious sighs!
Why sit you down in sorrow here?
Does not each leaf that meets thine eye
Reprove thy fear?"

" Although a mean, unheeded flower,
My daily wants are all supplied;
And he who brought me to this hour,
Will still provide.

" The light and dew, the sun and rain,
Are daily seen to foster me;
And fearest thou God will not deign
To think of thee?"

Ashamed, I rose : rebuked my care,
And blest the teacher of the sod;
Resolved, to chase away despair
And trust in God.

Immaculate Conception.

The immaculate conception doctrine of the Catholic Church, results from the belief of the possibility and practicability of a pure spiritual gospelized generation, in past ages, as recorded in Jewish history—Isaac, John Baptist and Jesus, being only instances under a general law. This doctrine is the basic foundation of Gentile—generative—Christianity.

While the Catholic Church numbers marriage among the sacraments, it yet recognizes celibacy as the highest form of Christianity; and requires it undeviatingly of the priesthood and of all the monastic orders, as being essential to a true life of spirituality.

With Protestants, that "light has become darkness;" to them, salvation is by faith, independent of works. "The man of sin sitteth in the temple" or church, and is sanctified out and out. Commencing with the dogma of "total depravity," they depend entirely upon the "imputed righteousness" of somebody who suffered for their wrong-doing, and "in their stead;" and not at all, upon their own good, true, and honest works, to form to themselves a genuine Christian character.

Believing Jesus to be God, they look for him to come, personally, to each "seeker," without the intervention of any mediators; either man, woman, tutelar or subordinate gods.

Salvation is a matter of will and favor, rather than of character and principle. Hence the vilest sinner can be transmuted into the best of saints in a moment of time, and just before they draw their last earthly breath.

As "there is no repentance in the grave"—no probation in eternity—at death, each becomes, instantaneously, a devil, or a saint and angel. After admitting such premises, it is easy to swallow a camel, and to accept the remainder of the "doctrines of devils," which have no foundation either in reason or revelation.

The reanimation and transmutation of the physical bodies of mankind into spiritual bodies, with corollary dogmas, equally absurd, are some of the logical sequences which flow from the interblending of the dispensations and spheres—of natural and spiritual ideas—that commence with the confused notion of a spiritualized, holy, generation, that ultimated in an "immaculate conception," by the Holy Ghost or the Virgin Mary, of the most abused man Jesus of Nazareth.

In plain English, reproduction appertains exclusively to the material earths, which are the ultimates of all spiritual spheres and worlds—the lowest, most outward and external of all the "many mansions" or planes of existence in the realms of thought, or known to human consciousness. Consequently, while natural generation—the reproduction of souls conjoined to animal human bodies—has its proper appropriate plane on the earth and in the earth; for there are corresponding invisible spheres, which are the sources of vitality, back to deity—the innermost of all spheres—and agents as angels in them, who are God's ministers—as parents are creators, in the place and stead of deity—intermediate and subordinate powers and principalities—as is the order of existences in the world we inhabit.

Human association exhibits ascending spheres from the most low and animal, to the most interior, intellectual and spiritual. The Shaker Order is but the innermost and central sphere on the earth.

"That which is born of the flesh is flesh;" and Jesus was as truly born of the flesh as were Adam and Eve, and as have been all their posterity.

"That which is born of the spirit is spirit;" and Jesus needed to be begotten and born of the Spirit as really as any other man of the race of Adam, before he could become a Son of God in the spiritual order of the resurrection.

Adam was a "Son of God" on the natural plane, by his first birth, and was as "holy a thing" as was the child Jesus. And it was as impossible for Jesus to be born the Christ—a spiritual being—as it was for Adam to have been born a spiritual being; that which is natural is first, and afterwards that which is spiritual. It is the only way that God can do things, because he is governed by law just as much as we are, or ought to be.

Right here must commence a line of demarcation between a believer of pure simple Christianity, and a Babylon christian, who mixes generation and regeneration, natural and spiritual, light and darkness, good and evil, and the good of one plane, with the good appropriate only to a different plane, together—thus making confusion or Babylon.

Without faith in Christ—interior to all earthly and generating spheres—visible or invisible—as the mediator between God, who is spirit, per se, and man who "also is flesh," there can be no spiritual begetting as "new birth" into the Christ sphere. For if Christ is the second Adam and Eve—a quickening spirit—it is just as impossible for any natural son or daughter of the race of the first Adam and Eve—Jesus included—to become a son or daughter of God—a spiritual man or woman—resurrected from the natural order of generation, up to the spiritual order of regeneration—except by a baptism of the second Adam and Eve, as a quickening spirit, to beget and bear them, such as Jesus was the subject of, as it would be for a natural child to be begotten and born, except through representatives—successors—of the first Adam and Eve; and it would be as unnatural and unreasonable to expect the first Adam and Eve to beget and bear all human beings, as it is for the generating Babylon christian to first call Jesus "the second Adam," and then look to him as their only and immediate spiritual Saviour and father, when he has left to them no spiritual posterity—no successors or representatives.

It is the Christ outside of the first Adam—that is, the great Mediatorial Sphere—the second or spiritual Adam and Eve—which is the agent to transfer all the forces and powers of man and woman from the natural to the spiritual plane of their existence.

Yea, "though I have known Christ after the flesh, as Jesus, yet now henceforth know I him no more," in that way.

In the Jewish generative heavens there were prophesyings, as there was on earth, of a human being who should be the first to be begotten from the dead order of the flesh into the living order of the Spirit. And when the event occurred, there came prophetesses and prophets from both the generative earth and the generative heavens, to announce the advent of the coming extraordinary man. Not that the prophets or angels of either sphere comprehended the significance of the event they celebrated—but, the Christ Spirit moving upon them, modified their utterances.

Of themselves they did not, could not understand the spiritual resurrection, of which Jesus was destined to be the first fruits; a specimen of what each and every one of the race, to which he belonged, might become in time or in eternity.

The Christ heavens were "far above all of the generative heavens" of these inquiring angels; hence they earnestly desired to "look into them," and to understand what the inspiring spirit in them did signify by the words of their own mouth.

The wise men of the East, and the angels, united in singing a joyful generative song. But how widely different was the "new song" of the resurrection, which John the Revelator heard while in a visionary condition, and of which he wrote—that was a song which no generative man or angel could learn; Jesus himself could not sing it until after John had baptized him with the Christ Spirit. When the Christ "Spirit descended in bodily shape as a dove," it claimed Jesus as the first begotten from the dead, the first born among many brethren, who confessed and forsook sin—all generative sin—the primary cause of all death—and called upon him to die to his generative life—that he might be quickened into a true Christ life—become a Christian.

Thus Jesus was born of a woman, under the Law; but was not born the Christ until thirty years of age. Of that second birth, the angels and the wise men of the East knew no more than Nicodemus, for no one could call Jesus by his spiritual name, unless like Peter, he had a similar baptism. And true Christians are only known to each other in that way. Antichrist adheres to the man, and ignores the Christ. "But as a living dog is better than a dead lion," so is a living elder of to-day of more value to a lost soul, in protecting, directing, and saving it, than all the dead saints of the past, Jesus and Ann included. He is of more value than a legion of angels without a medium. The father and mother of Jesus, when he lay in a manger, were better to him than would have been Michael and Gabriel, with all their angel companions.

The second appearing of Christ is necessary to lead us into a knowledge of the first appearing, as we are led into a knowledge of our natural ancestry, through the kind offices of our papillary nurse. Personal travel in the spiritual order of the resurrection will demonstrate to any soul the fact, that as is the union between Christ and Belial—flesh and spirit—so is the union of a genuine Shaker with the immaculate conception of Mary and the most holy generation of Jesus. As the baptism of fire burns up the generative life—the testimony of the Christ Spirit pierced, as a sword, through the bowels or womb of the Virgin Mary.

Reform.

"—is joined to idols; let him alone." Hos. 4, 17.

EDITOR OF THE SHAKER: The signs of the times emphatically point to a period in the future, when believers will, in all human probability, enjoy the blessing of a re-vitalization of all their now dormant energies; and, as we fondly hope and fervently pray, a rich harvest of honest and faithful workers, and an advent of spirits from the ranks of the sincere and sin-sick of the world, into our midst, who are more than satisfied, even disgusted with the low, groveling pleasures of the rudimental plane of existence. But I have a very strong impression, that before this glorious day of gladness and prosperity shall be ushered in, and a dispensation of truly spiritual growth, and development in purity, peace, and personal righteousness, be the unspeakable boon of Zion to enjoy, a thorough and radical Physiological Reform must indisputably precede. And this, inside of, as well as outside of Zion; and from the child of five years old, up to the octogenarian.

I am persuaded that, abnormal, unnatural, artificial stimuli, by which the passions and animal powers of man are terribly and ruinously intensified, far beyond the control of reason or religious conviction, and by which these are actually destroyed oftentimes, are now, and have been for years, the potent cause of our failure in obtaining valuable and reliable material from the world, wherewith to build up, support, and retain intact the interests and behests of this, our beautiful and glorious organization!

And parry the matter as we may, the truth must and will remain, that a holy spirit cannot exist in an unhealthy, physical organization. For instance, if one's blood, brain, nerves and muscles, are saturated with the narcotic principle of that filthy, detestable drug, tobacco, how is it possible that normal energy and activity of the spirit can be enjoyed, and that those calm heavenly inspirations should be accessible, which pure, healthy, physical structures are constantly blessed with.

O how excessively nasty and loathsome is the tobacco inebriate! I am weary unto death with the detestable practice of chewing and smoking tobacco among believers! But this is going but a very little way into the subject, and I fear I might encroach too narrowly upon the tender feelings of some, if I should define my ideas of sincere, physiological integrity in regard to food, drink, air, exercise and sleep; the only really therapeutic agents in the earth or sky. But really we shall be forced, ere long, to overhaul this whole subject, if the signs of the times are at all to be depended upon. Thousands, outside of our institution, are probing this terrible abscess on the vitals of society, to the very core, and coming into a conscientious, practical atonement, with physiological truth. These are upright men and women of God; determined, at all sacrifice, to live in holy allegiance to their convictions.

These are the salt of the earth, full of a sweet and salutary virtue; and if we, as a christian institution, desire an accession of such noble souls, to help us carry on to perfection the noblest, mental, moral and spiritual structure ever reared for the benefit and happiness of the race, then must we get right into the forefront of this great physiological conflict with time-honored errors, sinful habits and animal indulgences, and cleanse our temple of all filthiness of flesh and spirit; that when sin-sick and sin-ridden souls come into our midst, we can welcome them to an asylum of peace and righteousness, where, in deed and in truth, their highest, holiest aspirations for a sinless life can, and may be realized. How mortifying, not to say humiliating and shameful, to have to begin to apologize to one of these physiological reformers for our use of tea, coffee, tobacco and alcohol! For fourteen years we abjured these drugs, and why can we not do it now, since our illumination upon this subject is far greater than when we cheerfully submitted to their prohibition?

How often have I thought, how happy I should be, to be one of a family, or society, who, for ten consecutive years, would agree to abstain from tobacco, tea, coffee, flesh meat, and every species of intoxicating liquors, by way of experiment. It seems to me I am inspired by heaven itself, to see the perfect beauty of holiness, such a family would exhibit to the world, and enjoy among themselves! Just consider for a moment the present, terrible state of the world, through the instrumentality of artificial stimulation! It is absolutely frightful! One generation has followed another in an increase of indulgence in this abnormal process of stimulation, until the whole civilized world is a hideous mass of disease and sin, voluptuousness and lust, followed up closely and inexorably by the seething, red-hot indignation of insulted, violated, physiological law (which never forgives), in the shape of idiocy, crime, insanity and "suicide, to crown the black, infernal brood!"

This horrible excitement from poisonous drugs, beverages and improper aliments, develops the animal passions so precociously, that they blaze out in uncontrollable fury, far ahead of the normal, animal instincts; and still farther ahead of the reasoning and moral faculties; consequently, thousands of boys and girls are, every year, hopelessly ruined in body and soul, long before any instinct of self-preservation, moral or spiritual restraint, is possible to be brought to bear upon them, either by themselves or by their friends. Is it any wonder then, that out of such material scarcely any can be found who are able to live lives of uprightness and purity? And is it christian tenderness that would refuse to love, cherish and suffer for the restoration of such; or that would saddle upon them the entire iniquity and consequent responsibility of a hundred or a thousand generations of sinners before them? It is not. It is simply cruel and utterly uncharitable! Poor young creatures, may God and all heaven help you! And I will cheerfully add, what little I can do or say, for your reconstruction in holiness. Now, if we were living in a manner perfectly normal and natural, we should be able to furnish facilities for final, physiological perfection, and (gradually) spiritual redemption and reconstruction to these our unfortunate fellow-beings, which we never can furnish while allowing amongst ourselves iniquitous accessories to abnormal development. It is as if we were trying to baffle and restrain the unnatural and precocious development of impure and unholy tendencies, by one class of means and incentives, while we are keeping in activity another class directly calculated to stimulate and precociously develop these very tendencies.

Consequently, I am persuaded we should begin right here to lay the first stone of that sublime structure, which it is now full time to begin to build upon, and which is to exceed in glory, righteousness and beauty, all which up to this time, in the history of the world, have preceded it. In consideration of this momentous subject, and my bright anticipations thereupon, I feel happy in my unqualified endorsement of Elder Frederick Evans' sentiments relative thereto; and should be happy to see his theories, in regard to diet and physiological correctness, generally, fully experimented upon, for a number of years; still more, I should like to be one of a family who should volunteer therein.

Finally, may the Lord make his face to shine upon us, and, by the serene brightness thereof, may we be able to see our way clearly out of this present transition state, into the undimmed glory, prosperity and happiness of that "new cycle," to which we are all looking with such fond anticipation, is the sincere prayer of yours, faithfully,

O. C. HAMPTON.

Friendship.

It is commonly the case, when we meet with trials of our faith, to feel that we have no friends. But, do we realize what a true friend is? Are we able to appreciate true friendship? We all want friends; yet are quite unwilling, sometimes, to recognize them in those "who tell us of our faults and show us how to correct them." Those who are willing to bear with our faults, while we are exerting ourselves to overcome them, are true friends; while those who are indifferent to our evil ways, bad habits, unchristian behavior, etc., or who chastise us merely to display authority, are not our friends, but enemies to our souls' best good. To be worthy of the forbearance of true friendship, I realize I must give evidence of an improved disposition; that there is a proper length to forbearance—a point where mercy is encouragement to vice, rather than an illustration of Christian friendship. Those who are ever singing the need of more charity, are too often chanting desires for continued indulgences; while to grant them such charity would not be friendship; but rather, as President Lincoln expressed it, "mercy to the individual is murder to the State!"

Seed-time and Harvest.

Beneath the dark November sky,
With the cold rain falling drearily,
And the bleak wind moaning and shrieking by,
The seed o'er the land is cast;
In the grave-like furrows the grain doth lie
Till the weary months are past.

In eurling mist and frosty air,
And weeping skies, it lieth there;
Or buried in the snows; or bare
To every wind that blows,
And night's deep darkness, like despair,
Hangs o'er it while it grows.

It grows in spite of cloud and blast
And sullen rain, descending fast;
And snow-wreaths thickly o'er it cast,
And thund'rous dark'ning skies.
And every tempest, roaring past,
Strengthens it as it lies.

Anon, a kindlier season shines—
Warmth and light—the spring's soft signs,
With many a beauteous balsam, twines
The breast of icy death;
And the grain, in delicate, emerald lines
Springs up, a fairy birth.

Then sunny months, in swift career,
Bring up the lustrous ripened ear;
And the golden, harvest-time draws near
And the reaper whets his scythe;
Till on the day, the rich sheaves rear
Their shapes on the landscape blithe.

Sown in the dark, cold, desolate days—
Reaped in the sunshine's mellow blaze
Thus, in the dim and wondrous ways
Of fate, are the deeds of men—
Sorrow and trial, defeats, delays,
Like storms, that soften the grain,

Must test the heart's aspiring claim;
But every just and noble aim
Shall pass the ordeal, clear of blame;
And, in the appointed hour,
Bring forth its fruit of wealth or fame,
Of knowledge, wisdom, power.

In the winds of scorn, the storms of hate,
In the darkness of hope, deferred full late—
Through days when the world shows desolate,
Must sleep the good deeds thou hast done.
Patiently labor, patiently wait,
Thy work shall see the sun.

That which was sown in the wintry air,
Shall blossom and ripen when skies are fair;
Though thine should be many an anxious care
Ere the harvest is gathered in;
Be stout to toil, and steady to bear,
The heart that is true shall win.

To J. B. V. and others: We do not know, as yet, the price of J. M. Peebles' pamphlet, soon to be issued, entitled "Spiritualism, Shakerism, or Free Religion—Which?" but presume the same will be about or less than the subscription price of THE SHAKER. Let us have a few orders.

Sympathy.

There is a power pervading the entire Universe, which manifests itself variously, yet with quite similar results. That degree of it which permeates the solid spheres, flowing from each to each, and uniting them together in indissoluble bonds, has received a name significant of the influence exerted upon bodies of vast size and which are usually at immense distances from each other. Other degrees of it, more subtle than this, are no less potent, though they may not be so apparent to outward observation. That which exists in the vegetable world manifests itself in a great variety of forms—in grasses, shrubs, trees, fruits and flowers—yet there is in them all a similarity sufficient to determine the rank of the botanic kingdom in the scale of existences.

From the numerous aversions and repulsions displayed by mankind and the inferior orders of animal existence, one might infer there could be no common influence pervading the animal kingdom; yet the science of Animal Magnetism unmistakably proves its existence. Were there not any, man could not obtain control over the animals that he makes subservient to his use, nor be able to tame and dally with the most ferocious of beasts. And were there no common feeling of brotherhood among mankind, vain would be all efforts for the improvement and progress of the race, and our expectations of a world where harmony forever reigns would be idle dreams. It is not necessary to enter here into the numerous details of facts which the modern sciences of Psychology and Spiritualism furnish to prove the truth of one common influence pervading the entire race of man. These facts have been abundant, throughout the civilized world, for years, and are within the reach of all who desire to acquaint themselves with them.

There is a prominent doctrine of Christianity which this diffusion of a common or sympathetic influence serves to illustrate, and that is the doctrine of Christ's sacrificial offering. Jesus is said to have died for our sins, or, more correctly, on account of our sins; to have offered himself a sacrifice in our behalf. This has been construed as importing that he died to suffer the penalty of all the sins of mankind, from the first one that transgressed the divine law to the last of earth's inhabitants. The question is often asked how he, an innocent person, could have died on account of the sins of all men; how "the chastisement of our peace was laid on him, and the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all," unless it was to bear the penalty of sin in our stead. By his death is meant his crucifixion by the Jews and Romans; yet Jesus was not the only person who has suffered innocently. Many have died a more aggravated death than that of Jesus, for no offence whatever; but no one is so unreasonable as to suppose that a single transgressor of divine or human law could escape punishment because of the death of these; and only because Jesus has been regarded as the Supreme God, is infinite merit attributed to his death at the hands of his enemies. An outrage was committed against him by the bigoted persons that demanded his death, but Divine Justice holds even balances to re-weigh every human wrong. That "Jehovah should have made his soul or life an offering on account of sin," was but an evidence of infinite love, both towards Jesus and those in whose behalf he was offered; for he was to "see his seed, prolong his days, and the pleasure of Jehovah was to prosper in his hands."

Jesus certainly suffered on account of the sins of all men, and in their behalf. How? By sympathy with all as a human being. As one of us, he felt as we feel, participated in our miseries and shared our burdens, so as to be a "merciful and faithful High Priest." For our sakes as well as his own, "he endured the cross and despised the shame," throughout a life consecrated to God. Whatever iniquities of mankind were laid upon him, he offered up in sacrifice by means of his holy life of self-denial. The Apostle Peter says to Christians: "Ye are a holy priesthood to offer up spiritual sacrifices." In the same epistle in which these words occur, our English version makes him say, speaking of Jesus Christ: "Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree." The same verb—anenengkai—which the translators in the former passage have rendered to offer up, in the latter, without any sufficient reason, they have translated bare. Rendering this, as it should be, to bear up or offer up, the passage would read: "Who, himself, offered up our sins in his own person on the cross." Hence the propriety of the inference drawn, "that we, being free from sin, should live unto righteousness." Christ, as Head of the Church, offered up the sacrifices of sin in behalf of all men; his Church, also, offer up the same sacrifices in behalf of all. "Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow his steps."

Bearing or offering up the sacrifices of sin is not confined to Jesus Christ nor to his Church, but is common to the whole human race, by reason of the universal sympathy existing in the race—parents for their children, and children for their parents; brothers and sisters for each other; the skillful physician for his patients, who sometimes offers for both physical and moral diseases. Healing mediums among Spiritualists are obliged to make an offering for sin in behalf of those who apply to them for relief. Often, by magnetic sympathy with their patients, they undergo sufferings similar to those endured by the latter before a cure is effected. There never was a better example of sympathy with others and of offerings in their behalf, than that of Mother Ann. This was conspicuous throughout her whole ministration of the gospel of Christ. She frequently participated in the conditions of others, who were borne down by the weight of their sins and afflictions, even when they were miles away from her, to such a degree as to suffer extremely, both in body and spirit, on their account. And when they were lightened of their burdens, and she, in consequence, was filled with the joys of the Spirit, by ministrations from the heavenly world, they shared in her exceeding joy. By this she proved herself a true spiritual Mother.

The offerings of Mother Ann, as well as those of Jesus Christ, were intended to be final; that is, to remove sin and its consequences entirely from the Church; to raise every member of it from the sensuous to the spiritual life—from the life of earth to that of heaven. In their own case, the offering was complete; and the result, eternal redemption, has been experienced by each. If the Head is holy, so must the body be. The sympathy between Christ and his Church can be only that of souls saved from their sins and born into the life of heaven; who are wholly dis-severed from the wars and contentions of earth, its lusts, passions and pleasures, and live in the elements of peace and purity. Only when the Church is such, can it be a true sympathizing priesthood or medium for those sacrifices that bring eternal salvation to a sinning world.

Truth, Faith, and Reason.—No. 2.

God is truth. Truth is Increate—never began to be. It eternally was, and is, and will be the same unchangeable reality. How infinitely absurd then is it for man, who is but of yesterday, to try to alter or bend the truth to his inclinations?

We illustrate the eternity and ubiquity of Truth by the following mathematical problem: "The three angles of a triangle are equal to two right ones."

The truth of this relation of angles to one-another never began to be. It is eternal and ubiquitous. It exists equally in any and every imaginary portion of the universe. It is as unchangeable and omnipresent as Deity.

There are certain moral relations, which have been discovered or revealed, that are as fixed in Eternal and unchangeable Truth, as any mathematical problem whatever.

"A rich man cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." This is a truth revealed by Christ, and is a simple truism. It informs us that the principles of the Kingdom of Heaven or Christian institution, which he was about to establish, consisted in "Righteousness," a rigid equality of enjoyments, and that therefore a man possessing individual wealth could not enter or be admitted.

"Ye cannot serve God and Riches." Defining the "service of God," love, as we must, to signify that perfect devotion to the Divine will, which Christ taught and exemplified, then we say, that such "service of God," and the service of personal wealth can no more coexist and be performed by any intelligent being in man's condition, than two parallel lines can cross each other. Hence the impossibility of serving God as a Christian, and at the same time serving Mammon or possessing personal wealth.

The brotherly love, and perfect equality of enjoyments which Eternal Truth enjoins on Christians, forever debars them from the possession of individual wealth, and requires them to support a joint interest, and to have all their goods in common.

The possession of individual wealth, and equality of enjoyment, are forever repugnant one with the other. Therefore no man while holding individual wealth can ever enter into the Christian institution.

The generative order and Church order, or joint interest, are forever repugnant, and cannot coexist. The young man who came to Jesus, and all others who would be his followers, were required to divest themselves of all personal property, and were thus unfitted for raising offspring.

As the generative order necessarily requires a separate interest and the possession of personal property, it is forever repugnant to the Christ order which requires a relinquishment of personal wealth.

In the generative order, the man and woman are "one flesh," and their relation to each other is a flesh relation; but those joined to the Lord are "one spirit."

"The flesh lusteth against the spirit," that is, the flesh relation lusteth against the spirit relation. "And these two are contrary, one to another." The truth of this antagonism is eternal—it is founded in the very nature of things. They can never harmonize any more than truth and error.

"The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and these two are contrary to one another." The truth of this irreconcilable conflict between flesh and spirit, did not then begin to exist in the day when it was promulgated by Paul; it is eternal and ubiquitous—exists every where in God's universe.

The flesh relation existed from Adam to Moses, and from Moses to Christ. Unceasing efforts were made to bring it into order and subject it to law. "Divers washings" and carnal ordinances, with many restraints, were imposed by divine sanction, but all without success. The eternal truth was thus developed as declared by Paul, that "the carnal mind, the fleshly nature, is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." And witnessed by the Martyr Stephen. "Ye do always resist the holy spirit, as your fathers did, so do ye."

Thus an experiment extending through 4000 years, develops an unbroken testimony to the existence of an eternal truth—a fixed Law, that the flesh always resists the spirit.

Resolutions.

TROY, February 25th, 1872.

At a regular meeting of the Board of Trustees of the Progressive Spiritualists, of Troy, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we extend a cordial invitation to our Brothers and Sisters of the Shaker fraternity, residing in the Societies of Mt. Lebanon, Watervliet and other places, to join us in a two days' Convention (or Conference), in Troy, to be held on the 23d and 24th of March; to the end, that the ties of sympathy and love may be strengthened and extended between us, and the truth made manifest.

(Signed.)

B. STARKBUCK, President.
B. C. BARTO, Secretary.

This invitation has been accepted, and will be the occasion of a meeting of delegates, from various Shaker Societies, to a number exceeding forty.

We anticipate a beautiful piece of music, for May number of THE SHAKER, from Canterbury.

In a late number of Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly, we read with pleasure "The March of Events," accredited to a "Quaker Lady;" but we soon substituted, "By a Shaker Sister—A. Doolittle."

IN our leader of this number we use the terms "Spiritist" and "Spiritualist." The suffixes are synonymous; but some Spiritualists, and nearly all eminent lexicographers, make a marked distinction between Spirit-ists and Spirit-u-alists—one, Spiritists, determining merely the sensational phenomenologists,—who are content with table-tipping, raps, and all the physical movements made by spirit agency, but who do not strive to become pure and heavenly through its influence. In our leader we did not make this distinction as apparent as we might. Again, we intended to remark therein, that what is denominated modern Spiritualism, was, with us, a matter of prophecy thirty or forty years ago. Many eminent Spiritualists have seen the Shaker Societies in full operation in "the better land," before they knew of their whereabouts on the earth. Spiritualists take great pride in naming Robert Owen as one of their number; but the fact that he was converted to a faith in the unseen, by the mediumship of Daniel Offard, of Mt. Lebanon Shakers, is not commonly known, the details of which we hope to present at some future time. We give Spiritualism the largest credit for introducing Shaker theology to the attention of reformers, and we hope yet to admit that it has been the most successful medium for accomplishing the fruits that grow from real, Christian self-denial.

ANN LEE once prophesied, that she saw individuals flocking to the standard, of which she was bearer, by hundreds and by thousands! In view of the few representatives of Shaker principles, this sounds oddly enough; but there have been millions flocking to the doors of our theology for many years—the prophecy is more than fulfilled in a very marvelous and encouraging manner.

J. M. Peebles and Dr. E. C. Dunn spent an agreeable season at Watervliet, N. Y., on the 26th of February. An impromptu Society meeting was called, and all moved satisfactory to all who participated.

FIFTY CENTS PER ANNUM.

Saviours,

Analyzed, signifies persons or things which save. Salt is a preservative; and individuals, who are "Saviours come to Zion," have been alluded to as "the salt of the earth." The aspiration of every spiritually inclined soul, is to be saved. Salvation, to the multitudes, signifies an escape from a just penalty—having been wicked, to avoid punishment. This is folly. "He shall save his people from their sins;" but never in their sins! The power to be a Saviour presupposes the individual saved. A drowning man is in no condition to help, much less of saving a companion in a similar plight. Physicians have no right to be sick; when they are so, they are no longer qualified to help the sick. What lever and fulcrum have parents, with bad habits, to arrest and correct those same habits in their children?

The name Saviour, like the title Christian, is good for nothing unless accompanied by evidences of its work. Shakers are called to be Saviours—and this call of the spirit should be accompanied by the qualification of themselves being saved. Are we saved from the lusts and vices of the world? Therein are we the empowered agents to work for others. Are we free from all vicious habits which we know would disgrace a saint? Can we, from practical experience, bear testimony against worldly pride, fancy fooleries; against patent medicines and all other medicines? Can we be abused and not feel to return it? Do our ideas of being the inhabitants of Zion consist as really in soul-consecration to Christian principles, as in the hope and love of reward for some crosses we fully take upon ourselves? Do we ever balance the crosses we endure, with the increase of the Gospel, which leads unto full salvation from every pernicious habit—every worldly way? Truly, we can number Saviours among us! Jesus was and is a Saviour, inasmuch as his life and invitation yet are seen and heard: "Follow me!" The hope that God will dispense salvation unearned, is supreme folly. We know that all the salvation we experience, from evils that have afflicted us, has been obtained by severe and constant labor, aided by the examples and influences of those already saved.

The world, to-day, needs Saviours more than aught else. Belief in one, three or many Gods will avail nothing. God saves souls by giving them instruction how they can be saved, and blessing them with the help of individuals already saved—not otherwise. Let those who prate about salvation, from week to week, but give their congregations evidences of their salvation from sin, by living a clean, holy, self-denying life, as did their humble exemplar—Jesus; then will there be less sound and more salvation. God calls for volunteers to fill the ranks of Saviours to the race, even as was Jesus; and the required credentials are, be ye saved. Rise, Believers, in the majesty of your faith, and give evidence of your Saviourships by an increasing, personal salvation; not alone in one particular, but in a fully redeemed character—

Is Man a Fallen Being?

BY GILES B. AVERY.

1. If man hath never fallen, then he hath no sin, for sin premises a departure from rectitude, or uprightness, that is, a violation of a known law of God.

2. If there is no sin in the world, then there is no spiritual darkness or death! Do spiritual life and light universally prevail and become generally manifest?

3. If there is no sin in the world, then there can be no sorrow, for sin is the cause of all sorrows that mankind know. Sorrow is suffering for the violation of law! Is there no sorrow among mankind?

4. Spiritual death is the consequence of sin! If there is no spiritual death in the world, then there is no resurrection from the dead. The English word resurrection, is from the Greek word, "Anastasis," which literally means to stand up again. How can that stand up again which never hath fallen down from an upright or standing position? Christ said: "I am the resurrection." If there be no fall, consequently no resurrection, then Christ spake falsely, and hath come in vain. But are all mankind spiritually alive? And do they stand spiritually upright?

5. If there is no spiritual darkness, the fruit of sin, then Christ is not "the light of life!" as the Scriptures declare. But every true follower of Christ can testify to the truth of his words.

6. If there is no spiritual darkness among men, the fruit of sin, then the testimony of Jesus, "This is the condemnation that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil," must have been falsehood, for condemnation is the fruit of sin! But, alas, how many millions suffer condemnation!

7. If there is no sin, sorrow nor condemnation, then all our senses belie us.

8. If man hath not sinned, then he is not lost, and needs no salvation! And Jesus Christ, as a Saviour, hath been vainly sent upon earth, for there is nothing lost to save, and when Jesus Christ declared "I came to seek and save that which is lost," he spake foolishly. The language should have been, "I came to seek and save that which never hath been found nor developed!"

9. If man hath not fallen from rectitude, then the present work of generation among men is perfect, or the Scriptures belie the character of Noah, who, it is said, "was perfect in his generations." For the Scriptures declare the present race of man to be the descendants of Noah. Is it the general understanding of mankind that they are perfect in their generations? Nay, verily! The corruption of generation is the crying sin of our whole race!

10. If man hath not sinned and fallen, the whole law and the Prophets are a deception, for they all recognize gross sin in the human family.

11. If man hath not fallen, then the whole Gospel plan for man's redemption from a fallen state is a myth, and God has made a great mistake of man's needs, in commissioning Christ to preach such a gospel.

12. If man hath not fallen, all the testimony of Jesus, concerning tares in the Gospel field, is false, and the whole field is good wheat, though not fully grown! What does universal experience say to this?

13. To deny the fall of man, is to deny the whole revelation of God to man (so called), manifested in both the Old and New Testament Scriptures.

14. If man hath not sinned and fallen, there is no regeneration necessary, because there is no degeneration from which to be regenerated, since, according to this theory, man hath nothing lost.

15. If man hath not sinned and fallen, then the peaceable state of the kingdom of Christ, anticipated by the prophet, when the lion and the lamb should lie down together, is now reigning on the earth, or God created man in a state not good, that is, not in harmony with creation at large! But, does universal peace now reign?

16. If man hath not fallen and sinned, then the brute is not fallen, and man is his Lord invariably, and the whole brute creation is his willing subject. But, is it so?

17. If man hath not fallen, then the whole testimony of taking the kingdom of Heaven by force, as manifest by Jesus, is falsehood; because Heaven is man's pristine home, or God created him in misery! Hence there would have been no need of a warfare to take it!

18. If man hath not fallen, then either the harvest of the world, instituted by Christ, is prematurely commenced, and God did unwisely to send his Son to inaugurate that dispensation, or, being instituted, and souls, by the voice of God, being called to come into it, through God's viceregents on earth, all souls would immediately obey the command of God, as the next step in their normal and legitimate development, which they do not do.

19. If man hath not fallen, then as do the waters cover the sea, so doth the knowledge of God cover the earth. For, it would be cruel in God to create an intelligent, accountable being, and make that being punishable for not obeying His will, and then not reveal that will to him until myriads of ages after his creation! But does the knowledge of God thus cover the earth?

20. Verily, man is in darkness, loss, sin, sorrow and woe, and very much needs salvation and redemption! And, to deny it, is to deny all revelation of God to man, of which we have any record or experience. It is to make Noah, Moses, all the Jewish Prophets and historians, John the Baptist, Jesus, all the Prophets and Apostles of the New Testament Scriptures, liars and blasphemers! It is also to deny all present experience; for there is not a living man, but recognizes, in some degree, both himself and his fellows have transgressed some known law of right, for which a degree of condemnation is resting upon the soul, until confessed and repented of.

Shaker Communism.

When Elder Frederick was in England last summer, people got impatient at his dissertations on Bible history and spiritual doctrines. They desired to know what Shakerism could do for them physically; how easily and comfortably it could fill their bellies and clothe their backs, and enable them to provide themselves with those conjugal relationships which are so highly prized amongst mankind generally. Thus there was a decided misunderstanding between the Shaker missionary and his auditors. They looked at the subject from the side of the flesh, while the Elder viewed it from a spiritual aspect. The history of communistic efforts exhibits the fact that these schemes have been founded in all instances upon the physical appetites of man, rather than the spiritual principles of his nature. Hence, the Shakers say, that no form of communism has been able to perpetuate itself, except that of their order. Numerous communities have been established, but they have all eventually been broken up through selfishness and anarchy. The Shakers avoid such a calamity by adhering to their principles, which they consider to be as scientific as any functional law in physiology.

The little work before us* is partly historical and partly scientific. It treats of certain peculiarities of man's spiritual constitution, the observance of which constitutes the essence of religion, and reviews the progress of this religious life from its early dawn amongst the primitive peoples. Historically, Elder Evans accepts the Bible narrative, perhaps more as a symbol of man's spiritual experience, than as a chronological record of mundane facts. From this source he divides man's spiritual efforts into four dispensations or churches. During the first, which ended with the flood, man fell. The function of generation given to man for a use, was abused by him. This constituted "the forbidden fruit," and therefore the fall of man. The second, or Patriarchal era, commenced with Abraham, on whom was enjoined the right of circumcision, and procreation, though permitted, had to be atoned for as a sin. Jesus introduced the third dispensation, or First Christian Church, of which Love was the soul or life, and community of property the body or outward form. The fourth era was instituted in the person of Ann Lee, who, on the part of the female side of humanity, received the Christ baptism, and inaugurated the order of the male and female capable of living in accordance with the requirements of this fourth dispensation.

So much, then, for the historical part of the work: next comes the anthropological or scientific. The Elder regards man as a spiritual being with access to the spirit-world. These dispensations have been the results of revelation, originating in the spirit-world, and afterwards becoming part of the life of mankind. By the inauguration of these eras man was successfully enabled to commune with still higher degrees of spirit-life, and therefore able to manifest more spirituality in his outward nature. "In this fourth dispensation," says Elder Frederick, "is established the final church and kingdom of Christ which possesses the 'Urim and Thummim,' and therefore cannot be deceived or overthrown by evil or ignorant spirits." The ostensible purpose of the book is to afford "tests of divine inspiration," whereby those having communion with the spirit-world may be able to decide as to the purity of the matter communicated. The test recommended is the acknowledgment, on the part of the spirits, of the "Christ principle," which teaches self-denial, purity, and fraternity; and he adds, "the practical effort of this church is the entire banishment of poverty and want, sin and misery, and a full supply of physical and spiritual necessities for the body and soul of every one of its members." The one essential evil to be controlled is the sexual function. "He who teaches that Christ and generation can coalesce is deceived, or is a deceiver."

It therefore appears why it is necessary to introduce so much theology and religion into the discussions of Shakerism; for that part of the book treating of religion makes it apparent that Shakerism is the practice of a purely religious life, in which the functions of animal existence are used only in so far as may be necessary for the physical sustenance of the individual. The Shakers are thus ruled, as to their head, by spirits from the "Christ sphere," and therefore they consider themselves as much in the spirit-world, and living as near to its laws, as if they were divested of their bodies.

Such then, is a condensed view of the principles of this book, which is a text-book of Shaker doctrines. It is a very interesting and suggestive little work. There is scarcely one word which could be omitted. The author possesses a terse and perspicuous style, and his very apt introduction of texts and quotations throws a great amount of light upon the meaning of many passages of Scripture which seem to be perfectly misunderstood by the usual expositors. We consider this work of so much interest to our readers, that we give them the opportunity of purchasing it with this month's Human Nature at half the published price.—Human Nature (Eng.).

Revelation.

BY ELIJAH MYRICK.

The ever-developing law of necessity, implanted in our being, demands perpetual revelation: for "the eye is never tired of seeing, nor the ear with hearing," nor the living soul with new inspirations.

The Scriptural, the sacred, the prophetic and commonly accepted word of God, as relates to the spiritual, have their votaries with all shades of belief—their skeptics and infidels. Yet all are believers in present revelation in the material world; no one doubts the revelations, through the science of astronomy, which tells with unerring certainty, the motion of the planets with such accuracy that an eclipse is foretold with mathematical precision years before its occurrence; the evidence is undeniable, though the mystery of the science may hang like a miracle before the vision.

All discoveries, inventions, improvements in the arts and sciences, are so many revelations emanating from the same source as the spiritual. Mind transmits from the world of causes to the world of effects; these being objective to the sensuous vision, impel universal belief.

Who doubts the revelation to Columbus of a new world, which permeated and inspired his whole being, enabling him to confront calumny and all manner of derision; stay the hands of a mutinous crew, till the physical vision confirmed his soul inspiration and gave us this land of the free—God's reservation from the tyrant's rule, where "the meek begin to inherit the earth?"

The acknowledgment of revelation in the terrestrial world is universal; admits of no issue, no shade of opinion, it being a legitimate supply of a demand.

But why has spiritual revelation come into such disrepute when the spiritual has always gone parallel with the material, or followed close in its wake ("first the natural then the spiritual") yet unrecognized? Because people of sincere motives, in all ages, through a false punctuation, have put a period or an exclamation in place of an interrogation or comma, or where the subject indicated no pause; and intolerance, the child of ultra veneration and twin brother to selfishness, saw fit to stamp with eternal infallibility what was proper to the child development of the race, or perhaps mere local circumstance. And bigotry has handed down this hermetically sealed dogma, declaring it to be the ultimatum of all spiritual intercourse or revelations; hence the darkness of the sun of spiritual revelation.

The human family is like a child in a continued series of revelations; and what is proper to one age is not always adapted to another; like the rounds of a ladder, the first is necessary to the succeeding.

"Except ye become as a little child ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." Little children are artless truth seekers, always inquiring, desiring to learn; importuning, impatient to solve all objective problems and incorporate into their experience; then again pursue their interrogations in response to new impulses and aspirations. This demands present and continued revelations. Such, Jesus said, were the subjects of the kingdom of heaven.

"Marvel not that I said unto you ye must be born again;" born of the spirit, to enter the kingdom of heaven as a little inquiring child, a disciple learner of the spiritual alphabet, and through it, the science of the spiritual heavens.

Would it not discover sublime ignorance and idiotic obstinacy to contend that repeating the alphabet by rote was the culmination of all literary acquirements, and that it revealed all that these letters were intended for, or capable of? when it is by their ever-varying combinations that they convey intelligence from mind to mind. So is it with spiritual induction in this ever-recurring, infinite combination, conveying a knowledge of truths adapted to our present conditions and circumstances, instead of the old, bottled-up, traditional, time-hallowed theology. The spirit world is progressive; and its denizens, like mortals, cannot impart what they have not acquired. Mortals have expected too much perfection from its early manifestations, and through an excess of veneration, made them objects of worship; hence they became dead to the ever living present. Much of the revelations held most sacred, are the experiences of departed spirits in various stages of progression; and if we go with them they will give us better experiences; but if we entomb and worship them, they become our hitching post on the highway of progression.

John the revelator received an instructive admonition, when he fell at the feet of the spirit who was communicating with him, to worship him. "And he said unto me, see thou do it not: I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus; worship God, for the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." Worship the source of this testimony and prophecy, but not the medium. Worship the primary cause —intelligence—perfected mind. For according to the best authority, "in the beginning was mind, and mind was in the beginning with God, and the mud was God." And mind was revealed to man, and he became a living soul—a reasoning, reflecting and accountable being. This first and greatest revelation is the unqualified essayer of all others.

All the revelations in the material world affecting man's physical wants, have been eagerly appropriated, while only of late the science of the spiritual world was almost entirely ignored. No wonder Jesus, in attempting to introduce his spiritual philosophy, exclaimed: "O fools and slow of heart, to believe all that the prophets have spoken."

"Ye read the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me. And ye will not come to me that ye might have life." The inference is, that they adhered to their old traditions, instead of recognizing in him the culmination of the prophecies. His invitation is: "Come on, we have outgrown the past;" and then, as if to forestall infallibility, adds, and "greater works than I do shall yet be done."

If all revelation were in the past, it shows poor design in placing the eyes in the fore part of the head, or giving the feet the direction they have. The physical, mental and spiritual vision, prophecy forward, onward, upward.

True prophecy is a science, by which the higher intelligences reveal to faith, what experience will record in the book of knowledge. "Where there is no vision the people perish," is the natural sequence of the "blind leading the blind." John saw a woman clothed with the sun, the direct source of light and heat; and the moon under her feet—standing above or upon all semi or reflected lights; wanting the heat of the sun, of direct revelation to permeate and vitalize into life.

"The children of this world are wiser than the assumed children of light." Though each man's invention is patent to himself, the label of infallibility would not be worth the printing, as the records of present revelation in inventions, and daily improvements on the past will testify.

Every new era, cycle or dispensation is prophetic of progress; and the bigot that would arrogate and dogmatize its life into a fossil, finds his parallel in the poor ignorant emigrant trundling all his earthly goods in a wheelbarrow, denying that there is any improved method of transit; while the earth-vibrating locomotive at his heels shakes the libelous falsehood out of his mouth.

We need more of the childlike spirit that asks the simple truth and seeks its revelations daily; we must have the living testimony of Jesus, the spirit prophecy. The subscription to the gospel of progress adds nothing to that of the gospel of salvation; we have both at one price. The children of light are growing wiser; to them by-gone inspirations are like flowers without fragrance; though real, they have diffused their life. The children of this world are exceedingly wise; they will not trust to the vision of Solomon, his wisdom nor his gold. They have vision to gratify, wisdom to emulate, and a passion to appropriate gold to themselves. "The children of this world are," but by what authority shall they always be "wiser than the children of light?"

SPIRITUALISM—THE CHARACTER OF JESUS CONSIDERED—CONVERTING THE HEATHEN—SOME GOOD IDEAS FOR THE CHURCHES—REMARKS OF ELDERS EVANS AND LOMAS.

Among the persons in attendance at the late Conference of the Shakers and Spiritualists in this city, were Elder Evans, of the Lebanon Shaker Society, and Elder Lomas, of the Watervliet Society. Both are esteemed as Leaders among their peculiar people, and from the addresses which they delivered here during the Conference we have selected two, which set forth somewhat at length their views upon religious questions. They will be found interesting:

SERMON BY ELDER LOMAS.

"Watchman, what of the night?"—"The morning dawns."

Spiritual Friends: I draw some delightful inferences from this assemblage of familiar spirits. I have a larger faith that there is greater good in humanity; even a zeal for the truth, and an increased desire to live it. Shakers and Spiritualists mutually conferring upon what truth is, what its demands, and who are its most obedient subjects! How shortly the time when this happy conference was deemed an impossibility! Truly, "the morning dawns;" the world does move! If there ever were a people, whom those who are properly denominated "the world" have despised, that people are the Shakers. If there was ever an organization which the popular religions of this or any other age were quite willing should be enjoyed by its own members alone, that organization is the Shakers. And yet, if there is a living demonstration of greater spirituality—a greater fervency to know the truth and to live it; if there is a stronger testimony against, and opposition to sin; popular, but erroneous theologies, human woes, and unspiritual practices; then I am here, a willing listener, to learn of the way; to make its precepts the life-line of my conduct; to be thereby a better Spiritualist—one who "walks in the spirit, and fails to fulfill unspiritual lusts."

The Shakers date their distinctive existence from Ann Lee. You have heard of the carpenter's goodly son; Ann Lee was the beautiful daughter of a blacksmith. There has been none foolish enough yet, to surround her conception and birth with anything miraculous. "Many daughters have done virtuously;" but Ann Lee's system of virtue has been elevated too high for worldly reach or admiration; and to the world it is there still—if obtained, it is by an exertion upwards. She was the spiritual medium for the introduction of those organizing principles that made up and sustain Shaker societies. In view of some of our social regulations, we have been termed "woman-haters!" and by the same vituperative class, we have been branded as the "fanatical followers of an old woman!" "Consistency, thou art a jewel." Spiritualists, and hate a woman! better ask us to worship a monstrous three-headed God, whose subjects make the best fighting material the world ever saw.

How false these charges are, we will not waste time to advert, but will assure you that we are the followers of no mere man nor woman that ever lived; and we will not admit that any have greater love for woman than ourselves. We love her so well that we are anxious that she shall become as good, pure and angelic as the heavens; and no desire of ours shall ever soil her spiritual aspirations; and if woman becomes angelic, we are determined to be there too.

But "Watchman, what of the night?" The age in which we live is not yet remarkable for its religious enthusiasm—religious zeal is not prevalent. The spiritual faculties are not roused. Revivals "are few and far between"—those that knew an existence have died for want of breath. The speculative, the acquisitive, united with the inventive and discoverable, demand a large attention, while the senses receive a support beyond my power or wish to estimate. The multitudes seek daily, joys that are earthly, and how they may obtain "the almighty dollar," while very few are deeply concerned in "What shall I do to be saved?" Hence, on the planes of genius, of self-gratification and aggrandizement, there is light, there is a brilliancy. But upon themes of spiritual life, of eternal growth and practice, darkness is prevalent, and humanity seems swayed into a callousness that makes the spirit's voice almost unheard, unfelt, unknown. We go to church; this is honorable, fashionable and proper. We there hear much theological teaching, but experience only a little practical religion, for one is not the other. Religion is life—eternal life; and so certain is there an eternal life, so sure is there a theology that teaches how to live this life. Amidst the cries of "Lo, here! and Lo there!" darkness has flourished, the night has seemed almost profound. Images for worship have nearly everywhere been elevated—thus have we seen Moses and Mahomet, Confucius and Jesus. These very names are adored, while the characters which made these individuals objects of esteem seem unworthy a consideration. Idols of fashion and objects of lust sweep unrelentingly against spiritual aspiration; and thus, in the nineteenth century, idolatry is almost universal; erroneous theology prospers, but religion—the elevating, spiritual kind—is at a very great discount.

The man Jesus occupies a prominent place before the multitudes to-day; the masses bow in reverence to his name. The crucifix, emblematical of the manner he met His physical death, is also an object of worship. To these, millions look for their eternal salvation, while just so many are doomed to disappointment. Jesus was the medium of the Christ Spirit for the introduction of spiritual truths. Through the influence of this spirit He became a most noted theologian—He taught the science of true religion; more, He practiced spirituality and realized that the Gospel was "the power of God unto salvation" from His sins. It has been asserted that Shakers and Spiritualists ignore Jesus. For the Shakers, I deny the charge. We love Jesus Christ, the first-born Spiritualist and very honorable Shaker. He taught an exceeding self-denial, illustrating in His life that its results were an exceeding spirituality. Jesus, under the influence of the Christ Spirit, is "the way, the truth and the life-example" of true Spiritualists; but without the baptism of the Christ, I have just as much honor, and no more, for Jesus, than for the millions of ancient Jews whom I have never seen!

The human mind, clouded by constant draughts of sensual pleasure, never will be illuminated until it enters the church of true Spiritualism, and there learns that true theology is true to life. For he is a fool who believes that even God can save him from the just rewards of his service to sin, unless he repents and lives differently. No more solid truth does Spiritualism teach, than "that every human tub shall rest on its own bottom;" and let the millions of Christian heathens prepare to face the music! But, "Watchman, what of the night?" There is a light breaking through the clouds of darkness, and the wise are taking advantage of it. Those that were dead are alive again; the lost are found. They return and tell us they are not in the graves of clay and sand; more, they tell us they never have been there: and more, that an attempt to bottle lightning would be as fruitless as to put them there! So-called orthodoxies, which find exponents in some Baptist churches, in other churches, and in some Young Men's Associations, cry aloud: "We don't believe it." And truth remains whether they do or not; for the bell of their monstrous theologies is cracked by the spirit's return, and the light is shining through. They can never ring those theologies as of yore, even in their chimes, without divulging the mortifying but delightful truth that they are so badly cracked by the light of Spiritualism as to be entirely useless!

"The morning dawns!" We have seen the patriotic elements stirred to their very foundations. We have heard the guns of Sumter, and have witnessed the uprising of a mighty nation. If the patriotism of humanity can be so ruffled, why may not the spiritual elements be excited? We claim that they may, and that we as self-denying Spiritualists must set the ball rolling. If the God of the Jews can use the thunders of Sumter for the emancipation of the physically enslaved, cannot the God of the Christian Spiritualist use elaps of spiritual thunder to wake up the sleeping, and the dead in darkness and sin; and for the cleansing of the atmosphere in that far better day that shall disenthral the millions of theology-stuffed, but religiously-starved souls, called Christians? "The morning dawns!" The spirit of inquiry is unfolding itself as never before, and this reveals large dissatisfactions with existing theologies that have no religion in them. Honest souls say: "We went to church to be fed; we returned hungry, with no more power to take up our crosses, no more salvation from our besetting sins; we went to drink, and returned worse than dry!" And these individuals come to the conclusion that popular churches would make very good sepulchers for dead men, but are no place for the living. What follows? They become infidelic—this is the first work of Spiritualism—it makes of its subjects thorough infidels to preposterous errors. This was what made Franklin, Paine and Jefferson what they were; Parker and Peebles, your Starbuckses, Waters, McCoyes and others, honest engineers of unpopular truths; this is what persuaded Ann Lee, Elder Evans, Abraham Lincoln and an innumerable host of honest men and women to be what they were—thorough infidels to man-made creeds! And blessed are such infidels.

The call of the spirit is for progress, and no progress is more necessary for humanity than a belief in and reliance upon the revelation of the holy spirit to-day. We may use the revelation of the past to stand upon, but we must lean, more, press forward to hear the voice of God speaking to-day. Why need we rely on Hebrew bounties, while from all around, more truthful revelations are daily unfolding? Here is one of the fruits of condemnation—men choose the darkness of past ages, rather than the spiritual light of to-day, for very obvious reasons. Can we vitalize our souls with the bread of the ancients? Never! Yet this is what millions are trying to do, forgetful of the living present. Souls have grown since then, so have their necessities. The yesterdays have gone, let them go; let us use them only the more effectually to draw out the present; let us do them homage only as far as they speak truth to the soul. Wisdom did not die with the ancients. God speaks to us as fatherly, more motherly, and as frequently as to the ancient prophets, and it is through the influences of present revelations that we look to see torpor and darkness, the sting of death and the victory of the grave destroyed. When we all shall ask for spirit aid as a necessity—as "give us our daily bread," then will it be forthcoming in abundance, as the sweet bread of heaven, and as fountains of living waters, ever refreshing, ever vitalizing. The natural manna answered its purpose very well, but give us the life-giving substance of the spirit to-day. The baptisms of John were positive essentials to his Judean followers; but give us a refreshing shower, as a baptism of the holy spirit, and we care not if all the fonts and ducking holes are as distant as the Red Sea.

"The morning dawns," teaching us to say our prayers and to do them—to ask for the kingdom of heaven on earth, and to deny ourselves of every unheavenly practice. To profess less, and possess more of the divine spirit of true religion, which will make of us "new creatures" of light, and work out in our lives the purity of the angels. Said Wesley: "I am sick of opinions; let us have good works, and the faith of practical benevolence." Was not Wesley a better Spiritualist than his pretended followers? When we yield ourselves to the inspirations of the angel-life, we see how dark are the century-mossed systems of the past. By this life, we learn that if we would be more spiritual, we must be less sensual. It teaches the truth of our father and mother—God. It shows the uselessness of war on the plane of spirituality, where the causes of war—the lusts of the flesh—are being daily crucified. It makes us dissatisfied with theologies that would teach us to be content with mortal pleasures and carnal indulgences; and opens our eyes to the Christ plunisphere where the resurrection of life is established, and where an exceeding self-denial is the powerful lever for its accomplishment.

And the watchman answered, "The morning dawns!" We see it dawning by the progress of spiritual truth in the churches, and particularly out of them. We see it in the call of the spirit to the millions of Spiritualists to "come up to a higher life!" We see its light in this tottering power of Rome, in the foolish dogmas of "Immaculate Conception" and "Papal Infallibility;" in its excommunication of thousands of its former subjects, who are almost ready for Spiritualism. We see it in the downfall of empires, and the purification of republics; in the eternal separation of church and state; in the exclusion of "God" and "Christ," "Virgin Mary," "Ann Lee" and the "Methodist Church" from the constitution of the United States. We see the dawning of the better day in the excitement over woman's wrongs and woman's rights—her wrongs of oppression, and her rights to do as she pleases, when she pleases to do rightly.

In the trial of Theodore Cuyler we see light, and in the apologetical manner of rendering the verdict against a woman's opening her mouth where Theodore Cuyler does his, shows the day is not distant when the question of woman's having a soul will be settled in the affirmative. We believe these very same sticklers for church government, who have been so fearful lest woman in the pulpit should create a breach of Divine injunctions, would be among the first to violate her rights as a physical being; and while abusing her privilege of being true to her womanly instincts, they would exclude her soul from heaven, were it possible to get a man to go to heaven and stay there without her! Having given woman a representative in the Godhead, we look to see her rights effected entire; and then, if she aspires to fill the White House in Washington, or the White Throne in heaven, the same will be her right, as really as her rights now are supposed only to extend, to the filling and rocking of the cradle.

In the face of the light of present revelation, we protest against the prostitution of the so-called heathens, by the promulgation of the most erroneous doctrines the world ever knew. While these heathens, so-called, are living better lives than the majority of missionaries sent among them, we call up Bergh, or some more active humane power, to arrest the infliction of these theological barbarities. Rather than a God should send men and women to teach of the atoning blood of Jesus; of a triune monstrosity; of a physical resurrection of the body, and hundreds other non-essentials to a pure life; as men and women, we had better hang up that god and let the heathen go; or rather, call upon the heathen to convert these barbarian missionaries!

"The morning dawns." The Spiritualists have accompanied the Shakers in many degrees of spirituality; they have untrammelled their souls from many burdensome obstacles; and yet the call is for progress. We present for their kindly consideration the following radical propositions, from the Shaker standpoint:

1. That marriage is an honorable institution; but that it is an earthly, not a spiritual relation. Angels do not marry.

2. That the flesh is opposed to the spirit; the engagement in fleshly lusts is unbecoming the progressive Spiritualist.

3. That private property, war, riches, poverty, pride and worldly ambition originate with unspiritual lusts, and will be discontinued when these lusts are done away.

4. That the life of the angels constitutes Heaven; and that same life will introduce the millennium on earth.

5. That salvation from sin, and the enjoyment of eternal life are realities that can be enjoyed here on earth, as in the spiritual world. That salvation from sin means the cessation of sinful practices, and not an evasion of merited punishment; and that eternal life is an unchangeable condition—having had all elementary conditions removed from it.

Standing on these bases, and the cry comes, "Watchman, what of the night?" We will answer: "There is no night: all is concert, all is Summer—we have reached eternal day!"

ADDRESS BY ELDER EVANS.

THIS AND THAT.

The revelation of to-day is the key to revelation in the past. Upon this rock the church of Christ must be built as its foundation to rest upon—not upon the record of a former revelation. How absurd for one generation to ignore revelation and spirit communion; holding them impossible for their attainment; while implicitly believing that some previous generation was open to them in the fullest degree! Spiritualism comes to remove this absurdity; and to explain the mysteries of the Spiritualistic history of Jesus and the Apostles.

All the miracles—so termed—become miraculous, as the growing of the grass, and the falling of a stone, or the continued suspension of the earth in space, are miraculous. And the conclusion is reached, that either these things were not performed by reason of the divinity of Jesus, or that his Apostles and such as shall do "greater works than these," are also divine beings—Gods.

Possession of spiritual gifts and powers proves that persons may be Christians, not that they are so—wanting these gifts cuts off the claim altogether—but not at all does Christianity prove infallibility. Like Adam, or John the Baptist, Jesus was born a natural man—a generative man. Not until born again of the Christ-spirit could he say in truth, "I am the way, the truth, the life"—"I am the resurrection."

The popular error is, to make Jesus all that he was, or all that they claim him to be, by means of his superior generation—a fatal error—that deprives Jesus of his chief crowning glory. Abstinence, self-abnegation, self-denial, persevering adherence to principle, by means of which he formed his own character (just as all men can do or have done) up to his Christ Baptism: and then the same regeneration—travail—that awaits all who shall

"follow him" into the holy of holies, the inner heavens; as it also deprives humanity of the great comfort, encouragement and hope implied in the exhortation: "Be of good cheer, for I have overcome the world." If he was born a Christian—an utter impossibility—he is our inferior; we, who have "fought the good fight, kept the faith," and overcome by means of "Christ within" us, have done what he never did. He may have possessed the innocence of childhood, of an unbodied Angel, but not that sturdy, manly innocence which has been attained under the hammer of temptation, and in the fiery furnace of affliction.

Being the first—"treading the wine-press alone"—may somewhat balance the ante-natal superior advantages of his class. He was subject to his own parents, who did not comprehend the spiritual impressions impelling him, and foreshadowing the future work, on a higher plane than the natural, which they occupied.

As a natural man, Jesus had to learn Judaism—a natural law applicable to the material world. 1. The law of physiology—no sickness. 2. The law of property—no monopoly or usury. 3. The law of reproduction—use, not indulgence. 4. The law of war—force—right against wrong.

When Moses killed the Egyptian, that was war on the lowest plane—physical force.

Mediumship War.—When Jonathan with his armor-bearer defeated a whole host, saying, "There is no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few."—1 Samuel, 14, 6. When Gideon discharged twenty-two thousand men from his army, leaving ten thousand, the Jewish God still said, "The people are yet too many." "By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thy hand; and let all the other people go every man into his place."—Judges 7. And with the three hundred men, with trumpets, lamps and pitchers, Gideon created a Bull Run panic in Midian, and a hundred and twenty thousand men fell, mostly by their own swords.

Sampson, with the jaw-bone of an ass, slew a thousand men; and then a spring opened in the jaw-bone, and he drank of it. That was medium war.

Jesus also was thus inspired in cleansing the temples.—Matthew 21, 12. Jesus went into the temple and cast out all them that bought and sold therein, "and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves." This, too, was Jewish medium war.

The entry of Jesus into Jerusalem was in the faith that the kingdom of God was to be set up outwardly and by outward means; for as yet I do not think Jesus himself was converted to know that his "kingdom was not of this world;" and he still believed in Jewish Mediumistic war, as did also his disciples even until after his death. The highest form of Jewish war was where the medium of the spirits did nothing, any more than the medium of table-tipping or other manifestations is expected to do—sit still.

Even to the last, it is not clear to me that Jesus was yet a consistent non-resistant. Luke 22: "He that bath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one," was the advice of a war man; and, like the advice of Paul to a young woman to marry, was not proper advice to give to full Jewish Christians. And when he refused to do—then he was as "Prince of Peace" under the Christ influence. In short, it was a matter of travail towards Christianity with Jesus, as with his apostles and all who follow him. He took the sword and perished with it—crucifixion. "Jesus was not yet perfected," even after he was out of the body—in Christian principles—is the record. There was a travail, and there were sufferings left behind for others to fulfill and endure, before the body and the head could all be compacted together.

Does the presence of Jesus at a wedding prove that at his "beginning of miracles" he was already converted to celibacy, as a Christian virtue?

The fact that it takes ages upon ages for the rays of the natural sun to become converted into a diamond, and that many superior stones are formed before the diamond of the first water is produced, may be a fit simile of the effect upon humanity of the shining of the Christ spirit for the seventeen hundred years, during which period there has been one continued succession of efforts to produce the true pentecostal church—the kingdom of heaven—a spiritual diamond of the first water.

ERRORS OF SWEDENBORG AND THE APOSTLES.

Swedenborg, as an embodiment of the Angel of Spiritualism (see Rev. xviii), in assuming to set up a "New Church," committed the same error the Spiritualists of to-day fall into when they set up Spiritualism as a Religion. The chemists, or the agriculturists, or the professors of any one of the sciences, might, with equal consistency, resolve themselves into a religious sect.

Swedenborg was never resurrected (either in this world nor the other) out of the Natural Order—having generation for its central power. Hence, "conjugal love" was the primary law of his Church—"New Church"—and of the heavens to which he had access in the spirit world. Consequently, the theology of Babylon, in its fundamentals, was not subverted by the doctrines of the "New Church." The Scriptures, as the "Word of God," were never so glorified on earth before by mortal man.

The Trinity—"the Divinity of our Lord"—he was wholly absorbed in. With him, Jesus was born the Christ. "The Lord had a Divine essence from conception itself. His soul was Jehovah, and Jehovah was God. Thus the inmost of the Lord was essential Divinity; and that clothing of matter was from the Mother—the humanity. The humanity of the Lord was not as other men, being conceived from the Divine Being Himself. Jesus was the Son of God from eternity." This is orthodox, and is one with the general creed of Christendom.

Even the Apostles were not infallible. They "knew in part, prophesied in part, and saw as through a glass darkly." They confounded the ideas of a physical resurrection with those of the true resurrection. Acts ii, 32: "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we are all witnesses. David spake of the resurrection of Christ (meaning Jesus, for they confounded Jesus and Christ, as they did the physical and spiritual resurrection), that his soul was not left in hell, neither did his flesh see corruption."

His physical body, with the wounds in the hands and side, was not left in the grave (hell), and his fleshly body did not putrefy, as the body of Lazarus had begun to do when it was brought to life. Yet, what became of the body of Lazarus after it was raised? Did it not die again? And why should not the body of Jesus do the same, provided it ever was quickened like that of Lazarus? are proper questions. The same also of the "dead bodies of the saints, which came up out of their graves, and were seen of many."

Scriptures could be cited to show that Jesus, the Apostles, and the angels first believed in the reanimation of the body of Jesus (and of other men to follow in due season), also to show that they thought a certain transmutation would occur, by means of which the physical body would be spiritualized; in fact, become a spiritual body that could go to heaven. "This same Jesus whom ye have seen go up to heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go," etc.

Phil. iii, 21: "Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." "This corruption must put on incorruption, and this mortal, immortality." "For if the dead rise not, then is Christ (Jesus) not risen. Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some of you that there is no (physical) resurrection? then would your faith be vain," etc. In short, it is no clearer that the Apostles looked for the setting up of a temporal kingdom, that would be sustained by the sword, than it is that they believed and preached a physical resurrection.

Election.—It is also in evidence that the Apostles believed in the doctrine of Election. Rom. ix: "Jacob have I loved; Esau have I hated, before they had done either good or evil; that the purpose of God might stand, not of works, but according to election." Chap. viii, 9: "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate," etc.

The Apostles were also in confusion in their understanding respecting Melchizedek, his character and office; and of the character and office of his successors, the Prophets, down to John the Baptist. According to orthodoxy, Jesus going to John to be baptized with water (a rite administered by John only to the people of Jerusalem and Judea, when and after they had come to him "confessing their sins"—their Jewish sins—physical sins against their own bodies) was confusion, as "the less is of the better blessed."

And, after the water baptism, his baptism by the holy Christ Spirit, through John as the medium, is as Greek to Catholic and Protestant divines, as is the fact that Jesus is established as the Head of a new priesthood, "after the order of Melchizedek," a heathen—and that is nearly all we know of him, except that he "was a priest of the Most High God, a king of Peace and of Righteousness, like unto the Son of God," etc.; and that he blessed Abraham, the ancestor of Jesus, who bowed to him, as did Jesus to John the Baptist; all of which is sufficiently confusing, not to say confounding, to poor orthodoxy, which is in a bad way at this time, having Spiritualism incessantly at work undermining the old orthodox heavens of Christendom, and Shakerism substituting entire new heavens in place of them. Rev. xxi, 1: "I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away; and there was no more sea"—no more world. "For there was sorrow on the sea, and it cannot rest and be quiet."

There was a civil governmental organization which should know no war, poverty or prostitution; nor the want of any rational supply for the body. "He that sat upon the throne said, 'Behold, I make all things new.' God shall wipe away all tears from all eyes; and there shall be no more death"—the result of sin—"neither sorrow, nor crying; neither any more pain; for the former things have passed away. The tabernacle of God is with men." The kingdom of heaven has come upon earth, securing human beings their inalienable rights to all of the elements of existence—religious communism. The valleys are filled by the leveled mountains: there is neither rich nor poor, for all things are common; neither bond nor free, for all labor and share alike; neither Jew nor Greek, for the Gospel is for all people. "There is neither male nor female;" for both of the sexes have risen, in the resurrection, to a life of divine Christian celibacy, finding an Angelic sexual union "in the Lord."

The prophecies are realized, and the vision of John is fulfilled, to the honor of God, by its good to humanity.

Gods.

BY F. W. EVANS.

The Jews worshiped the God of battles—the Lord of hosts of fighting angels—a great warrior. The Heathen, when converted to Heathen Christianity, made a God of Jesus—declared him to be Jehovah—the God of the Jews—and as such, he could not object to Marriage, Private property, nor War, all of which, as Jehovah, he had blessed, in his chosen people—the Jews. Therefore the Heathen Christian nations practice all of these things unto this day—for all people will be like the God they worship.

If Jesus was a celibate, it was because he was God, not man. If he owned no property, it was because he did not need it; and if he did not marry, it was because he could make children out of stones. And the reason he did not fight was, that he himself had created the weapon and him who used it.

THE HOUR OF WORSHIP.

Ad libitum.

Arranged for THE SHAKER by the Society at Canterbury, N. H.

1 Once more the sacred hour has come, When saints to-gether meet, To bow be-fore Je-hovah's throne, And wor-ship at His feet.

O holy spir-its, do in-spire Our hearts to sing His praise, And touch our lips with heavenly fire, Our minds from earth to raise.

2 We would forget its scenes and cares,
With angels to commune;
And offer up our fervent prayers—
Thy will, O God, be done.
This brings the promised blessing down,
And knits our souls in love;
While heart with heart in spirit joined,
Still heavenward we move.

3 How strong our bond of union is!
'Tis heaven thus to share;
Nothing of earth affords such bliss,
Nor can with it compare.
May love divine unceasing flow
From Christ, the living Head;
Through His Anointed here below,
To make His people glad.

The Song of our Little Sisters.

BY E. T. LEGGETT.

Dear brethren and sisters, though simple our song,
At least, like the singers, 'tis not very long.
'Tis one, you'll discover, but only too soon,
We sing most delightfully—all but the tune.
We will convince you, before we are through,
We're not Katy Dids, but are Katy's that do.
We sweep with such skill—though we don't like to boast—
That dirt's nearly frightened away from our coast.

We knit and we sew—even milk with good grace,
And smile, though 'tis sometimes the wrong side the face.
And if, like the clock, we are often too slow,
Please think of the time that it takes us to grow.
We've oft been so sadly done over with play,
That even our shadows near fainted away.
Oh, pity us! pity us! lend us a tear,
To drown ourselves in—when our trials appear.

We'd scorn to live merely to eat and to drink;
Though merry, we often stop laughing to think.
To think, though the heart be all throbbing with pain,
'Twill cease, by and by—and we're smiling again.
When the winter winds howl 'round our beautiful home,
We think of the spring-time and summer to come,
When baby birds waiting, like us, to be strong,
Will join us in singing our holiday song.

We list when you tell of that Beautiful Way,
Where children learn something more pleasant than play.
We want to walk in it, that we, too, may share
The Heaven that comes to the pure-hearted there.
Then, though the salt tear may still come to the eye,
We'll smile when we think of the Good By and By.
Then though, like the winds, we are often too wild,
We know you'll remember you once were a child.

The dear little stars peeping down through the sky,
Are they little angels whose home is on high?
They waft us their love for the love they receive,
And smile, in return, for each smile that we give.
Oh! oft, in our slumbers, like music, they come,
To sing us the songs of their beautiful home;
Pointing still, as they leave, to the sunny land shore,
Inviting us there, when our journey is o'er.

How pleasant it is, that above or below,
We've friends to smile on us wherever we go.
We know we've a Mother 'way up in the sky,
Who loves little children, and hears when they cry.
We feel, in our hearts, that she ever is near,
To bless us and shield us when dangers appear;
And should we, oh, sometimes be careless or vain,
She knows we're but children, and loves us again.

As mists of the morn disappear in the day,
Thus, too, may our faults with our youth pass away.
Our hearts, now so little, with love may expand,
'Till blooming with fruits of the Heavenly land.
Oh, bless us, and love us, that we may be strong,
In singing not only, but living our song.
Now thanks for your kindness, thanks for your care,
And love for remembering how little we are.

Life in God.

BY WM. N. REDMON.

"Cease to do evil; learn to do well." This sentence comprehends the whole moral duty of man, and is worth a wagon-load of theological metaphysics.

All the so-called "divine mysteries" are a thousand times worse than nothing, as they have led myriads of innocent minds into error, thereby causing great distress of soul and fearful forebodings as to the future, tintured and imbued with sulphuric hell-fire!

The delusion and utter worthlessness of these theological speculations, bring forcibly to our mind Dr. Johnson's Egyptian Philosopher, whose fame spread over the land, and to whom was committed the equal distribution of rain; and whose unfaltering integrity had stood good, in the face of many bribes from millers and other interested parties. Among the throng attracted by the renown of the philosopher, were the Prince and Princess of Abyssinia, sojourners in Egypt; the Prince, who having heard of the fame of the celebrated wise man, sought his presence, that he might be instructed in the wisdom of the age. The interview continuing for days, his sister became solicitous to know with whom he was spending his time, as he must be engaged in matters of importance which could cause him to stay so long from home.

The Prince, in order to increase her anxiety and raise her anticipations to the highest pitch, told her of the marvelous wonders revealed by this extraordinary personage. The Princess becoming charmed with the excellence of the philosopher, insisted on paying him a visit, with her brother, that she might see, hear and know for herself—as all her sex are determined to do. The Prince being no longer able to restrain or conceal his mirth, said: "Dear sister, I must tell you the facts; our teacher is one of those philosophers of whom it may be said, 'the more he says, the less you know.' The visit could add nothing to your store of knowledge worthy of your acceptance, or that could raise in your estimation the excellence of the masculine gender."

This illustration may not exactly coincide with the views and feelings of those who have spent the best part of their lives in a theological education and the study of Oriental divinity, but it is the best we can do for them at present.

The life and simple teachings of the Lord Jesus, are worth more to the unsophisticated minds of the children of earth, by way of instructing and leading them into the Divine Life, than all that has been written or printed since by the outside world. Commentaries on the New Testament have been multiplied, according to the views and conditions of the writers; speculations, without the spirit and power of the Gospel unto salvation.

But the writers of polemical divinity have not been confined to the use of the pen or the tongue; in their heated controversies, the worst passions of the human mind have boiled over; men and nations have come to blows, to arms; and individuals to the stake and torch! Heresy, in every age of the world has been called to an account, and made to pay the forfeiture of life for its inability to see and believe the "divine mysteries," as held by the standard bearers of mythology.

The gods have multiplied in numbers, and increased in severity, ever since "the falling away" of the Apostolic Church. And now, when the Martyr fires have gone out and men have ceased to settle their polemical discrepancies on the field of battle, wisdom would suggest, that the materials of discord should never again be collected; but be permitted to remain, with the history of the past, as a memento of the consummate folly and ignorance of the nations and the age; and with all effete matter be cast off, and in deep humiliation and mortification be left behind. In preceding time, to be the greatest human butcher, has been the most consummate glory of brutal men; gloating on the wide-spread field of mortal carnage, as the tiger over his bleeding victim!

To quarrel and fight is not the vocation of philosophers; and Christianity teaches men to govern their passions, and bring them into subjection to the law of Love!

To irrational animals let us leave the field of blood and carnage; as, after nations have exhausted themselves on the fields of wholesale murder, from inability to continue the bloody strife, they cease, then diplomacy has to resume her work, and settle the dispute.

But men and nations can never make reparation in time, for the ungodly deeds committed on the fields of blood! One wrong can never right another; Justice, in the even-handed balance, alone can weigh out the dues of individuals and nations. Right must ultimately prevail; and Might be instructed, that "he that takes the sword, must perish with the sword!"

Let us suppose, that men in all ages had preferred one another; and in all the departments and vocations of life, given precedence to each other; that all the lives and treasures lavished in wars and destruction had been devoted to the good and upbuilding of nations, peoples and families; can any one imagine or describe the blessedness of the condition of earth!

Fair and honest dealings between nations and individuals will yet obtain; and the children of earth, of whatever nation or people, will learn to love and respect each other; consequently envyings, jealousies and strifes will cease on our globe, "and nations will learn war no more!"

They will be consummated the advent of the Lord of Glory, and the kingdom resigned to the Father, according to intent; because the evils of earth have been overcome by kindness and Love, which have drawn the children of time to the Father, and they become one with him, according to their measure, in His sublime perfections.

O, Speak the Loving Word.

BY MARIA WHEELER, UNION VILLAGE, OHIO.

"Love, and love alone is the loan for love!"

O, speak the kind and loving word,
To every heart, or friend, or foe,
Or stranger lone.
For human hearts by words are stirred,
And leap with joy, or weep with woe,
So oft unknown.

Yea, speak the kind and loving word,
E'en tho' their hearts are happy now,
And no dull woe
Sits guest-like at their hearth; unheard
May come some grief with clouded brow,
A nameless foe.

O! let thy words of love be strong,
Thy sister needs them, tho' she frowns,
Her heart is sore.
She may have wrestled with the wrong,
Grown hopeless of the victor's crown,
And strives no more.

Or if from virtue's path she's strayed,
And pleasure won her heart's embrace,
O, love her yet.
Perchance for kindly words she's prayed,
And smiles, instead of frowning face,
And love for hate.

O, speak in love, and live its praise:
The truth may shine with lustre bright
Around our way;
And yet a film may cloud our eyes,
And shroud us from its glorious light,
Obscure its ray.

Hearts oft grow cold, and proud and stern,
For love to melt their ice away;
So firmly set;
O! never teach a heart to spurn,
As meaningless, kind words, for aye,
So rarely met.

Unto the happy, light and gay,
Give kindly words, for sorrow needs
No herald here;
Unto the child in guileless play,
To Age, whose step and dim eye pleads
Our gentlest care.

How sweet the music kind words bring,
Into the heart and household dear—
No chimes so sweet.
No warbler can so softly sing,
The choirs of heaven pause to hear
The strain complete.

Nay, never will the kind word die,
Or ever cease a throb of pain,
But live away.
Will glow like planets in our sky,
Will plant sweet flowers for our gain,
O'er life's rough way.

"Generation of Vipers."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE SHAKER."—I observe in the March issue of "THE SHAKER" an adinadversion upon the use of the above words in the article in the same number upon "Eternal Damnation," in which article Jesus is represented to make use of the unchristian expression in question. As the argument of that article greatly depends upon the fact that Jesus sometimes spoke under the influence of a spirit inferior to that which is now looked upon as so peculiarly his own, even after he had received the first ministration of the Christ Spirit, that article would be grossly presumptuous unless Jesus did use those words. It is not, however, a personal question, but one of historic truth in which are involved some of the gravest spiritual issues. I therefore, in all meekness, beg to place before you the fact that the expression, as used by Jesus, will be found in Matthew xii, 34, in accordance with the reference in the early part of the article. Again, in Matthew xxiii, 33, Jesus said, "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?"

THOMAS I. STROUD.

WE offer an apology for the space used by "Shaker Sermons;" but failing to get our supply of The Times, this was our only alternative to meet the demand for them. THE SHAKER, abjuring creeds, relies upon "the Spirit" to finally lead it into all truth; therefore, each contributor is measurably responsible for his or her utterances—opinions only, being growing truths—knowledge in the process of formation.

"FIFTEEN years a Shakeress"—a series in the Galaxy, we pronounce some truth founded on fiction.

The American Spiritualist, commenting on the Troy Conference of Spiritualists and Shakers, thus speaks of Elder JOHN B. VANCE: "We regret being unable to give more of his able address. There was no more smooth and eloquent speaker present than Elder Vance." Beautifully true.

ON Thursday, April 4, at Watervliet, N. Y., deceased: David Hawkins, aged 84. One of the most able, amiable and good men that ever blest the earth. His character was apparently faultless.

"ADDRESS of Antoinette Doolittle" at Troy Conference is crowded into June number. It is interesting.

SUBSCRIPTIONS to THE SHAKER are credentials that pass as Season Tickets to all Shaker meetings this season. Fifty cents per annum. Secure your tickets.

F. W. EVANS and company have been again invited to Troy, N. Y. We hear he has also accepted an invitation to extend his lecture to Utica. Utica is 96 miles from Troy!

THE article on Shaker Communism is a Review by James Burns—a self-sacrificing Spiritualist of London—of a valuable treatise on Shaker Spiritualism. His assistance is gratefully acknowledged by the author in a thorough revision of the work. Copies supplied from this office. Price 50c. Postage 6c.

PERSONS desirous of circulating sample copies of THE SHAKER can obtain all they need for such purposes on application to this office.

WE feel compelled to warn our readers that we have such a pressure of matter as to necessitate an enlargement of THE SHAKER, or the issuing of the same as a semi-monthly, should all be printed. How will this please?

Shaker Societies.

THEIR PURPOSE AND MAINTENANCE.

We would, in present article, deal with this subject as connected with the consecrated services of those individuals which the Good Spirit seals as acceptable members of said Societies. The very common idea prevails that the Shakers are rich. Viewed from whatever point any may take, the very reverse of this is true! We have large possessions, but we have large numbers as occupants and possessors; and there are thousands of farmers within a few miles of Shaker homesteads, who possess more earthly wealth than the Shakers would, were they divided into families as small as theirs. In the "Constitution" of the United Societies we find that the sole aim, purpose and intent for the accumulation of any and all possessions in the power of the Societies honorably to secure, to be for "charitable and religious purposes" only. None, not even the Bishops of the Societies, have any right to disburse the funds derived from the consecrated services or donations of individuals, for any other purposes whatever. It will clearly appear to any reasonable individual, that a Society whose financial basis is like ours, must be the very reverse of a money-making institution. This being so, many will ask, how are the Societies maintained and improved? It is a fact, well known, that the Shakers rely upon the adhesion of individuals outside of their order, to increase or sustain their numerical forces—no children being born in the Societies. Many of Society's pillars entered it when very young, others in riper years. Some became acceptable members after reaching the meridian of life, able to sustain themselves and a little more; while many others are unable to do even this. Many, advanced in years, seek admission to Society under the well-founded assertion that they are "able to pay their way" at the time; and it will appear cogent to all, that if Society is sustained, some must considerably exceed an ability to sustain themselves, and willingly consecrate that ability to the cause, or it must fail. Here, then, we have the key to Society's improvement—the consecrated offerings of those able to bear to Society more than they cost it. Many children have been adopted, in the hope that their riper years will not only compensate Society for its fostering care of their youth, but add largely to its facilities, whereby their spiritual fathers and mothers, less able brethren and sisters, other adopted children, and themselves may be assured a happy maintenance for all time to come; making Society a permanent institution for the sin-sick Zion-traveler who earnestly pleads for a privilege to devote his or her life to a cause so holy and just. We enter into a "Covenant" at maturity of years, that our whole being, without reserve, shall willingly be devoted to the upholding and upbuilding of Society; and sacredly attaching our names to this instrument, forbids our demand, if not our acceptance, of a single dime for services so consecrated. "Can a man rob God?" Nor does Society invite this consecration without giving us a solemn assurance that it takes us "for better or for worse, in sickness and in health," in old age, and through unforeseen accidents and difficulties, so long as we fulfill our part of the "compact" to which we, at mature age, have understandingly and voluntarily attached our signatures. This "Covenant" has passed the ordeal of the best legal acumen and criticism in our country, and pronounced a safe document for the preservation of Society for the purposes it sets forth, and an impassable and imperishable barrier to the cunning design of malignant apostates, than whom Society has no more ignoble, unworthy foe. Bearing in mind many, who, in parting with Society as their Alma Mater, have ever respected and honored her; yet some of those departing have, with unexampled ferocity, demanded large sums—a division of Society's substance, little of which was gathered by their efforts in her behalf, but rather by the life-services of the saints departed, and the living faithful. Such would bring Society to an end of practically fulfilling its sacred obligations to faithful adherents, and obliterate the very purposes for which Society was established. And why? Because they have chosen to depart Society! Dark times were those, when Society suffered the unjust allegations of living in secret impurity—hypocritically professing, but failing to demonstrate a pure life! Those times are past, and now the very reverse is believed; and we mean to take advantage of the change, and ask, how do we do it? For the purpose of keeping our sacred obligations intact, we have rules which act as safeguards, securing to us spiritual protection, while making us better able to enjoy and enhance the physical blessings of Society. By the carnally-minded, these regulations are pronounced silly, unnecessary, tyrannical. But those who admit the feasibility of living a SHAKER life, find in these apparently insignificant regulations the secret of our success, while we challenge any to live as purely as we do together, without them. United as we are to Society, we become its humble servants, and so far part with our identity, that even our correspondence with relatives or others becomes a part of Society, and our every breath is drawn for Society's good; and thus, in the language of one of Kentucky's wise statesmen, "we challenge the world to furnish a truer, purer example of consecration to God than a faithful Shaker!"

We, who represent Society to-day, have been put in trust with its substance, and we mean to transmit the same, unviolated, to our successors. We enjoy the benefits of Society as far as we are faithful representatives. We have no individual possessions, and only as we enjoy the benefits of Society in common with our God-serving brethren and sisters, they are not ours. These blessings, deriving their origin and continuance from and by the consecrated services of the self-denying, we are unable by the "Covenant," as well as unwilling, to share this goodly substance with the self-gratifying crowd of ungodly doers. Being thus bound by the most solemn act of our lives—signing the "Covenant"—we fulfill our obligations to our predecessors, ourselves, and to our God, by devoting our temporal gains to the purposes as aforesaid only. We wish it distinctly understood that we never have admitted any as members, with promise or intimation of reward, excepting a share of Society's benefits, while in it; and we never will. We positively assert that we are not using conseerated funds for the aggrandizement of the few, to the exclusion of the general body; and despising the reereant policy of renegades, we declare Society to be carrying out its original plan—first, for the care of the bodies and souls of its members, and the residue, if any, is being applied to “charitable and religious purposes” only.

Believing our Society to be founded upon principles that are eternal and just, that God is the Architect and Builder, we mean to do our duty fearlessly; and we warn the foolishness of man from any further attempts at defrauding God-loving souls of their God-given rights. If our institutions are founded upon the selfishness of man, we know they will soon pass away, and the sooner the better; but if they are of God, they will endure forever—the whole world to the contrary notwithstanding,—and this we believe. *

Address of Antoinette Doolittle.

TROY, MARCH 24, 1872.

A renowned preacher came to the conclusion, many years ago, that “there was nothing new under the sun; nothing but what had previously been.”

We recognize the law of cycles, but are disposed to believe that some new things occur in each successive cycle. It is rather a new thing for Spiritualists and Shakers to meet in convention; but we hope this meeting will not be in vain. We do not see any reason why a season like the present may not be one of interest and profit, if Love is our guide, Truth our aim; and we “abide in Faith, Hope and Charity, that beautiful trinity of graces which, when woven together, form a strong cord that cannot be easily broken.” There is great power in Love, and strength in Truth. Error is weak, fragile, and must eventually be shaken by Truth, and be broken in pieces. We cannot do anything effectually against the truth; but when we work with it, then are we strong.

It has been said, and well said, that “theology is not religion.” When any human soul pours forth its best treasures, gives its best and truest feelings in devotional exercise, in prayer, in song, in speaking of the things which pertain to the kingdom of God, or in the joyful and sacred dance, whether they be Roman, Greek or Jew, such offerings ascend as sweet incense unto spheres celestial, and are treasured as memorials there.

Theology points in different directions, is diversified; like a “trumpet giving many and uncertain sounds.” Religion is the language of the soul, it is one with goodness and truth. Religious aspirations go forth seeking the fount where sin-dyed garments may be washed from every stain, and be made white and clean; for the divine elements which give life to the soul, will bring it into harmony with Angels of purity and love.

Religion is the product of a spiritual baptism, which, as at the Pentecostal feast, fills the soul with the fire of truth, resulting in practical works of righteousness, producing unselfish love, and teaches that the best and strongest proof that can be given of love to God is, loving and serving our brother and our sister who are with us in the daily walks of life.

Is there anything more needed at the present time than an increase of the Holy Spirit baptism? And is not the present a good time to seek, that we may find it? Let us resolve to walk hand in hand with “the spirit that is able to lead into all truth.” Then, if our pathway, at times, lies through the thorny maze, or we pass through the furnace or the flood, “as our day, so will our strength be.” Many pilgrims have journeyed on before us, who are now marching the streets of the Heavenly Jerusalem, in the spirit land, with palms of victory in their hands, and crowns of glory on their heads.

Spiritual philosophy alone cannot satisfy the soul’s needs; we want, we must have the very life and spirit of it, that will make new creatures of us; will mould and fashion us into the image and likeness of those beautiful spirits which we so much love and admire. We need not wait until we put off the mortal coil before we bask in the sunshine of God’s redeeming love, and enter into rest. We may, through faith, prayer and self-sacrifice, bring the summer-land to us.

We are complex beings—have two natures. The love of goodness and truth belongs to the higher—the Angel nature. The love of pleasure, derived from the sensuous and animal, without regard to principle, and the law of use, belongs to the lower, the inferior part of our being—whichever we serve, that becomes our master. When under the influence of gross passions, the senses—hearing, seeing, smelling, tasting, feeling—all become perverted. But when we turn from low and selfish loves, to the divine of our being, then the senses become refined, and we begin to understand that beautiful saying, “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.” And we enter into communion with the spirits of the higher spheres. We hear angel voices—they gently lay their hands upon us, and pronounce benedictions over us. They feed us with the bread of heaven, and give us to drink of living waters. Pure breezes come to us, laden with the fragrance of flowers which bloom in celestial gardens. The music of the heavenly spheres breaks over our spirits, as the waters of the deep cover the bodies of those who plunge beneath the swelling tide.

When we are fully baptized with the Christ spirit from the resurrection Heavens, we hunger no more for those things which the natural unregenerate man and woman feed upon, content for and glory in. Our desires and appetites are changed. By the light of divine revelation we perceive new truths—feel new life and power. We put off the old corrupt deeds committed in darkness and ignorance, by confession and repentance; and give new pledges, that henceforth our deeds shall be wrought in the light—in God. This is the Shakers’ method of getting a new heart—of being born again—changing the life and character. This is not the work of a day—but a progressive work from faith to faith, accompanied with good practical works.

And there is nothing more needed to-day than living faith, actualized. There are many beautiful ideas and theories in our time; but many have been so fearful, that they should depend on their own good deeds instead of imputed righteousness—that the golden rule of doing unto others, as we would that they should do unto us, is a thing of the past, gone out of date—and become obsolete, except with a few old-fashioned people. But nothing can be truer than the saying of the Apostle James, that “Faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone.” Whatever is honest, true and just, pure and of good report (in angelic circles), should have a place in our thoughts, and take form and shape in practical works.

But we are now living in a time that is fraught with great events; every day and hour has its history. Scientists, Rationalists and Spiritualists are all at work. A new cycle is opening upon us. Present revelation is solving mysteries of the past, unlocking the doors of the spiritual temple in the inner spheres, where all the prophecies of the ages past, given by Angels, through saints and seers, pointing to the present and future work of God upon earth, are treasured without human alloy.

The prophets of to-day are penetrating those spheres and searching the records there. Time-honored theories, ecclesiastical dogmas and priestly rule cannot stand before the advancing light of the present time. The old theological heavens are passing away with a great noise, caused by the conflict between the old and new; but the fan is in motion that will blow away the chaff.

The ancient Prophets and Apostles, who did their work in their time and have gone to their reward, but whose doings and sayings were recorded for the benefit of their pilgrim brethren who should follow them on life’s journey, cheerfully lend their aid to the toilers in the field to-day. Their sympathies are with us, and their eyes are upon us.

Every cycle has its prophets—as guiding stars; and they are the burning candles of the Lord to light the spiritual temple on earth, for the time being. When they have done their work, they will pass away; but the candlesticks will remain, and other lights will be placed in them.

Are there no new cycles in the spirit spheres? If we could look into the interior spiritual heavens at the present time, we should see mighty forces at work there. The male and female are conjointly working in unison with the dual Godhead for the redemption of souls who are out of the body. The heavenly harpers are attuning their harps anew: singing a new song: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and the hosts of heaven rejoice. The celestial fires are rekindled, and scintillations have found their way from heaven to earth, and are kindling a fire here that will not be easily quenched.

The good old prophet Jeremiah, who stands in the first rank among the ancient prophets, looked through his spiritual telescope down through the ages to our own time and saw, with a prophet's eye, that there would be "a new thing in the earth. A woman should compass a man." The spiritual is not first, but is preceded by the natural. And already on the natural plane, "a sound of going in the tops of the mulberry trees" has been heard; and woman has caught the sound, and is gathering her forces for battle. She feels that the time is fully come for her to work; to battle against error, and to aid in pulling down the false and building up the true.

Many fears are entertained for the safety of woman who engages in this work! It is said, "she claims rights and privileges that would be imprudent for her to possess; that already she is growing bold and venturesome."

But it must be remembered that man has the start in the race some thousands of years, and it will require some energy and will-force to overtake him.

Now, Jeremiah was either a true or a false prophet. If true, his prediction must be fulfilled some time. The question is, when, and in what way? Perhaps when that prediction is fulfilled, we shall be better prepared to understand the "great wonder that appeared in heaven," seen by John, of the Isle of Patmos, clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet." Think of it. "A new thing in the earth," and "a great wonder in heaven," which must have been a new revelation there, or it would not have been a wonder.

The admirers and worshipers of Paul do not like the idea that woman must help roll forward the car of progress; they would much prefer that she should continue to "learn in silence of her husband at home, with due subjection." We will say, "Peace to the ashes of the dead." We will not contend with Bro. Paul for aught that he said or did, in his time, but will venture to say, that his day is over, as far as the woman question is concerned. His counsel in that respect does not meet the needs nor demands of the nineteenth century.

Man has worked unaided by woman's influence in many departments of life, through a long period. We will not say that he has not made progress. But now, a new era has dawned, and woman is called into the field to act her part; and as well might we undertake to bring back the years before the flood, the antediluvian period, as to change the course of events, or bind the spirit that is moving in this respect!

There are times and seasons in God's providence, just as much in the spiritual as in the natural; and we must work according to his designs and his time. We do not go forth and scatter our seed over the land with the expectation that it will germinate, and grow and produce a harvest, when the cold breath of winter is upon us, and the snow-capped hills and ice-bound streams tell us it is neither seed-time nor harvest. Then how important is it that we watch and strive to understand times and seasons, spiritually. Not merely "watch lest we enter into temptation," which is very essential, but watch the seasons as they roll around.

Are there wise men and women, prophets and prophetesses in the ranks of the spiritual Israel of to-day, who discern times and seasons, so that they understand what Israel ought to do? Is the present a seed-time? If so, let us work! "sow the seeds of truth in the morning, and withhold not in the evening. Let us sow by all waters." While some plant, others may water; but God will give the increase in his own time.

The duality of Deity is, to me, a beautiful idea! To feel that we have a loving mother in Deity, who watches over, loves and cares for her children, and feeds them from the great spiritual store-house in the heavens, touches a chord in my heart, and causes a thrill of joy that nothing else could do. As long as we have all male Gods in the heavens we shall have all male rulers on the earth. But when the Heavenly Mother is revealed, and is sought unto as freely and confidently as the Heavenly Father, then will woman find her proper sphere of action, and be able to fill that sphere. Under the guidance and direction of Wisdom and Love, she will work effectively against social, moral and political evils on the natural plane of life, and help to elevate the race. Then, when the Spirit calls them to leave the generative plane, and rise into the resurrection Order, to commence a new and purely spiritual life, on the Pentecostal Church plan, it will be easy for them to become brethren and sisters in one heavenly communion, breaking their bread together, spiritually and temporally. And, having their hearts and affections purified, they will begin the song which will never end, and join in the dances of them that make merry—being filled with holy rejoicing, that they are able to conquer the world in themselves.

The Shakers.

BY SAMUEL HOOSER.

I often heard of Shakers, while in my native land,
That they were a deluded, a blind bewitching band;
Such awful news was spreading, too horrid to relate,
How wicked they were acting, in the Ohio State.

At length I went among them, to see how they went on,
I quickly was convinced that these reports were wrong;

I found them such a people as I had never seen,
So bright, so pure, so holy, and much opposed to sin.

I often heard of Zion, but now I've found the place,
The city that's adorned with truth, and love, and
grace;

My heart was struck with wonder, to find such glory
there,

Where all was peace and union, without a single jar.

I found I'd got to Zion, where saints and angels dwelt,
Such piercing streams of glory my soul had never felt;
This is no place of darkness, but one eternal day!
Here doubts and fears are banished, and Satan cannot stay.

I cried adieu to pleasures of every other kind,
I'll give up all my idols, and leave the world behind;
I've found the blessed people, with whom I'll bear the cross,
And count all earthly glory but vanity and dross.

Here is the holy fire that burns all sin and shame!
The guilty sons of Babel cannot endure the flame.
I'll shout eternal praises to Zion's King and Queen,
That I have found a gospel that saves the soul from sin.

O why was I so stupid, to stay away so long!
And labor in confusion, with Babel's mixed throng;
But since I've found the city where Christ in glory
reigns,
I'll bid adieu to Sodom, and all its dismal plains.

Salvation here is flowing, from sin and dross refined
I'm willing here to tarry, and leave my lusts behind,
I feel my soul united to this despised flock;
Let earth and hell oppose us, we're safe upon the rock.

Though persecution rages, we'll boldly shout and sing,

We shall be safely guarded by Salem's conquering
King;

Amidst all tribulations, we feel our love increase,
Altho' the world may hate us, in Zion we have peace.

Sweet union here is rolling, all through this happy place;

Here flows the crystal fountain, and God unveils his face;

Fair lilies here are growing, that never fade nor die;
No other ground produces such fruits of peace and joy.

How blessed are the people who are admitted in,
And dwell secure in Zion, delivered from all sin!

Their joys are still increasing, their songs are ever new,

They love their great Creator, and all their brethren too.

The Cross.

BY DANIEL ORCUTT.

What is the cross? or what is there in the cross which is objectionable? Let us see. Of all who present themselves as candidates for heaven, it is required that they become penitent for sin, poor in spirit, humble as a little child; that they deny self, crucify the flesh, set the affections on things above, hunger and thirst after righteousness, forgive enemies, and submit to persecution for Christ's sake. Yea, the whole man is to be brought under new influences, to be governed by new principles, and to live for new ends. Self-denial, self-discipline, and self-conquest are made indispensable prerequisites for the kingdom of heaven. This is the cross. It stands in the path of life. Christ is the way; there is no other way; there can be no other. To proceed in that way, we must embrace the cross. The cross is irksome and disagreeable only to the carnal mind; it is its nature to be so. By bearing it, a man shall see and know what he is. To neglect the cross is to neglect all; it is like going to the feast without the wedding garment, or like going forth to meet the bridegroom without light, and without oil in our vessels. We may try to substitute something else for the cross, but it will be all in vain. As long as we continue unwashed and impure, we are unsafe. Thus reads the proclamation: "Except a man deny himself, and take up his cross, he cannot be my disciple." The Saviour has conquered and reigns. We must conquer and reign also. No one can enter the kingdom of heaven, unless he be a disciple of Christ. But no one is a disciple who bringeth not forth good fruit. Observe, it is not the person who hears or believes the word, but the DOER, that is, the prudent and wise man. It is folly to try to carry the world and bear the cross together. The elements of the world cannot be united with the cross. Such a union is declared impossible by the gospel, of which the influence, doctrines, tendencies, and final issues are contrary to the maxims, practices, and interests of the world. The Christ has pronounced the decision, "No man can serve two masters."

Reason.

BY ABRAHAM PERKINS.

Faith is the effect of evidence, the assent of the mind, proceeding from light, and standing in close connection with the attributes of God, perfectly uncontrollable by any human power. Proportionate with knowledge of scientific truth, faith is made perfect. Therefore, when founded on just and eternal principles, principles nourished and lived, man is made better; while on the other hand, faith based on that which is perishable and false, he is relatively made worse, however sincere he may be, or however true to its support.

Hence the importance of a knowledge of genuine godliness; and hence the necessity of an education that develops the understanding, enlarges the mind, and capacitates it for the reception of the seed of divine truth, in which is embraced a power to unfold the principles of all science, revealing a law in every creation and handiwork of God. We are therefore compelled to understand that all we see, hear and feel is the effect of cause; and however mysterious and incomprehensible to man, yet it is the result and operation of law, understood by a higher intelligence.

God is a rational Being, and as order is His first law, His works must necessarily be in conformity to order and law. As a consequence, with God there is no miracle. Man being finite, is incapable of comprehending the infinite beyond that which is necessary for the profitableness and happiness of himself, and the acknowledgment of miracles would be the admission of other means of creation than by divine law, an incongruity in universal law, and a detraction of wisdom from the character of the Almighty, which is heretical to true faith, an offense against Christianity, and a doctrine untenable.

Success to the Shaker.

AN ACROSTIC.—BY SARAH A. NEAL.

Sad though thy march, lovely pilgrim, toil on!
Unaided by many, rejected by some; yet
Continue thy course, fair SHAKER sublime,
Cease not to sow good, for now is seed time.
Each virtue engraven upon thy fair face,
Shall yet merit love from the whole human race.
Speed on, then, forever, thou herald of truth,
To the far distant nations of earth go ye forth.
O! halt not at trifles; climb the rough, rugged road
To perfection's fair height, in the kingdom of God.
Heaven opens in splendor, the day now doth dawn,
Earth's joys are dispersing as dews of the morn.
Soar aloft, then, O, Shaker! and quicken thy speed,
Henceforth be thy motto, to sow the good seed.
Angel bands will attend thee, and give thee success;
Kind friends read thy columns with great earnestness.
Eternal the truths, on thy banner arrayed,
Rigour shall yet rule the day, and cast wrong in the shade.

"Reform."—The Motion Seconded.

BY SHUBAEL PRENTISS, SHAKERS, N. Y.

On reading O. C. Hampton's article on Reform, my mind was very agreeably impressed, and I wish to express to him my approval of it. I would say to Bro. Oliver and others, go ahead. It is time that all loathsome habits, such as smoking, chewing and snuffing tobacco, and all excesses of eating and drinking should find no place among us as believers in all true reforms. There is also a fashionable custom of using alcoholic drinks as medicine, in cordials, bitters, etc. Whether the drug steeped in the alcohol is most desired, or the same swallowed as a cover for the alcohol without it, I leave each to determine. I hold an opinion. I have seen bad habits formed from this fashionable practice. Medicine can be prepared without alcohol, but would it then be as desirable? How much would then be used? Very little, I think. Doctors would starve for want of business; and they ought to starve if they could not find better employ. I long for the day when humanity will be represented by "sound minds in healthy bodies,"—bodies equally sound "as the beasts that perish." Would not it be as profitable business for the generative world to take as much pains in the production of humanity as is now exercised for quadrupeds? I second the motion for "reform" on humanity's account, and in contemplation of Zion's needs.

Correspondence.

TO THE DEAR SHAKERS OF ENFIELD, N. H.: My visit with you, my dear friends, has been pleasant, and I trust, very profitable to me spiritually. When I reflect upon the general appearance of your Society, and recall the candid expressions of happiness and content together with the inspired instructions given me, bearing upon the eternal principles of life, I think no real seeker after truth can fail to recognize the high-toned intelligence, the urbanity and purity of character exemplified among you, without having a desire to advance in the scale of being to a purer and holier life; aspiring to combine all the best attributes of humanity in a true life. I feel to tender my heartfelt gratitude for the kind attentions received among you, and I would that all who come into your circle might receive from you the baptism which I received.

Although I am in the world, surrounded by all classes of minds and diversities of character, perhaps I can do some good in proclaiming the good tidings of saving power, vouchsafed to your people. Though not in form like your order, I have long been familiar with the exercise of dancing in spirit, or, as it has been denominated, "dancing before the Lord," and holding sweet communion with departed saints. The field is broad in which many are rejoicing in the reappearance of God, as manifested through Jesus. And generations yet unborn shall rise up to be glorified in the true worship, as manifested through the Shakers—a life worship. I am often shaken, to prove that God is spirit, and must be worshipped in spirit and in truth. After leaving your place, we spent several weeks with our friends in Boston, Fall River, and in the Connecticut valley, and in each place all were interested with the account of our visit to the Shakers. Some of my Spiritualist friends expressed a fear that they should lose me out of their ranks; but so far as principles are concerned, I believe true Spiritualists and Shakers to be nearly synonymous. Your books will have a faithful perusal, and "THE SHAKER" shall have a free circulation. May the white-winged angel ever wave peace and prosperity over your beloved community. Your friend,

ELIZA BLOSSOM,
Middle Granville, N. Y.

MY KIND FRIEND ELIZA: I received your very kind letter, and though I have so long deferred answering it, I would say, we hope and trust with you that your visit with us will be productive of good. We are also pleased to know that you appreciate the life and spirit which we are striving to maintain, and that you realized, in some degree, a baptism of the spirit from the resurrection heavens, while with us. We believe that any one who receives the degree of light and truth which is so manifestly evident you have received, though dwelling outside of the relations of our Church, if true to the convictions of right in their own souls, cannot fail to realize, when coming among us, something of the purity of life which we maintain, and the true love that draws us together, and proclaims us the true, unselfish Christian Church. But no one can know much of our real inward lives, unless they enter into the work unreservedly, and do as we have done—honestly confessing every known sin before the witnesses of God; striving to forsake them; making restitution for every wrong done to others, as lies within our power. Those who have done this work, can testify that it yields them justification, is as a consuming fire to the corrupt and sinful passions of their depraved natures, and gives them power to rise, step by step, into the high and holy element of spiritual life. It expands our love for our fellow beings, creates new fathers and mothers, new brothers and sisters, making the household of Christ our nearest and dearest relations, who are free and welcome to enjoy every blessing that we possess, both spiritual and temporal, in sickness and health. Hence, the temptations so prevalent outside of our order, to sacrifice principle and chastity to obtain the means to pander to fashion, and procure the necessities of life, are not felt in our communities. Oh, Eliza! when I go abroad among the rich and poor, and see the contrast in their earthly comforts—some toiling to gain an honest livelihood by the sweat of the brow, not able to obtain enough to clothe them decently, or supply the demands of hunger, while another class revel in luxury, my spirit melts into sympathy, and I lift a prayer that the heavy chains of slavery, which still rest upon the human family, may be broken. I bless the spirit so earnestly at work, to set poor, down-trodden woman free from the bondage in which she is held (and I fear, by her own free will, too,) a servant to passion, to the spoliation of her own health and happiness. What a contrast from my sweet Shaker home, where not only the outside of the cup and platter are clean, but the inside also! Where love, uncontaminated with worldly, fleshly lusts, bears sway, and keeps the whole household in order. Oh, may our Eternal Father and Mother hasten the day when light shall be shed upon the souls of men, that they may behold the beauties of this glorious Millennial, which has dawned upon us, and realize, by experience, the true happiness which the life of purity and entire consecration affords. Though you have passed through many trying scenes of suffering and persecution, to attain to so great a degree of the knowledge of God, you receive, if your experience is similar to ours, untold blessings for every sacrifice, yea, a treasure, far surpassing all worldly riches, honor or fame. You say that some of your Spiritualist friends were afraid they should lose you from their ranks. We think, when they see us as we are, they will not fear the loss of you or any other good member, but will strive to bring themselves up to our standard, and rejoice to see any one forsaking the perishing joys and pleasures that are now urging millions into the common vortex of human depravity. You say, "The field is broad in which many are rejoicing in the reappearance of God, as manifested through Jesus;" also, "Generations yet unborn shall rise up to be glorified in the true worship, as given through the Shakers." Here, I see, is a prophecy. Our kindest love to yourself and daughter, we remain your true friends,

The Future Work of Spiritualism.

As Spiritualists, our work measures and overarches all the reforms of the age. To continue it successfully requires brave, enthusiastic and self-sacrificing men and women; Media passive, pure and holy in every aspiration; speakers with tongues of fire, hearts pulsing with prayer, intellects rich in genius and culture, and souls touched with the baptism of the living Christ. We are in the Second Coming. The angels are already in the clouds of heaven.

There is about to be a religious revival such as the world has not seen for eighteen centuries. Christians will be converted; outsiders will inquire the way to Zion; Christ spirits will lead them; the white faces of martyrs will illumine their pathway. After the cross, the crown.

The very foundations of the old social, political and theological religions are being shaken. "I will shake earth and the heavens also," said God by the prophet. The world is becoming literally a world of Shakers. The most stupendous drama in history is now unfolding. The sixth trumpet has sounded. The books are open. The world is the stage; nations the actors. The fig tree has put forth. The angels of the spiritual dispensation are calling us to judgment. My soul pleads for you "yet a little longer," and the "spirit and the bride say come." Are your lamps trimmed and burning? Answer as in the presence of God's angels.

Let us, Oh Spiritualists, be true to our convictions; true to our moral and religious natures; true to the principles of purity and right; then should our mortal barks speedily strand, or go down even, they will only sink to rise into those calmer seas that make divinely beautiful the love-lands of the angels.

My Shaker Faith.

BY ANDREW BARRETT.

What thanks and praise to God belong,
Who gave to me this precious faith;
It is an anchor, firm and strong,
The best estate a Shaker hath.
Thanks be to God for holy faith,
That bears me through all trials sore,
And like a light in shades of night,
A stay when angry billows roar.
When trials weigh my spirit down,
And troubles like the tempests beat,
Faith is my guide, and points the way—
Directing sure my erring feet.
It leads my bark through calms and storms,
And like a skillful pilot, too,
It proves to me of greatest worth—
Faith is the guide I will pursue.

Faith is my armour and my shield—
A heavenly weapon, bright and sure;
It makes my greatest foes to yield,
And gives me courage to endure.
Faith is the holy gospel ground,
Where heavenly beauties ever show;
Where plants of purity abound,
And innocence will thrive and grow.
Lord, may this living faith increase—
Grow daily stronger in my soul;
It is the guide that leads me o'er
All dangerous rocks, each tempting shoal.
It is the compass that directs
The soul to heaven's port above;
To dwell with those who live in truth,
And bonds of everlasting love.

Mother.

BY WM. H. RUSSELL.

By the same process by which we trace out the existence of the Supreme Being, and the various attributes which are generally ascribed to him, we arrive at the conclusion that there are in the Divine nature both masculine and feminine principles. The universal Father and Mother are necessary complements of each other. Both combine the formation of worlds, on which their image is indelibly impressed. So plainly is this inscribed there, that one needs only to open his eyes to be able to read the inscription wherever he turns his gaze. It requires no metaphysical acumen, no laborious investigation, to reach this result, but merely the simple process by which we attain to ordinary truth, so that one who has admitted this truth into his mind, wonders that a thing so plain should have escaped the observation of reflecting minds in Christendom for so many ages. Yet we may account for this from the fact that, instead of looking into the great volume of nature, spread open before them, they have drawn their ideas from the Scriptures, where masculinity alone is generally ascribed to Deity. Other nations, whom we, Christians, in our self-conceit, have been accustomed to style ignorant, God-forsaken heathen, have had clearer perceptions of this truth. Gods and goddesses both have formed the groundwork of their theology, however absurd many of its details may appear to us.

There are reasons for believing that Jesus acknowledged the fact that Mother as well as Father subsist in Deity, though our canonical gospels represent him as using exclusively the term Father when addressing or speaking of God. In the Gospel, according to the Hebrews, translated into the Greek and Latin languages by Jerome, one of the early Christian fathers, was a passage quoted by Origen, another early Christian father, which represents Jesus as saying, "My Mother, the Holy Spirit, took me and brought me to the great mountain Tabor." The book from which this was quoted, was not ranked as canonical by those who made the selection from among all the Christian books anciently written, yet is as likely to have been genuine as those thus classed. Eusebius, the early ecclesiastical historian, says, "The Ebionides use only the Gospel according to the Hebrews." These were a body of Christians living mostly near Jerusalem in the earliest times.

Regarding the Holy Spirit, then, as Mother, we see the propriety of the words of Jesus addressed to Nicodemus,—"Except one be born of the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." This is not a mere figure of speech, but alludes to the real and substantial work of regeneration wrought in the believer, so that in life and spirit he becomes a new creature, being completely transformed from the earthly to the heavenly life. The Divine Father and Mother, through the ministrations of angels, both male and female, devoted Jesus himself to the life of unchanging love. "Ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God descending to and ascending from the Son of Man," were words addressed by him to the guileless Nathanael, which assured him and other disciples of their prospective induction into the profoundest truths of the heavenly life.

Various figures were used in the ancient prophecies, expressive of the female principle in Deity. In the 115th Psalm she is represented by the Queen sitting at the right hand of the King, whose "throne God is for the age of ages." Her name is "to be remembered in every generation, and the people shall acknowledge her from age to age." (See Septuagint version.) The pre-eminent influence in the Church of Christ, which is to govern that and ultimately the whole world, emanates from Deity as Father and Mother, in the psalm represented by the King and Queen, to whom all inferior authorities must finally submit. In the book of Zechariah, their representatives are described as "the two Anointed Ones—two Christs—who stand by the Lord of the whole earth." In rebuilding the temple spoken of by the same prophet, the hands of Zerubbabel—strange to confusion—laid the foundation, and his hands were to finish it; yet, "This is the word of the Lord to Zerubbabel: Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." The mountain difficulties in the way of its erection were to be removed by the Spirit as the Divine Mother, and the cap-stone was to be put on "with shouting, Grace, grace to it." There is an allusion here to the practice of giving some expressive name to a building, when its frame has been raised, or the finishing stone laid on, by those engaged in erecting it. The practice is still kept up in some places even in this country. From the top of the edifice one calls out to another, asking what name shall be given to it, and the other replies by giving the name selected, which is confirmed by the unanimous shout of all present. The name to be given to the temple, when the finishing stone should be put on, was to be Grace, or Beauty, one very expressive of the finishing work of the Mother of salvation. Grace, representing not only the Divine favor, but the refinement, beauty and perfection of spirit in all those who are the subjects of it. The Hebrew word, rendered Grace, is the one from which we have derived our proper name Ann, and those translated "to it" read Lee, as any one may see, who is familiar with the Hebrew. When the mountain of a carnal nature, which hides from the soul the Sun of Righteousness, was leveled to a plain in Mother Ann, by her unceasing efforts, aided by the Holy Mother Spirit, then Grace and Beauty shone forth in her character in a remarkable degree; then was she constituted MOTHER IN CHRIST, able, by Divine assistance, to help others to effect the same work in themselves, and thus to become the sons and daughters of God in the very highest sense of the terms,—the legitimate offspring not only of the ETERNAL FATHER, but also of the CO-ETERNAL MOTHER.

"What Induced you to Join the Shakers?"

BY ELIZABETH H. WEBSTER.

'T was not that I might win a name
Among the gay and fair;
For earthly flatteries are but tame,
They'll vanish into air.
Nor to enjoy the transient bliss
The child of pleasure knows;
'T was not a selfish cause as this,
That so much good bestows.

'T was not for ease or wealth I pined—
Enough of all I had;
I heard that constant toil I'd find,
In "Shaker land so sad."
I thirsted for the "living spring"
Whence true enjoyment flows;
Its little streams did comfort bring—
I'd seek it where it rose.

I longed to gain the heavenly grace,
That dwelt in Christ, our head;
That strengthened him to "grow apace,"
And raised him from the dead.
I saw him suffering, meek and mild,
Yet bold and firm for right;
In agony, whilst others smiled,
And watchings all the night.

I saw him cast earth's honors by,
Reject the offered crown;
And with his Father's will comply,
Nor pomp, nor splendor own.
"My kingdom 's not of earth," he said,
And proved it by his life,
As on the altar all he laid,
Nor murmured at the strife.

I heard him when his mother came,
Her much loved son to see,
Amidst the gathering crowds exclaim—
"My mother—who is she?"
'T is such as do my Father's will,
My friends and brethren are;
These are the ones my joy doth fill,
To me they're dearer far.

I heard him called a friend of wrong,
For teachings such as these;
I saw him lashed with cruel thongs,
Nor would their wrath appease.
I saw him his disciples meet,
Ere yet his hour had come,
And thus with tones of love entreat—
"Be followers of the Lamb."

I've looked around with anxious eye,
Far o'er this wondrous earth,
To find those who themselves deny,
And follow him in truth.
One seeks for gold, the miser's trust,
With eager, panting heart;
Another worships mortal dust,
Nor gives to Christ a part.

Another, though of Christian name,
Still follows his own lusts;
And while he worships still the same,
His good my soul distrusts.
Bright beings I could round me see,
Of gentleness and love;
By nature clad their souls must be,
Not "wisdom from above."

But where are those who battle long,
With anger, pride and sin;
And fight with courage bold and strong,
Their foes that lurk within?
I heard of spirits who had fled
From thoughtless scenes of earth,
And in the life which Jesus led Praised him with joy and mirth.

I found this holy love embraced
"The Brotherhood in one;"
They "dwell in love," as Christ has said,
And "by these fruits are known."
Their faith and works together blend,
To make the whole complete,
Nor idly dream that faith will lend,
A robe for glory meet.

In Christ-like purity they dwell,
And keep a conscience clean;
Their blessed Lord they love full well,
And honor Zion's Queen.
The virgins in the dance rejoice,
Old men and blooming youth,
And daily praise, with solemn voice,
The God of love and truth.

These are the ones, exclaimed my soul,
Who walk with Christ in white;
Whom purity and love control,
And they are God's delight.
But when I saw how high they stood,
And still how very low,
How great a price they pay for good,
How few the straight way go,—

I shuddering, asked myself, can I
So great an offering make,
And be content to daily die,
My Saviour's yoke to take?
"A fire I kindle," Jesus said,
"Which will the house divide,"
What though the dross be there consumed,
The gold is purified.

But who can paint how great my grief,
When those I loved, reviled;
And sent me forth, a bruised leaf,
My fondest prayers denied!
My babes in mercy to me spare,
The ones for whom I live;
And let them have the tender care
My fond heart loves to give!

Who will their little griefs assuage,
And comfort in distress,
And teach them in their infant age,
How to forgive and bless?
Alas! a mother pleads in vain,
The vow to love 's forgot;
But strength from the angelic train
Comes whispering, "fear ye not."

But can I bear reproach and scorn,
From those who once have loved?
Can I be thrown, a worm forlorn,
Upon the Best Beloved?
O, can I share the humble lot,
Of those so poor and low,
And like my Master, have no spot
Of rest while here below?

Can I endure from all to part,
My loved and valued friends;
And drink, though with a bleeding heart,
Of every cup he sends?
The same good spirit that shed light,
Now spake within my breast;
And gave me strength to choose the right,
Where I find peace and rest.

The conflict 's now with inward foes—
I'll kiss the chastening rod;
My part I'll bear of Jesus' woes,
My all I give to God.
Though sorrows rise, I'll never fear;
The "GOODLY PEARL" I've found;
'T was this, my friend, that brought me here,
ON CONSECRATED GROUND.

ANN LEE'S TESTIMONY OF JESUS.—Job Bishop testifies hearing Mother Ann say: "Jesus had to overcome the nature and spirit of the world, the same as we have; and you must all do the same, or you can never go to God."

Parable No. 3.

BY H. W. PELHAM.

VICARIOUS ATONEMENT.—JESUS A SURETY.

There is another phase of vicarious atonement, presenting man as a debtor, instead of setting him forth as a criminal, guilty of capital offense. Paul speaks of Jesus being made "the surety of a better covenant." We will here give the comment of the famous commentator, Dr. Gill, who thus explains: "Christ is the surety of the better testament or covenant. Heb. 7, 22. The word signifies one that draws nigh. Christ drew nigh to his Father in the counsel of peace, and undertook to be the saviour and redeemer of his people. [The Dr. seems to have been present at that counsel!] He substituted himself in their room and stead; he interposed between the creditor and the debtor, and became surety for the payment of the debts of the latter, and so stood engaged for them and in their room. Christ is not the surety for the Father to his people, but for them to the Father, as to satisfy for their sins, to work out a righteousness for them, and make them happy [in their sins], which is an instance of matchless love." To illustrate this view of the vicarious atonement, we set forth the following parable:

M. is indebted to G., and becomes hopelessly insolvent, and prays G. to forgive him the debt, as he is rich and able to lose. Nay, says G., the debt is just, and unless you pay up, or give security, I will forthwith have you arrested and cast into prison, and you shall not come out thence till you pay the uttermost farthing. In M.'s extremity, the benevolent J. comes along, and offers himself to G. as M.'s "surety," and is accepted. G. then addressing himself to M., said, "Remember, justice cannot be set aside. I have a thousand other debtors, or may have, and if I were to give way in this instance, they would all be on hand, wanting forgiveness. I will have my own, and I will either take it out of you or your surety; when the debt is paid, you and I will be on good terms again." But M. still pleading, says, notwithstanding J. is becoming my surety, I am informed that he has failed, and is as poor as I am, and he proves the truth of this statement by the infallible word—the Bible—which declares that, "tho' J. was rich, he became poor" (2 Cor. 8, 9), and J. says, "of himself he can do nothing." This being the case, you will have to forgive him, for when the principal and surety both fail, the debt must be canceled. I beseech you, therefore, to forgive me at once, and not trouble him, as he is innocent, and in reality does not owe this debt. Nay, nay, says G., eternal justice shall never be cheated so. I will let all intelligences in all worlds know that they may never hope to escape my justice! Finally J. was arrested, and though he declared he had not one cent more than to meet his own wants, and not even that without help, yet G. pushed the prosecution, till, in some mysterious way, J. was furnished with means, and discharged the debt. It is said that this mystery was revealed to a certain hierarchal order, self-styled orthodox, who professed great intimacy with G., who had entrusted them with a knowledge of his secret decrees. They stated that G., J., and one H. were joint partners in trade, the title of the firm being "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," and J. was furnished with the means of paying the debt out of their joint funds, which, however, all belonged to G. Thus G., the great stickler for justice, secretly paid the debt himself in this underhanded way, in order to keep up a show of his inflexible character for justice. Many sensible people thought that the ends of justice would have been quite as well answered, and the ends of love and benevolence much better, to have forgiven the debt at once.

But we have not got to the end of this matter. This G., who had hitherto been thought somewhat of a benevolent sort of person, being rather overstrained about his eternal justice, so as almost to exclude mercy, now began to develop a most malignant character. With all his bluster about justice, he himself violated her nature in the most shocking manner. After M., through his "surety," had paid the debt, and been discharged, G. had him arrested for capital offense, and without any formal trial, sentenced him to eternal torments. J. again plead M.'s cause, and again offered himself for surety. G. is inexorable; says no surety is allowed in cases of capital offense. M. shall meet his sentence, or you, J., shall suffer the full extent of his punishment as his substitute. Justice must and shall be satisfied. Poor, merciful, sympathetic J. agrees to become a substitute of the whole race of M., and the inexorable, unforgiving G. accepted the offer, and as it reads, Acts 2, 23, J. was delivered up by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of G., and suffered a most painful immolation. His offer to do this was on the condition that the whole race should be saved. "He tasted death for every man." Yet G., after agreeing to this, only extended the benefit of J.'s substitution and suffering to a few select sinners, called the elect, but rowed eternal vengeance on nine-tenths of mankind. Thus G. displayed his "glorious justice," by defrauding J. out of far the greater portion of those whom he had suffered and died to redeem. Such is the character which orthodox Calvinism gives to the infinitely good and wise Creator of heaven and earth—the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Our Happiness.

BY DANIEL ORCUTT.

The happiness derived from the performance of good deeds is of the highest, of the purest kind; it is, indeed, the only lasting enjoyment. The vilest sinner on the earth, if he has done one good action, has a perception of this truth. Then how strange that millions should risk their health, their life, and their eternal happiness upon the pursuit of those pleasures which end in pain, and should entirely neglect this source of enjoyment, which is accessible to all, and which not only brightens life, but removes the sting of death.

Since this life is a preparatory state, to be succeeded by one in which every spiritual power will be greatly expanded, and every capacity for happiness or misery will be greatly enlarged; and since the state of our future being will be determined by the manner in which this brief opening of our existence is spent, is it not surprising that any intelligent being should over-estimate and depend upon the fleeting things of Time? Should not the thought, "I must live forever," shut every eye, and turn every heart from these trifles, and arouse every power of the soul to the work of preparation for ETERNITY.

Shaker Cemeteries.

BY OTIS SAWYER.

"Why do Shakers appear to have so little respect for their deceased members? Why do they neglect to furnish them monuments, and bedeck their graves with flowers, shrubbery? etc." I answer:

First, living objects of charity—those who cannot wait for remembrance—are all around us; those in the grave do not suffer. Secondly, we abominate idolatry; and such "cities of the dead" as Mt. Auburn and Greenwood are the fashionable institutions of idol worshippers.

Money is lavishly, wickedly spent thus, while the living poor have not where to lay their heads, or wherewith to appease their hunger.

We do not believe in a physical resurrection, nor that our dear departed lie in the ground; neither will they ever have need to use the decaying mortality again—this having subserved its purpose, as an old, worn-out garment, it is laid aside forever.

We look to those mansions, "eternal in the heavens," for those we loved on earth; for "in my Father's house there are many," agreeable to the condition each has attained unto in the great work of salvation. When assembled at our funerals, the souls of our departed loved ones often make their presence known, and their voices chime with ours as we sing:

"And when I am called to leave earth, so fair,
O chant not a mournful refrain;
Let angelic music float free on the air,
Count all earthly losses my gain!"

We are sorry to part with loved gospel companions, but we do not foolishly express our sorrow by mournful habiliments and badges. We mourn only for the "dead in trespasses and sin"—for those who, having tasted of "the powers of the world to come," turn back to the "beggarly elements of the world"—for these we sincerely mourn.

We never shock our own nor other souls by singing, "Hark! from the tombs," etc., for we seek in no such place of "rottenness and dead bones" our needed inspirations. We need erect no monuments to bear witness what we wish to remember of them; their virtues are engraven on our hearts as perpetual reminders of good examples.

Our graveyards are simple, yet unostentatious. They please our spirit friends, who visit us, more than would an intemperate display of marble.

Virtues are more enduring than granite, and in these our faithful friends have laid up treasures that are safe from moth and rust. We believe in decently interring the mortality of those who are happily released from the troubles of earth. A plain slab, with name and age, marks the spot. Mother Ann Lee's grave differs not at all from those of her surrounding children. We advise that the various appropriations now uselessly expended on cemeteries, should be used for the elevation of the downcast, homes for the destitute, and for charitable and religious purposes generally. Then would humanity be honored with lasting remembrances, and angels delight in the resurrection of the people from dead works to living shrines,—from the honoring of the dead to the association of the living. We die as did Jesus—unto sin; like him we are daily crucified—unto the world; we realize a present reward with an increasing happiness. With him we are enjoying life eternal; and if, like his, our earthly grave should be unknown, no harm will accrue to any, nor should we care.

Short Sermons.

BY D. A. BUCKINGHAM.

The doctrine of James Whittaker (one of the founders of our Institution), was, "Be what you seem to be, and seem what you really are, and not carry two faces." Disimulation of character is too prevalent in the world; particularly is it out of place among Christians, or those who profess to be such. What fraud, what downright knavery is practiced among mankind under the cloak of religious profession! Seeming to be what they are not—Christians. True Christians being themselves honest, are apt to place confidence in those who profess to be so, but often, when perhaps too late, find that many sail under false colors.

"Repentance," said he, "will yet be the most joyful sound ever heard by mortals. True repentance is forsaking sin. Where Christ is, there is power to put away sin from the soul; and where there is no power to put away sin, there is no Christ"—no real Christianity. Repentance is preceded by confession. "He that covereth his sins, shall not prosper, but whose confesseth and forsaketh them, shall find mercy."

Mother Ann Lee, when instructing her disciples or immediate followers, said to them, "Own God where you find Him, whether in man, woman or child." There is some good, some degree of virtue in all men; even a child may possess the germs of Christianity, which, if properly cultivated, will grow and flourish in life. Parents and guardians of the young should seek to plant the seeds of truth and honesty in them, while their spirits are yielding and susceptible. "Train up a child in the way he should go," is a maxim of long standing. Virtuous principles should be early inculcated, that in after life they may bring forth fruit—thirty, sixty, or a hundred fold. Christians should so live daily as to be walking with Christ in the present tense, and enjoying a foretaste of the bliss of immortal and angelic life. Sin is the grent obstacle, hiding from mortals the bentitude of the heavenly spheres. It veils from us the glorious future, as well as depriving us of present happiness.

"Be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect." Not so much what we now are, as what we may, can, or must be—the ultimate of good works. Now, to arrive at perfection of any kind requires time and growth,—not an immediate effect, but a gradual change, step by step, or from one degree to another. A true Christian character is attainable only in regeneration—being born anew, born of God, in which state or condition a soul "cannot sin, because they are born of God. We progress by and through faith. "Faith," we read, "is a gift of God"—seed planted in the soul, where it must germinate, mature, and perfect. Man lives by faith until he can obtain something better to subsist upon. Experience or knowledge is more reliable and substantial than faith. The latter is only "the substance of things hoped for, and an evidence of things not seen." Hope leaves a convert in expectation, not really in present enjoyment. For, according to the Apostle, "we hope not for that which we see and enjoy."

Have good regard for the consciences of men, wherever they are, and respect the sincere, devotional worship of all persuasions, whether Mohammedan or Christian. Sincerity will commend the soul to God. It is the heart God looks at. "He is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him."

"Pray without ceasing," saith the Apostle. How can a man's thoughts be constantly in prayer? By being constant in Christian duty. Acts of kindness, deeds of charity, hands to work, and soul to God—these form the most effective prayer, as well as the loudest preaching. Prayer, to be effectual, must be fervent—nothing doubting. "The effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous availeth much."

Self-Examination.

BY ANNE ERVIN.

It is remarkable that in the New Testament there is no elaboration by the Apostles of this subject, which must present itself to the thoughtful Christian as one of the very first importance. A few, though very valuable thoughts are to be found scattered through St. Paul's writings, such as "circumcision of the heart;" to the Corinthians, "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves;" before any one came to the Lord's Supper, he urges that "a man examine himself." Neither James, Peter, Jude, nor John contains a word directly inculcating the necessity of heart-search. Yet all their teachings incidentally require more or less to give them practical effect. Nothing in the writer's opinion could better illustrate the essential distinction between our forerunners, the primitive Christians, and ourselves, than the fact that the former advanced doctrines which in themselves require a certain amount of self-examination, but failed to see that a deep, vital, an intense and ever-increasing heart-search is one of the essentials of spiritual life. But we, who are called to partake with our Lord of a continual feast, not of an external commemoration of his death, but to partake forever of the same death, suffering, and joy; we who are called in very truth to be a royal priesthood, whose sovereignty is over death; whose only acceptable offerings are those of a meek and pure spirit; whose treasures consist in the sweet graces of Christ; whose conquests are only of our own evil natures,—it behooves us surely with every energy we possess to search and diligently try our hearts, that we may progress in our high calling. For it is quite certain that never shall we rise in the resurrection, until we have thoroughly seen ourselves. Oh, what depths of depravity has every honest mind discovered within itself! What a distance between itself and the divine intelligence! What depths of humiliation has every sincere struggler experienced from deep self-sight! But in the discovery of this depravity, in this sense of loss and of humiliation, there is promise of ultimate safety. It is certain that no one has found salvation without experiencing these sufferings.

Now, to enter upon serious self-examination, we have need to bring an intelligent understanding of the purpose of our work. We are called to travel out of death into life. Death is every moral evil which diseased humanity inherits; life is purity, love, unselfishness in heart and mind. What a world of work is here involved for every soul! A lifetime, in which every thought and effort has been directed to this great work, is not sufficient to subdue every evil propensity of the heart. And unless we enter into the work with a single and simple determination to conquer, we shall not be likely to meet with much success. Surely then it is needful to strain every nerve to see our failings, because, until we do see them, we are unable to eradicate them. When we have seen that we possess certain failings, we must be ready to admit to ourselves that we do possess them. If we do not, we shall not grapple with them. When we have seen and admitted to ourselves our failings, we must devote our attention with all diligence and patience to eradicate those evil propensities. The single-hearted should not be impatient with themselves, nor should they be surprised if, with the honestest effort, they sometimes fail to come quite up to the standard they have set for themselves. Soil which has for a length of time been injured by bad tillage, needs care, skill, patience, to bring it to a crop-bearing state.

There are some who bring to the gospel work, much of honest intention in many respects, but who, to excessive love of approbation, join painful incapacity for internal search. Now these persons cannot fail to be aware of this, and they should beware of themselves. Herein is their great cross. Let them thankfully labor day and night until they do really gain an insight of themselves. Let them keep before themselves the greatness of the work they are called unto. To these may appropriately be applied the saying of St. James respecting those who hear the gospel, yet do not its requirements, that they are like "unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass; for he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was."

Those who are endowed with a capacity to see and remember their own failings, are indeed greatly blessed. Let them be careful to improve to the uttermost this faculty.

But ye, who are critical of the faults of others, I say unto you, awake! This is not the work you are called to. Remember that "the righteous scarcely be saved." Those who are, with single purpose of heart, laboring to subdue themselves, looking neither to the right hand nor to the left, who "shut their eyes from seeing evil" in others, but are constantly alive to their own evil natures; these, by constant internal search, toil and suffering, scarcely be saved. Where then shall ye appear, who are occupied in observing how little others are carrying out the principles of meekness and godly fear that ye are neglecting? Remember that the angel Michael, that bright and perfect being who is striving to perform his work upon you, dared not to bring a railing accusation against Satan, when he contended with him. Oh! remember that true self-examination will produce that fervent charity which will close your lips from speaking aught against another, and will save those who love you the painful sight of beholding you very bitter against others for the failings which you possess in even a greater degree. Remember, if you possess the Spirit of Truth, he will search out for you the thoughts and intents of your own heart; that he will pierce you even to the dividing asunder of your soul and spirit. But alas! how many gain a glimpse of surface light; how few penetrate the interior!

"What is Truth?"

"When Pilate had said this, he said to the Jews, I find in him no fault." The multitudes of theories seeking to answer this question, find expositions, such as they are, in the various theologies of the day. These theologies form the most monstrous Babylon ever existing. The majority are professedly Christian; but instead of converging toward each other into the Christ life, which is "the way and the truth," "no fault," a diverging from the principles of truth are continually consummating. We propose the burning of all the so-called Christian theologies, and substituting the simple, faultless life of Christ as a guide—this is all the theology needed; relieving us from the necessity of clerical legerdemain, pulpit wrangling, and the vast expense of that branch of colleges and academies used for theological purposes.

The popular, pettifogging education of the priest never yet made truth more apparent. The agility acquired to twist the scriptures in this or that direction, never yet had a savory influence. It has been used, rather, to interpret to the masses what the original does not mean; to quiet the conscience of the people, thus preventing a revolt against sectarian errors. Truth has a living expression. Christ is that expression. Whoso lives as Christ Jesus did, will be a living representation of truth. Is there any doubt how Jesus lived? None. But no sooner did or does the cross appear, than its unpleasant application is excused by the introduction of a theology that teaches an evasion of the truth; and the exemption of every carnal taste from the cross, rather than its application, is popular Christianity to-day. Every step made in this direction will be repented. What did Jesus answer to Pilate, that so suddenly convinced him of Christ's life being the embodiment of truth, and caused him to exclaim, "I find in him no fault?" We believe Jesus implied in his answer to the question: "What is truth?" that it is "the eternal relinquishment of error." Are we seekers of truth? We learn it in Christ's life—"seek" it there, "and you shall find it."

Had we no theologies, excepting the life of Christ, represented through the medium Jesus, where would this affect us first? "If any man would be a disciple of truth, let him do as I have done—follow me." To the rich man he said: "If thou wouldst be perfect—truth, without fault—make others to share in all that you possess." How this truth would cross the multitudes! But they have theologies that excuse them. What next? "Be virgins!" "I am the Resurrection; my children do not marry! the children of this world do marry, but as I am not of the world, so as my followers you must not be of the world." (John xvii. 16.) "The angels do not marry, neither will those who live like the angels." (Luke xx. 35, 36).

How simple the testimony, yet how unpalatable the cross! Back fly the apologists, to a command given to the first man Adam and his followers; and refusing to see the two orders—the flesh, generative, and the Spirit, resurrection above the flesh—fears for the extinction of the world's inhabitants, conjoined to an ardent desire to prevent such catastrophe, soon form a theological excuse from becoming angels just yet, and again, the senses preponderate truth, the life of Christ; and the more effectually to blind the eyes of the truth-seeking, the once Church of Christ, which began its career by making brothers and sisters of husbands and wives, is prostituted to the reversal of this rule, and glories in making "children of this world" of those who should be the "Children of the Resurrection"—Christ—Truth.

We believe Christ actuated Jesus to an entire relinquishment of unchaste, lustful manipulations, either individually or sexually. Some ignore the marriage bond, who do not truth in their lascivious practices. Just so, some, in their illuminations of truth, discard the "private property" error, while they indulge every other. Some see truth in freedom from war—peace—yet enter a disclaimer if asked to put away the lusts that are the cause of war! Do such seek truth? The desires for fleshly lusts, for private property, for martial glory, banish truth, and when these are banished, then will truth appear. Were Jesus, under the influence of Christ, to enter the various places of worship, witness the fashions, the rich and poor; the libertine, the military heroes; husbands and wives, representatives of millions of private property, together with a theology concocted for the purpose of their continuance, we believe he would feel a holy indignation, that, though it might not call for a scourge of small cords, yet would he rouse the congregations to the truth, that sooner or later they must face the testimony: "Whoso would be my disciple, let him follow me; I am the way, the truth and the life."

Constitution and Bible.

DOCTRINAL FINALITY.

BY F. W. EVANS.

"There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding."

There is also in man a desire for doctrinal finality—a completed and perfected system; like the village that was finished fifty years ago. In esse, this is right, as indicative of a time when there shall be "no darkness at all" in the human soul, even as there is none in Deity. Perverted, it is forever concluded that the end of the journey, in pursuit of truth, is already reached.

A man or woman who resists the tendency to a fixity which organization engenders, moving as the Spirit moves, increasing with the increase of God, creating the letter of the future, rather than being bound by the letter of the past, produces trouble to themselves and their organization. War—controversy, hatred, and persecution—follows in due course of time.

Authority requires an inquisition to keep its subjects on the basis of creed and dogma, lest they substitute therefor the rock of Revelation.

"Woe unto those who are at ease in Zion," who seek to escape the disquiet of continual investigations, occasioned by the influx of new truths.

The Constitution! the Constitution! was the war-cry of the South. To it, the Spirit of Truth on the political plane daringly responded, "What is the Constitution? Who made the Constitution? and the answer came back from the "sovereign people:" We uttered the declaration of principles, and of independence of all Constitutional Governments then in existence; when the Conservatives replied, we will have and wage endless war, unless you let us have a Constitution that shall be a compromise—a covenant—between your Radicalism and our Conservatism, in which our "Peculiar Institution," and a few other peculiar things, shall be incorporated and protected; which covenant shall not be revoked, nor the Constitution amended, except by mutual consent; and that consent we will never give. Thus your declaration of rights and abstract principles shall never be practically attained, except by and through another bloody Revolution. That bloody Revolution came in due time, and the "Peculiar Institution" found no place in the now amended Constitution. Will the other peculiar things ever be removed without another, and another, bloody Revolution? Or, will the Civil Government become, to the Church, as the moon to the sun? and will the Church become as the sun, shining on and on forever?

The Bible! the Bible! is the cry raised against Progress in the Church. But its living members undauntingly ask, What is the Bible? Who made the Bible? How many Bibles are there? Did not God and Christ, and "all truth," exist before the Bible? Again: Who translated these Bibles after they were made?

And history answers: As was the Constitution to the Declaration of first principles by the nation's fathers and founders, so is the Bible—so are all Bibles—to the sermon on the mount, and to the Pentecostal fathers of Christianity—to the simple declarations and statements of first principles by Jesus and his immediate followers, who finally gathered together in the Christ Spirit, and upon the foundation of those abstract, simple principles, in a Pentecostal Church, practicing celibacy, and holding in common all temporal property.

It is well known that the Catholic Bible was formed by the Council of Nice 300 years after the events it purports to record had transpired. While the Protestant Bible, by king James, was a thousand years later coming into existence.

The men who translated these Bibles (for no women have yet translated any Bible) were, as compared with men of our own time, ignorant of science. They believed in the Trinity, the Atonement, the vicarious sacrifice of Jesus for our race, provided they became orthodox; the resurrection of the body, and that the earth was only 6,000 years from its creation out of nothing, and that by the mere fiat of will of a Being. To them God and the devil existed somewhere in the natural universe. One had a city made of all precious things that were grand and good; the other was in a pit, with no bottom to it, filled with brimstone in a state of ignition, like the crater of Vesuvius that never goes out.

Would, or could, these translators fail to find, or to put into their Bibles, the irrational and absurd theological ideas of which they were possessed? That they did this, each affirms and demonstrates of the other. Jerusalem did ever stone her Prophets; and the Zion of the day was ever indignant whenever a new Zion was born. The struggle between organization and revelation is continuous unto the "end of the world;" until all worldly elements are worked out of the organization, and God rules supreme therein. As Gideon said to the people, "I will not rule over you; neither shall my son rule over you. God shall rule over you."

As the Christ Spirit passed from Elijah to Elias, so did the Christ Spirit pass from John the Baptist to Jesus. As a Jewish reformer and master, John had baptized Jesus with water, after his confession. But he had previously been inspired to know that, amongst those who came to him to be baptized, the Messiah would be made known to him by a certain sign; and, when he saw the Spirit of Christ as a dove, resting upon and abiding with him, he knew that the Christ had passed from himself to Jesus, and that he was to become the Messiah, i. e., to incarnate the Christ in his character; and then, as he was decreasing and Jesus increasing, he said to him, Comest thou to me to be baptized? thou didst well; and I did well in baptizing thee. But now I have still more need to come to thee, and be baptized "with fire and the Holy Ghost," than you had to come to me confessing your Jewish sins, and being baptized with water, for I must confess all that the Christ Spirit has come to burn up.

As the natural creation was progressive, so was the spiritual. The moral, spiritual, and religious nature of man was of gradual development in Noah, Abraham, Moses, and in Jesus. Their histories evidence that they learned as long as they lived. The Spirit in Noah created Bible, or record, for Abraham; perhaps only in the form of tradition. The Spirit in Abraham did the same for Moses; and Moses made Bible for the Prophets, down to Jesus; and Jesus made Bible for Ann Lee—"the Scriptures of truth." Ann could read; but she could not read the Catholic or the Protestant Bibles, nor any outward record. What a blessing! seeing that it made her the more dependent upon the Spirit—upon Revelation. And thus may each true Christian throw himself upon the rock of Revelation, and have all traditions, records, and Bibles broken to pieces.

Because the first class of reformers do so much, shall the next class do nothing but ape and worship them?

The Christ Spirit in Jesus, declared that his successors should not only do the same works that he himself had done; but that they should exceed him in that respect. "All truth" must exist, before any could progress into it.

In Noah's time, the millions of earth were sensualists; while he was perfect in his generations for 600 years. Abram came into spiritual truth beyond all Mesopotamia; being the father of a new people, who practiced self-restraint in generation, as Noah had done before him. Moses stood opposed to and by all Egypt in relation to the substance of the whole of the Mosaic laws and institutes.

Jesus "trode the winepress alone;" and Ann Lee was one of a company of eight only, to found the Gospel in America.

Let us Seek Health!

BY G. B. AMERY.

In this day of light and knowledge, any attempt made to attribute bodily ailments, such as headaches, disorders of the stomach, and nervous debility, to some unknown cause, is justly regarded as unfair; and if, as some claim, that in their special case it is not to be avoided, do they not judge that the Lord is dealing very partially with them? Has the Lord intended that we should be sick? Has he, by a fixed and unalterable decree, determined that we shall have the headache, be sick unto death with dyspepsia, or has he decreed that, in obedience to his laws, we shall enjoy health? Let us not evade the issue. Our profession is to do God's will. If it is not his will that we should be sick, let us either ascertain for ourselves or from others what law we are transgressing, and sin no more. Has any one ever traveled out of the lusts of the flesh without experiencing at the commencement of their travel an awakening of the low and sensual desires of that "serpentine nature?" We think not. Those who desired deliverance from it, being tormented with it, readily embraced the testimony against it, and accepted the means placed at their disposal to overcome it. Count it not strange that they who are not convicted should be indifferent, but the testimony against the lusts of the flesh convicted many of its sinfulness and impurity, who at first were thoughtless. "The whole need not a physician," said Jesus. Those who through improper eating or drinking were made sick, and who earnestly desired health at any sacrifice, would eagerly accept any course of diet which would give it; and such, upon their restoration to health, would, of course, have an experience and testimony to give to others, and doing as "they would others should do to them," whenever they meet one afflicted as they had been, would naturally proffer their advice, whether it was accepted or not. If one who has been dyspeptic sees a brother or sister eating or drinking that which caused nauseating sensations in their experience, is it wrong for them to state to the sufferer that abstinence from that article of diet removed the feeling? Having been a confirmed dyspeptic, miserably sick day and night, and through abstinence from certain articles of diet, and fasting at times, measurably diminished the inordinate desire for food, and rid myself of the sickness—enjoying reasonable health as I do, is it strange that I should firmly believe that others afflicted in the same manner that I was, may be cured by the adoption of the same means? Many, when approached upon the subject, say they don't believe they could do without this or that article. Believing where we can know, is weakness. And feeling that we cannot do without, what science and the experience of others prove to be hurtful to our health, is only an evidence of our abject servitude to a depraved and unnatural taste. To put the matter plainly, it is letting our appetites (lusts) tell our minds what they intend to do, instead of our rational faculties deciding what is lawful and for the best. No one will get out of the flesh without suffering, nor need they expect to get out of any evil without tribulation. Any one so bound to any article of diet, as to be unwilling to sacrifice it, if economy and health demand it, is certainly (according to the degree of their opposition) a slave to appetite. Christ's gift of healing was thought to be a great one; but as the ability to live without sin is superior to all the "carnal washings," so is the gift to keep well superior and more to be desired than any gift of healing, which, if sickness be a "transgression of law," could only be temporary in its effect. As lovers of truth, and desirous of progression, let us have a keen testimony against lusts of every kind, being assured that "truth alone prevails."

Whitewater, O.

Self-Government.

BY D. A. BUCKINGHAM.

To wisely speak and rightly act,
In no case deviating,
Require deep thought, much caution, care,
Perhaps some hesitating.
For he who ventures out to Sea,
Tho' in a course well beaten,
Need oft observe the Polar Star,
The point of compass taken.

It is a work of nicest skill
To rule one's self completely,
Day after day, year after year—
In all, perform discreetly.
He who his tongue would govern well,
Must first control his passions;
For most assured, the latter are
The "stepstone" to expressions.

Talk not too much—speak not in vain—
Beware of little errors;
Like Jesus, overcome the world,
Yea, face the "King of Terrors!"
What tho' our natures plead for ease,
And for indulgence prattle,
The Cross of Christ will limit these,
And hold us to the battle.

Jesus, our guide and pattern too,
Sought not his own will merely;
He lived for higher purposes,
And wrought redemption dearly.
He gave his life of carnal birth
For life that is eternal,
Inviting all to follow him,
And with him reign supernal.

'Tis not the noisy winds nor waves,
Tornadoes, avalanches—
That make our hearts harmonious bleed,
With inward, heavenly dances.
The stately oak may stubborn stand
And face the storm and thunder;
But the willow bows most gracefully,
And lets the winds pass over.

Soft words do more to quell the foe
Than volleys of vexation;
Speak kindly then, and thereby show
We abound in good sensations.
For, from the heart the mouth doth speak,
The tongue doth utter phrases,
Some little spark of strife, when lit—
Oh! what a flame it raises!

The still small voice—the voice of love—
Kind looks, and speeches pleasant,
Will heal the wounds misfortune gives,
And happily the present.
'Twill rend from social life distrust,
Discord, and cold embraces,
Make desolation teem with life,
With joy and smiling faces.

Then Heaven will not yonder be,
Above the clouds, and hidden,
But here on Earth, the Kingdom's come,
In which all souls are bidden;
The lame and blind, the deaf and dumb,
No sex nor color slighted,
A glorious Jubilee to all—
And Heaven and Earth united.

Continence and Community.

BY R. W. PELHAM.

There are moral and spiritual truths, either discovered or revealed, which are as fixed and eternal as mathematical ones, and equally demonstrable.

"Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." This aphorism, first uttered by Jesus over 1800 years ago, did not then begin to be a truth; it is a fixed and eternal verity. Beings in the condition of the human race cannot serve God with all their mind and might, as He requires, and at the same time give up their hearts and lives to the acquisition of riches. This is a truth that exists eternally and unchangeably in all worlds. This same truth has been again uttered in other words near the beginning of the 19th century by a modern poet:

"Within the human breast
Two master passions cannot co-exist."

Mammon means riches, wealth; sometimes personified as the God or Demon of riches. The two conditions of mind, devotion to God and devotion to Mammon can no more co-exist in the human breast, than two parallel lines can cross each other. This repugnance of these two conditions, this impossibility with regard to man in his intellectual constitution and present moral condition, and the requirements of Christ's gospel, or the Christian institution upon him, is as certain, unchangeable, eternal and ubiquitous as any mathematical truth. Therefore, in order to be a Christian, a man must divest himself of personal wealth.

The brotherly love and perfect equality which eternal truth enjoins on Christians, forever debar them from personal wealth, and require them to support a joint interest, and to have their goods in common.

The possession of personal wealth and equality of enjoyment are conditions forever repugnant to one another and to eternal truth. Therefore Jesus required the young man to sell all his personal possessions in order to gain an inheritance and treasure in the heavenly kingdom which he was about to set up. He required all others who would be his disciples. "Whosoever he be of you that forsake not all that he hath, can not be my disciple."

The rule of Jesus in regard to property is, individual poverty and social abundance.

The marriage relation is forever repugnant to equality of possession; and this repugnance is founded in the eternal nature of things. If the young man had obeyed Jesus and made himself a pauper, he would have been utterly unqualified for entering the generative order and raising a family. And it was impossible for him to obey that other command of Jesus, "Come follow me," and at the same time perform the work of procreation. Jesus cannot be followed where Jesus did not go.

The generative order necessarily requires separate interests, and the possession of personal property; and this, too, has its foundation in the very nature of things. Consequently, the generative is forever repugnant to the Christ order, which requires the relinquishment of all personal property.

"The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these two are contrary the one to the other." The truth of this irrepressible conflict of flesh and spirit did not then begin to be, when it was first announced by Paul, but is eternal and unchangeable, and exists everywhere in God's universe when they come in contact.

The order of the flesh existed from Adam to Moses, and from Moses to Jesus: Unceasing diligence was exerted to bring it into order and subject it to law. "Divers washings and carnal ordinances," with many other restraints, were imposed by divine sanction, but all without success, as testified by the martyr Stephen: "Ye do always resist the Holy Spirit, as your father did so do ye." Thus, an experiment extended through 4000 years develops an unbroken testimony to the existence of an eternal truth—a fixed law—that the flesh always resists the spirit—that "the carnal mind is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be."

A fixed and immutable law of the generative order is to multiply and divide. Thus a series of successive divisions and separations of interest is continued. The fixed and immutable law of the regenerative order is aggregation—gathering together uniting in one till it reaches the whole brotherhood of man.

The fleshly dispensation or procreative order, is that in which a man and wife become "one flesh" for the purpose of procreating a fleshly offspring. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh."

The spiritual dispensation inaugurated by Jesus, is that in which a man "forsakes the wife," and all fleshly relations, to become one with Christ in being spiritual offspring. "He that is joined to the Lord is one in spirit with him," and "that which is born of the spirit is spirit." "To be carnally minded is death, to be spiritually minded is life." In this aphorism of Paul, he again sets forth the eternal antagonism of the flesh and spirit. It is but the utterance, of a fixed, immutable and eternal truth—a truth which every one who has been made alive in the spirit, knows just as well as Paul. The antagonism between the flesh and spirit does not take place in the air, but in the human breast, and every spiritually minded man knows that this conflict is irreconcilable—knows that his carnal, lustful, generative nature is not subject to the law of God in the Christ order, neither indeed can he—knows that he must keep up an unceasing warfare against it, at the peril of his spiritual life, until it is subdued.

"If ye be risen with Christ, seek those things that are above," where Christ dwells. Those counted worthy of this resurrection—those who have risen with Christ and live in his sphere "above" the flesh, neither marry nor are given in marriage. "They are children of the resurrection order, who follow Jesus in the regeneration, and are exalted with him above the generative work."

"A Temple which Hath Foundations."

BY E. H. WEBSTER.

Matt. vii. 24, and Haggai ii. 6, 7, 8.

Tempered with sadness is our joy,
And prayers our thoughts employ,
For avarice which walked on high,
Whose temples almost touched the sky,
Knows not, alas! its doom is nigh,
But vainly strives to build anew
The temples of the past,
And makes of earthly clay and dew
A temple that will last.

The glory of the latter day,
Whose strength shall bear truth's keenest ray,
Must be with broad foundations laid,
With justice and with virtue stayed,
And righteousness so long delayed;
All else will surely sweep away,
All refuges of lies,
All shaken in that burning day,
When grim oppression dies.

O, Tempora, O, Mores!

We are in receipt of very many letters that bewail the conditions of the sectarian world—of its high professions, yet poor practices; of its advanced call to higher life, and from unchristian loves and lusts, with so small reply.

The following, from a Rev. Dr., near Springfield, Mass., puts the case, not just as we should; but, we believe, fully as strong as his congregations will bear with him; and we have no doubt, if he continues thus to preach, he will have to flee to the rocks and caves of Shaker homes for protection. His name is free to those interested.

"WHO ARE THE INFIDELS?"

 "The essential features of the testimony of Jesus are: That his followers must be of 'one soul and mind, and have all things in common;' and, 'that it is good for a man not to touch a woman.'"

"The first will prevent temptations to stealing, cheating, prostitution, etc., lessen labor, do away with armies, castles, war, police; so that there can be better education, better living, and more comfort for all.

"In the second, we find a prohibition to marriage, free love, fornication, and lust generally, as now found inside and outside of the marriage order; all must live as sisters and brothers. He that is already married, must "lead about his wife as a sister."

"The original says, not that marriage is honorable; but let marriage be (made) honorable; that is, abstain from carnal intercourse even in marriage. The Catholics say: "That the irrational, insane stupidity of carnal intercourse cannot be pointed out too clearly, nor condemned too severely." Those who preach much of an all-good, all-wise Creator, must know he cannot love to see such miserable children as they produce; that they interfere with his right to produce the best.

"Even though I say it, so-called Christians who fail to live up to these two foundational doctrines, are infidels to Christianity; hypocrites to the cause; liars in profession; sailing under false colors, and unworthy the confidence of the true believers in Christ.

"There are very many Revs., who believe these assertions as truly as I do; yet none of us dare preach but a part of the truth for most obvious reasons. The Shaker is doing a silent, but terrible work to old theologies; and is the only medium I know of, that dares make known the whole truth, without the loss of its bread and butter, together with inquisitorial persecution." D. J. M.

Act from Principle.

How few persons there are whose lives are governed entirely by principle, rather than inclination. Even those of us who may be endeavoring to live for high purposes, come far short of our aspirations; alas, how very far short! How often we find ourselves debating with our convictions of right and duty, questioning if it might not be as well for us to yield to inclination just for this time, promising our disturbed consciences that we will make up for the present indulgence by more rigorous self-denial, and strict attention to duty.—Vain, fallacious reasoning of a weak nature! We can never make up for a neglected opportunity, one misspent hour, one wrong, selfish act. Once past, the opportunity unimproved, the hour wasted, the act committed, and it is beyond our reach—beyond recall, except in thoughts of regret. We may atone for it, but we can never change the past. Alas! how painfully are we aware of this fact.

Then should we all endeavor the more earnestly to make our lives ornaments of principle; for we all know that after all, the path of duty, though sometimes rugged, is not without sweet pleasures; and let us never follow our inclinations, if they would lead us away from the right. Then shall we be permitted at the last to look back upon our lives with satisfaction, feeling that we have "done what we could," and that our Father regardeth us with smiles of approbation.—Zell's Casket.

Answers to Correspondents.

"Is marriage, as generally practiced, wrong in all cases?"

We answer in the negative. Where there is no law manifested to the individual higher than marriage, let him practice it. Jesus answered this question very properly, see Matt. 19, 11. Some want and will have no higher law, until they are forced to do so; others, like the Shakers, seek to know God's will, and to do it.

"How does marriage affect the spirit?"

By bringing it under bondage to the generative order—the dominion of the first man—earthly; and by preventing its entrance into the Christian ranks, its whole being is consecrated, not in the service of the God of the Christians, but of the Jews, where marriage, war, private property and their consequences were and are popular. If you are a professor of Christianity, and adore marriage, compare your profession with 1 Cor., 7 chap. 32, 33, 34, and either repent, or join the Jews, and strictly keep the marriage laws.

"Is it wrong to work for an independence in riches?"

No man has any right to be rich. The gospel teaches Christians to share alike. Whoever is rich, should know, one or many are consequently correspondingly poor. The gospel says to the mountainous rich, come down, and to those in the valley of poverty, rise up. The rich are still comfortable, while the poor are made equally so. Now take conscience and an eternity of reflection into the council, and our word for it, present and future heaven would demand a liberal division.

"Do you require individuals to give up their money or other property upon joining?"

We do not, never have. Your information is incorrect. Individuals are welcome to retain property in their own right; but Society does claim, that while said individuals are enjoying its benefits, that the use or interest of their property shall be for the upbuilding of the Cause. No individual would desire to remain long in a society who had so little consecration that he meant to get what he could and keep it. This is world-like, not Christian. Send for a copy of our "Brief Exposition"—Six cents.

"Why is it, that those who leave your Society are seldom or never successful after they leave it?"

Shakerism spoils individuals for worldly enjoyment, worldly ambition, etc. The fact is a notably true one, and admits of a larger illustration than we can now give. He who would be a Shaker should seriously count its cost. There is nothing terrible nor compulsory in the system. To its subjects it is all lovely. But he is a fool who, having been on the firm basis of truthful life, could expect to succeed with God's blessing, after forsaking the counsel of God. We know of no more pitiable case than a seceding Shaker—and they share our pity.

BY RUTH WEBSTER.

While reading in the Golden Age of March 23, the account given by Marie Ladreyt, of the child labor in England, I had no doubt of the correctness of her statements.

Every feeling heart must be grieved at the bare recital of such deep degradation and misery on the one side, and the utter depravity and brutality on the other. We have just rid ourselves of chattel slavery—that incubus which was fast sinking the nation into ruin, and which was enough to make every true American blush for the honor of his country. But American slavery is civilization and refinement compared with the condition of many thousands of children in the factory districts of England. But we need not go to England to find sufferings and objects of charity; to find work for philanthropists and reformers; for though we have done much there is still much that remains to be done. There yet are untold sufferings in this country. Who, that having lived in our cities, but has been pained to see the extravagance and luxury of the rich, and the abject poverty and degraded condition of the poor? It is true that many philanthropic individuals have done nobly; having given largely of their abundance for bettering the condition of the needy. But does this reach the root of the matter? Is it not like lopping off a branch here and there, while the tree still grows and bears its bitter fruit? Our friend Marie, after having faithfully delineated the vast amount of misery it costs to earn wealth and procure luxuries for a small minority, more than hints at the remedy.

She asks, "Is it strange that Communism finds so many advocates, and that it gains ground so rapidly in all countries?" I suppose, of course, she means the rapid spread of the doctrine—the idea; for it is no where practically carried into effect except in the United States. In the regular progress of mind, we must first have ideas and then practice; and it is an encouraging fact that the idea of Communism is so extensively being embraced.

But can Europe, and England in particular, do nothing in the mean time to ameliorate the condition of her poor outraged and suffering children? England! who sends missions to christianize China, Hindostan, the Isles of the Ocean, and to the ends of the earth, while there are millions in her own domains, more degraded and worse abused, than in any heathen nation on the globe. Yet she claims to stand at the head of the civilized nations—boasts that she is the bulwark of the Protestant religion! It is well to call it protestant, for certainly it is a protest to Christianity. Out upon such Christianity—such Christians! "Why call ye me Lord, Lord?" Shall we advise her to send missionaries to humanize her suffering children? Of what use to preach, or try to instruct them in their present condition? If they had a passport to the Kingdom, they would barter it for a loaf of bread, or a bottle of whiskey. But are these really the heathen? Are not those who oppress the poor; who rob the hireling of his wages to fill their own coffers, that they may live in splendor and revel in luxury—are not these the heathen? And I had almost said paupers too; for they are a non-producing class, living on the earnings of others without a just remuneration. But what use of knowing these things—of having our sympathies awakened, unless we can do something for their relief—unless we can apply a remedy? If every thing has failed heretofore to reach the case, suppose we try something new? At least new on the other side of the water. It has already been tried on this side to a limited extent, and, as far as it has been practiced, it has proved effectual.

There can be nothing valuable gained without self-denial and the cross, and these are what mankind do not naturally love.

The times call for self-sacrificing souls, that are willing to suffer and bear and do for the advancement of the race.

The remedy for this vast and growing evil cannot be reached in any other way. Are not the devout every where praying: "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven?"

Is there heaven on earth? Is not hell there too? As one advances, the other must give way. We need a pentecostal baptism to relax our grasp on our earthly possessions! There is land enough, and wealth enough, were it equalized, for every individual to have a competence, and every child properly educated. Shaker Communism, we believe is a sure remedy. No member of the Community ever suffers for food, clothing or shelter; but mankind seem unprepared for so much self-denial. Let those over the waters, or on this side, who embrace the theory of Communism, organize and enter into the practical life which their theory calls for. If they cannot yet bear a full cross or deny themselves as far, or as much as Shakerism calls for, let them come as near as they can, and thus test the truth of their theory, and the Shakers will bid them God-speed.

Let every one who has a heart to feel for down-trodden humanity, consider the subject and act upon it.

Union Village, Ohio.

The two articles following are from some of our Shaker correspondents. We feel ashamed to say they were sent anonymously. As they have kept so long and so well in the "pigeon hole," we have concluded to depart our usual rule, and print them, as valuable additions to our literature and testimony, whose authors we wish to know, and to chastise. *

Woman's Rights.

"WOULDEST THOU RULE? RULE THYSELF."

GENESIS, III, 16.

Evidently in this text is the voice of nature; even those must admit who deny its being the voice of nature's God; and fearfully has the prediction been fulfilled, as physiological researches abundantly prove.

"And thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." This sentence shows, that "in the beginning" man did not rule, at least, in whatever it is herein declared he shall; and further, that the transfer of rule was the consequence of woman's desire.

Fortunately for the skeptical, experience as well as science comes to the aid of revelation in proof of this. The maiden still rules; the wife must serve. The transfer of rule continues with the continuance of the curse. Now, since the necessity for man's reproducing his kind upon the earth, could alone necessitate the difference in sex, and that difference alone, makes it necessary or even possible for either to rule in any general sense, it follows, that the rule spoken of in the text must have reference to the procreative function.

And since the duties of maternity must necessarily restrict the action of the female; and those of paternity as necessarily leave the male unrestricted; it follows, that whatever should subject the female, in any department of the animal kingdom, to male rule, must be productive of disorder. And if, with the logically admitted power in the ruler to govern the ruled, we admit a desire in the ruled to be governed, we shall begin to comprehend the force of the text. Shall we admit this, and thus easily account for the disorders of society; thus easily solve the "mystery of iniquity"—"take away the veil from the face of all nations?" Shall we accept the scriptural account, in so far, at least, as to admit that depraved denizens of the spirit world found means to poison the mind of our first mother with the virus of illicit desire, thus corrupting the streams of human life at their fountainhead, and greatly multiplying the sorrows of earth as a natural consequence? We of the Shaker order do admit this; do believe it to be the only logical clue to the unraveling of the "mystery of godliness." We believe that the human race, in common with the animal, were induced in their creation with instincts, laws, powers, adequate to their preservation in health and happiness; that the fact that mankind have not been so preserved while the animal has is incontestable proof that these instincts have been followed—these laws obeyed—these powers employed by the latter, according to the design of the Creator, while by the other, they have not; and that to the difference in their habits alone, is to be ascribed the difference in their conditions. And since the principal difference in their habits relates to the procreative right, we can but conclude, that herein is seen the principal cause of the physical degeneracy and moral depravity of the human race to-day. That herein is seen "the root of the trees which the Father hath not planted;" and what woman complains of, low wages; monopoly of business pursuits; injustice of the laws; being deprived of the franchise, etc., are but legitimate branches; and only by applying the axe at the root of the evil trees, can she reasonably expect the branches to wither. And thus believing, we easily see the necessity for the second appearance of Christ, or rather, the manifestation of the Second Christ, "the Comfortor," in her own order, to restore to woman, not only her long lost rule (of herself), but a power in addition, enabling her to preserve and employ her charms in a far more noble cause than that of generation (noble as that is when conducted in an orderly manner), to wit, in that of regeneration. And here she has no cause to complain of the usurpation of her rights by the man; for the life of purity which, following Christ in the regeneration necessitates, places them precisely in the relation of brother and sister, where they are alike mutually dependent and mutually independent. Doing away with the "trouble in the flesh," and bringing, oh, how abundantly, the blessings of the Spirit!

And all who will, may come and partake of the waters (blessings of this kind) of life freely. But, plead not for your rights, O woman! so long as you voluntarily surrender them. Dream not of liberty, so long as you desire to be a slave. "Wouldst rule? Rule thyself."

"Exhort one another to good Works."

Many, styling themselves, no doubt, Christian youths, are spending much valuable time in devouring the poisonous literature which is floating unrestrainedly through the land.

Beware! their word will eat as doth a canker, as many, made weak by it, can testify; 'their word,' whose highest aim is wealth; which aim they pursue regardless of the evil influence they exert, in obtaining their hold upon the innocent mind. Who was it that said not long since to a bright youth absorbed in reading a corrupting novel, "I hate, abhor, those sickly, sentimental stories?" It was, I think, Pure Mind! She also exhorted youth to more faithfulness in cultivating the better part of their nature, by reading such books as contain instruction for mental and physical improvement; she told them to study, and to meditate upon the thoughts and actions of the good and great, and to strive to emulate their example; and that in so doing they would increase their internal beauty.

Reflection and experience prove that more, of real value, is learned outside of books than inside of them. The bulk of mankind have to procure a physical and spiritual livelihood; and it is obvious that those things are of the most value which tend to increase facilities to this end. Books are of value for two purposes: to train the mind of youth, so that they may be prepared to receive, with ease, ideas when presented to them; and that their minds may, by exercise, be rendered flexible, and capable of pursuing sustained trains of thought, and to increase in their powers of observation both of external and of spiritual things; secondly, to enable the mind as it comes to maturity, to receive with advantage the thoughts of others; that is, as an assistance to thought, not to give them a mastery over the mind. It should, however, be constantly borne in mind that reading should never be made the chief aim of life. It is necessary for the enlightenment of the understanding; but the progress of individuals is the chief aim of life, or rather the only design of our existence. It being true, then, of those books, the matter of which is, in itself, good, that they should be used as a means and not as an end, it is clearly of the greatest importaunce for youth—a time of life when things which affect the imagination are generally deeply impressed on the mind—to carefully avoid everything which does not conduce to solid improvement. The mind is like the stomach: those who live sparingly on plain nourishing food, and take plenty of exercise, are invariably healthy; while those who diet is luxuriously, stimulating and excessive, suffer from diseases of all kinds. Thus it is with the mind: reading that trains the mind, or brings to our aid the thoughts of others, as above stated, and thus nourishes thought in ourselves, is good; but that reading which merely excites the feeling, and increases or generates morbid fancies, a light and unsettled state of the mind, is bad to the last degree. Those minds which progress are always more occupied in thinking than in reading; and the healthier the tone of thought the more rapid the progress. Use books to nourish a progressive state of the mind, not to clog the brain with mental rubbish. Again: Reading of particular kinds, though proper for some persons, is not proper for others. Thus, those who have found out that their spiritual welfare is of more importance to them than their temporal, inasmuch as the former is for Eternity, the latter for time, will find that reading sufficient which assists the spirit to free itself from temporal influences, and to discover spiritual truths; but those who have not been fortunate enough to strike on this path, are occupied mainly with their own temporal welfare, or in the discovery of physical and intellectual truth. But those, whose time and talents are occupied in the discovery of means to rouse and stimulate unhealthy cravings for excitement of feeling in the young, are most viciously employed; and the mind that admits their influence will certainly be injured.

My youthful friends, there are abundant means within our reach for cultivating our being's highest good. Let us thus exercise the spirit of watchfulness over our minds, and let us remember that the reading of exciting, vicious stories forms no part of the vocation of a Christian.

Trust in God.

BY E. T. LEGGETT.

When clouds obscure the land,
Should we in darkness roam;
Oh! Lord extend thy hand,
And kindly lead us home.
We give our hearts to thee;
We would be wholly thine,
Thy grace will make us free,
Thy love will make divine.

Whate'er is needful here,
We know that thou wilt give;
And be thou ever near,
For only then we live.
The only wealth we have,
Is treasured up above;
The only wealth we crave,
Is thy approving love.

Earth has on us no claim;
We've severed every tie;
Home, fortune, friends and fame,
We've bid them all good-bye.
Thou art, Oh God, our all;
We ask for nothing more,
Let good or ill befall,
Thy name we'll still adore.

Be thou our Father, Friend,
As we thy children are;
When weak, thy blessing send;
When wrong, in mercy spare.
Though ill thou oft betide,
And friendship still betray,
We'll in thy faith abide,
And keep thy living way.

Correspondence.

MIDDLE GRANVILLE, Nov. 15th, 1871.

TO THE DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS:
Yours of the 29th ult. is duly received. I freely acknowledge my thankfulness for the good expressions therein contained; I am fully convinced that the standard of Right, Truth, and Divine Light among your people, is towering far above all emblems of Light, given under the seal of Church Policy, ignorantly sustained, through faith in sacrificial offerings of materialism and the shed blood of one body, with other machinations of Priestcraft, all under the sanction of a fighting Church. How aptly are they styled "blind leaders of the blind!" how low, at the very base, of all knowledge of a God of Love and Truth; and how ignorant of the true resurrection of Christ, in the soul! His divine attributes are love, not hate, truth without error, light which expels all darkness, and charity without selfishness. I truly did enjoy that spirit of love and harmony which I realized among your people; it is a baptism I crave, for every moment of my life, but my surroundings are not always favorable for such enjoyment.

While on my visit to the dear Shakers, in Enfield Conn., one year ago, I felt the spirit and power of God around and in me, realizing the glory revealed through the baptism of Love. Recently, I was influenced to visit your Society, where I enjoyed, mingling in spirit with you, in the harmony and peace of your beloved circle, receiving new impulses to be good and true, to learn more perfectly the laws of my being; and "the way" which is Christ, which leads me up the highways of progression, through green pastures and by still waters; unfolding to my spiritual vision new truths, and new beauties in the philosophy of life. I believe, however, that your position has not been comprehended generally, by the world. But in this dispensation, a new light has dawned upon the earth, that is revealing your true faith and practice. Its soundness is being tested by others, their eyes being opened to behold the light as revealed through the Spirit. I have not only a knowledge of it as given through signs, but, in a visit to you, where blending our spirits, the light is still more appreciated. I must confess I think the Shakers a little ahead of this dispensation, which has shone out upon us all, for profit. The marriage question and human rights in general, are having a fair and thorough appeal to common sense. God speed the time, when all the inconsistencies of dark Theology shall have a renovation of character. Then we, Shakers and Spiritualists, with the Angels of God, can cry as of old, Away with such abominations; and let the earth rejoice that a better covenant is observed; and humanity are being resurrected from darkness to light, through the second coming of Christ.

His footsteps are traceable back to the opening up of the dispensation, when the Shakers took a bold stand against all iniquity; and now through the different phases of spiritual development among Spiritualists, the car is still moving on in which all, in time, are to be brought to a knowledge of the Truth, and its resurrecting power. I find the operations of the Spirit with me, are nearly allied to the exercises of the Shakers; not that I am free from sin and ignorance, but am striving for the higher life; and believe that unborn generations will grow more perfectly into this "way," and Shakers will be multiplied without number. I speak boldly and honestly my ideas; and I declare, I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; it is the power of God unto salvation. Sincere love to all,

ELIZA BLOSSOM.

"Have the Shakers made a Mistake?"

The Phrenological Journal for June, contained an article entitled "Have the Shakers made a mistake?" and followed this question by an argument seeking to prove that Ann Lee never taught celibacy, but merely chastity in marriage; and the following remark is what led to our answer, appended hereto: "We have not found, we cannot find, anything in history to warrant the inference that Ann Lee taught or practiced celibacy!"

MY DEAR WELLS: We have been so familiar in the past, who shall say our spirits may not consult matters of history, to-day? You are in possession of the archives of mental and psychic forces. I may be supposed to know more of Ann Lee's history—and this renews the query, "Have the Shakers made a mistake?" I will not perpetrate a wearisome rejoinder; but let me ask if it is common for a class of individuals to become more radical than the founder of that class, particularly upon a point so adverse to natural inclination, yet so conjoined to angel nature as an entire abnegation of sexual coition? Ann Lee was the leader of Shaker Societies in her day, but is not now. Yet, having improved upon some of the themes and practices of her day, we are only as strong on this, as she was. You give her large credit as a sensible woman; too much so, you think, to inaugurate a system so unnatural as existing Shakerism. Ann Lee never condemned marriage, but considered it the most honorable relation outside of Christianity! Her testimony was not only against coition, but her followers, upon uniting, enjoyed separate beds for the sexes. The Shakers admit the large good in marriage, when properly conducted—but claim that there is no "kingdom of heaven" on earth, in marriage. When the married die, they expect to enter into the ranks of angels, who are living just as the Shakers do here, being Shakers. We believe, they then will wish that they had learned angelic practices while here. Now, as to matters of history and fact, let us quote Ann Lee's own words.

Daniel Wood and others testify hearing her say:

"Sometime after I had set out to live up to the light of God, manifested through James and Jane Wardly, I fell under heavy trials and tribulations on account of lodging with my husband; and as I looked to them for counsel, I opened my mind to Jane. She said: James and I lodge together, but we do not touch each other any more than two babes; you may go and do likewise.

"In obedience, I did so; but could not sleep, seemingly, any more than if I had been on a bed of embers. I quitted the bed in tribulation, and continued crying to God in deep labors of soul, for the space of twelve days and nights, to know his will, and how the restoration of the fall should take place. While in this labor, I saw Jesus, in vision. He revealed to me the depth of man's loss, how it was accomplished, and how to regain lost virtue. Then it was I was made able to bear an open testimony against coition, from which the root of evil springs. Then I felt the power of God flow into my soul like a fountain of living waters. From that day to the present, I have taken up a full cross, not only against coition, but all the doleful works of the flesh!"

We live as Brethren and Sisters together, without any physical contact of the sexes, and keep a flaming testimony against individual lusts, and thus shun "the very appearance of evil." Present to us an individual, who, being married, and living under the most favorable circumstances of the reproductive sphere, who is happier or more heavenly than a thorough-going, full cross-bearing Shaker, and I will reconsider the assertions, that Shakerism is the rudiments of the Kingdom of heaven on Earth; and that Marriage never was, and never can be a Christian institution! Yours,

G. A. LOMAS, Shakers, N.Y.

"This is for your Health."

The most popular and consistent Health journals of to-day are those which teach prevention of disease; and where this has been contracted, direct applications of water or magnetic baptisms. Of this class of journalism, we cannot speak too highly. It begins a reformation of the physical race in the most proper direction—diet. And until this is accomplished, we shall, from the unnatural concomitants of blood, continue to bewail the multiplication of so-called human beings, of whom God cannot make Shakers. We have need of more good material for Christ baptisms; and we hail every effort made on the earthly plane, to regulate the diet of the race, through this its reproductions, and through both of these, teach man of the two orders of existence, first the earthly, then the heavenly; and that properly directed, expedites this. We call attention to

The Herald of Health: is a good and reliable journal of its class. It has, in some late articles, dealt out to its readers some very unpalatable truths; but whoever has swallowed them, have been convinced of their efficacy. Price, $1.25 per year, Wood & Holbrook, New York.

Home and Health, is also deserving of much success. $1.50 a year. De Puy, Holmes & Co., New York.

The Laws of Life, Danville, N. Y., comes from "Our home on the hillside"; and no journal tells more truth about dress for females, and diet for dyspeptics. Austin, Jackson & Co., Publishers. Send for sample copy.

The Science of Health threatens to surpass all else in counsels to the well and in its truth-telling to the sick. Whoever subscribes for this, may "throw all medicine to the dogs"—who heretofore have been too sensible for the doctors. Its appearance is strikingly beautiful. Price, $2.00 a year. S. R. Wells, New York.

True Shaker Discipline.

BY HARRIET BULLARD.

To be without fault should be the object of every professedly Christian soul. This is attained only by severe discipline. To be a full Christian requires a complete subjection of self unto the law of Christ. In the absence of Jesus, the apostles, ancient, holy men and women, we must covenant to accept as our leaders and directors those of our own day who are striving to faithfully represent Christ principles. Having so covenanted, willful disobedience on our part is as really rebellion against Christ as though we had said "I will" or "I won't" to the person of Jesus. It costs much self-denial always to yield self and selfishness to known and accepted authority, but a cheerful and continued submission there will prove a safeguard from other evils; while to rebel against this is worse than the practice of gross evils, and will even sooner prove the downfall of any unwilling mind. Let those who think they stand uprightly in all else but obedience to their present lead, take heed, or soon they

"Fall like stars to rise no more!"

WANTED:—A few hundred thousands or millions to investigate and "expose" Shakerism. We have been so interested in those attempted, pro and con, that we hail with delight these various attempts to illustrate and ventilate what we so love. If, in these varied illuminations, any fraud, deceit or unrighteousness should appear, none will be happier to learn it than ourselves, or more ready to condemn and eradicate it. Wanted: More "Expositions."

DECEASED: J. Rufus Bryant, Pleasant Hill, Ky., went to rest on May 6th. He was a bright light in Zion's upbuilding. As a Trustee, he had few equals in all that pertains to consecrated temporal aid and endeavor. We give Elder Harvey Eades' announcement: "J. R. Bryant went to Heaven on the 6th."

Also, Betsy Hastings, aged 67, May 25, at Alfred, Me. In Shirley, Mass., 7th inst., Caroline Baxter, 30 yrs. Also, several deaths at South Union, Ky., no names given.

AMONG many suggestions, in answer to our question in March, Elder J. S. Prescott urges an assemblage of delegates at Watervliet or Mt. Lebanon, on Aug. 6, 1874, from every Society of Believers; and to invite the most advanced Spiritualists to attend the same.

WE are in receipt of glowing accounts of Shaker meetings, held at Portland, Me., Farmington, O., and Albany, N. Y., with the Spiritualists and others. While we are thus giving the multitudes thousands of invitations to investigate our principles and examine our lives, such vituperative articles as are occasionally seen, entitled "Shakerism Exposed," must fail of deceiving many, and do us much more good than harm. Nothing could please us better than to have thousands inquiring, "Are these things so?" and then come among us, sift us to the foundation, and realize as we do how truly God does cause "the wrath of man to praise him!" *

FROM our "Outlook"—whence we seek to read "the signs of the times"—we behold true spiritualists in a very advanced condition of theology, which demands of them an advance in purity of life that appears very much like Shakerism! Whether this is an optical illusion or not, remains to be seen. We anticipate on the part of these a congregation in cities and villages, where they can yield each other consolations under the cross. We are aware of some who testify to us their entire abstinence from fleshly lusts; and soon these are destined to "flow together," inform each other, and experience, measurably, the eternal, celibate, angel life, which will fit them here for the companionship of angels there. If we are mistaken, then we are prepared to witness the phenomenon of very bright "stars falling from heaven" into the corroding practices of earth—spiritualists (?) fulfilling fleshly inclinations, and failing to walk according to the call of the Spirit. *

ELDER F. W. EVANS and a noted lecturer and reformer have been writing each other letters upon some living issues of the day. We have put these in tract form, and are ready to send them, post paid, per doz. 25 cents.

THE worldly principle of mateship finds no sympathy in Shaker testimony; we believing that brethren and sisters in Christ are without distinction or preference in each other's estimation. A circular, lately issued from this Office, has the names of the leading officers, male and female, of the Novitiate Orders at Watervliet, N. Y., and Mt. Lebanon. "To the pure all things are pure;" but in our absence of knowing who alone are pure, we acknowledge an over-sight on our part in departing the counsel of "shunning the very appearance of evil," thus giving the impure a desired opportunity of expressing themselves, whose pardon we now beg; for we should have been in better business. *

"Not peace on the earthly plane, but a sword, is the effect of THE SHAKER in my family!" R.

Elder H. L. E. writes: I sought to have a neighbor subscribe. He replied: "Do you think I am fool enough to create a disturbance in my family by subscribing for THE SHAKER?"

"I have read THE SHAKER attentively and noticed it in The Era, and I must say if there were not so much cross and self-denial in its instructions I should be almost persuaded to become a Shaker!"

COL. J. T—N.

"I had thought that when I departed this life I should part with the world; but THE SHAKER has convinced me that unless I get rid of the world before I die I shall be burdened with more of it there than I have here. What is the world? Let us reflect."

"Let THE SHAKER unfold its whole self. Either you must come down to us, or we must come up to you. Amen."

FIFTY CENTS PER ANNUM.

Daniel and John.

BY F. W. EVANS.

"The superior will govern," were words spoken by Ann Lee. He whose right it is to reign, will reign in the end. God is above all. The spiritual is "superior" to the natural, even as cause exists before effects. And, as a "little leaven leaveneth the whole lump," in process of time, so will the Christ Spirit, ultimately, leaven the whole mass of humanity. It goeth forth conquering, and to conquer. The highest class of spiritual religious people, in any day in the past, were as Moses expressed it to his Israel: "The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people."

As a priesthood to mankind, and as a prophetic order, how could it otherwise be? The Jews were a royal priesthood, commissioned to teach the nations of earth important radical principles. In Israel, as in every other nation, an order of Prophets and Prophetesses existed, as ministers of the Christ heavens, few in number, and a far more numerous order of Prophets and Prophetesses were inspired by the gods of their people, tutelary divinities.

As a priesthood, Israel performed the office of instructor of babes to the Gentiles in the most efficient manner. When its national organization was entirely broken up, its national priesthood disrupted, their religious ministrations abolished, the daily sacrifice taken away, the feasts and solemn assemblies suspended, the temple destroyed, and the people themselves transported into foreign lands, their missionary work to mankind was only the more decidedly successful, and powerfully triumphant. But the glory thereof redounded almost exclusively to the honor and glory of the Hebrew God. Moses, the greatest of the early Hebrew prophets, accomplished the national organization of his people; created the Levitical priesthood, and established it upon the foundation of the national existence. Consequently, it stood in its original integrity; it became corrupted, it rose or fell, was pure or impure, as the body, of which it was the head, was holy or unholy: it was always "like priest, like people." The Prophet was the fountain, the priesthood the cup, from whence the people drank; and sometimes the people filled that cup from their own fountains. Thus, when Moses, the Prophet, was up in the mount, communing with the God of Israel, receiving from the highest spiritual source to which they had access, the ten commandments, written by spirits on tables of stone, as the basis of all succeeding laws and statutes to Israel, and having left the whole nation in charge of the Levitical priesthood, and under their legitimate ministration; "when the people saw that the Prophet delayed to come down from the mount, to inspire and guide the priesthood, the people gathered themselves together unto Aaron, their priest, and said unto him, "Up, make us gods which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man, or Prophet, which brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we know not what has become of him." "Now Aaron had made a molten calf of the offerings of the people, and said, These be thy gods, O Israel; and they sat down to eat and drink, after the manner of the people of the land, and, like them, when the feast was over, they rose up to commit fornication."

Moses knew nothing of the defection of his people; but "God said to him: Up, get thee down; for the people which thou broughtest up out of Egypt have corrupted themselves. Let me alone, that my wrath may wax hot against them, that I may consume them as in a moment; and I will make of thee a great nation." When acting as a Christ Prophet, and under its inspiration, Moses was not only above the Jewish king and priesthood; but was superior in governmental dignity and official supremacy to the God of Israel, who was himself but a subordinate or tutelary divinity. Yet was Moses, at that time, the meekest man that there was upon earth; and therefore did he not only resist this appeal to his ambition, but became a minister of the Christ Spirit to the Hebrew divinity, by which he pacified his anger, and allayed in him the spirit of revenge.

Thus it is recorded: "Moses besought the Lord his God, and said, Lord, why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people which thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt with great spiritual power and mighty physical manifestations? Wherefore should the Egyptians speak and say, For mischief did he bring them out to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth. Turn from thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil which thou hast devised against thy people;" for they are still better mediums than any other nation to work through—better material to build with. Should you take my posterity, they also would come to the same state, and develop similar conditions. For the attainment of your object, the final redemption of the race of man, you can do no better than keep hold of this people. "And the Lord repented of the evil which he had thought to do unto his people."

And when Moses went down from the mount, "he saw the calf and the dancing; and Moses' own anger waxed hot; for he was only a medium of the Christ Spirit, which was not incarnated in him, nor incorporated in his own personal character. Moses had not thus attained; he partook of the spirit of his God; and in his wrath—the wrath of man—he threw down the precious tablets "written with the finger of God, and break them beneath the mount." Then he took the calf which they had made, and burnt it in the fire and ground it to powder, strewed it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink up their own God. And the Levites went in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, slaying every man his neighbor, and every man his brother and companion, until three thousand men were slain. The remainder were plagued all their days because of the calf which they had made; for the Lord had said, Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book. And all the people saw a cloudy pillar stand at the tabernacle door when Moses entered in, and God talked with him face to face as a man talketh with his friend. This caused Moses' face so to shine, that he put a veil over his face when he appeared before the people. And the cloud of the Lord was upon the tabernacle by day, and fire was on it by night, in the sight of all the house of Israel, throughout all their journeyings. The practical result of all this was, that Israel took possession, by means of a spiritualistic warfare, of all the land of Canaan. And it was only when the nation sinned after the manner of the people of the land, that the heathen were able to carry them away into captivity. And even then, under the law that the superior will govern, they became a power in the midst of their enemies.

As Joseph was raised up in Egypt to be its chief ruler, under Pharaoh, so in Babylon we find the captive Daniel, by the same agency, raised to power in the civil government. His spiritual gifts were superior to any which the magi, soothsayers, astrologers, or wise, scientific men of the nation, who held him in bondage, were equal unto. Thus Daniel and his fellows attained to almost supreme authority in Babylonia, the most mighty nation then upon the face of the earth. Being chosen to stand before the king, he and his companions carefully observed the Mosaic law of diet, subsisting on pulse, with water for their only drink. With this fare, the Jewish captives proved to be "in matters of wisdom and understanding, ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers that were in all the realm of Babylon; and Daniel continued unto the first year of Cyrus, king of Persia, who conquered the kingdom of Babylon."

The means by which this influence was attained and maintained for so long a period is worthy of critical examination. Principles are eternal. And the Millennium, of which Daniel so plainly prophesied, is a possibility of the race illustrated in his own history, to be ultimately effected by the same spiritual agencies that were employed by David to secure his ascendancy over all the opposing influences in Babylon. His foundational principle was vegetable diet—conscientious religious observance of the laws of physiology. He was also strictly obedient to his spiritual guide—the Christ Spirit. He feared and obeyed God rather than man, as a Prophet, and assumed the consequences.

It was the rulers of a great national organization, with its legal enactments and penal laws, versus the enslaved Prophet. The king dreamed, and required the magi to interpret the dream. "Tell thy servants the dream, and we will show the interpretation," they said. But the king replied: "The thing is gone from me; and if he will not make known unto me the dream, with the interpretation thereof, ye shall be cut in pieces, and your houses shall be made a dunghill. Tell me the dream, and I shall know that ye can interpret it aright." Pleading for life, they declared, "There is not a man upon earth that can show the king's matter. And no king, lord, or ruler, asketh such things at any magician, or astrologer, or Chaldean. None other can show it, except the gods whose dwelling is not with flesh." This only made the king angry and very furious; and he commanded to destroy all the wise men of Babylon," the captives of Judah included. But, when Daniel and his fellows prayed, the secret was revealed unto them by their ministering Christ Spirit. Then Arioch took Daniel into the king in haste, saying, I have found a man of the captives of Judah who will interpret thy dream and vision, and show what shall be in the latter days. Daniel saw the march of empires succeeding each other, and their varying characteristics, under the figure of a great image, made of gold, silver, brass, iron, and clay. The last of these, the toes of the feet, representing many kingdoms and republics, instead of one mighty empire like Babylon the Great. And Daniel prophesied, that, in the days of these numerous kings and many republics, shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, but shall stand for ever, having broken to pieces and displaced all other kingdoms and governments. This power was represented by a little stone cut out of the mountain without hands, by spirit agency, like the tablets of Moses; spiritual, not natural agency. It smote the image, as David did Goliath, and destroyed it. This dream is certain, and the interpretation sure. Thus the Jewish captives became great men, and rulers over all the provinces of Babylon, by means of Spiritualism, the mother of the sciences, and Daniel was constituted "chief of the governors over the wise men of Babylon." Is not this significant of the final triumph of the Christ Order, when the "knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea?"

Thus ends one of the cycles, by which the great external Babylon, of which Daniel was contemporary, melted away, and was so subdued that Government issued a decree recognizing and acknowledging the Hebrew God as superior to any of the gods of the nations, being Lord of their lords, and God of their gods. The king, Darius, wrote unto all peoples, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth, Peace be multiplied unto you. I make a decree, that, in every dominion of my kingdom, men tremble and fear before the God of Daniel; for he is the living God, steadfast forever: his kingdom shall not be destroyed; his dominion shall be even unto the end; for he delivered Daniel from the power of the lions.

Of all the Christ Prophets, none had found that spiritual soul-travel, and incarnated the Christ Spirit into their individual personal character, ascended to the heaven of heavens, penetrated the Holy of holies—the Christ sphere—as John the Revelator of it. He stood in the gift and power of Divine causation. Daniel, like Moses, was on the external providential wheel. His vision related to the history of kings—a succession of empires on the outward plane, the earth—until the final consummation; when all were subjugated by the little stone; and the kingdom and the dominion, under the whole heavens, were given to the people of the saints of the Most High. Daniel begins with the external, and moves towards the spiritual. John begins with the Christ Spirit, and moves outward. He gives the history of the little stone taken from the spiritual mountain without human hands, from the time when it went forth conquering and to conquer, till the kingdoms of this world became the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ.

Daniel was a Jew, holding civil office in the literal kingdom of Babylon, attaining and maintaining his position by natural-spiritual power like Moses, and applied to the outer, material elements of earth—its earth and water, its air and fire; and over the animal creation. John was first a Jew, like Daniel, then a Christian—not of this world, its kingdoms or offices. The visions of John were of the physical, moral, spiritual, and religious history of man as a whole, from the beginning to the end; as such, they included Daniel's prophecies, as the whole includes the parts. Their visions dovetail into one another like body and soul; they duplicate and sustain each other in their minutest details, and in the most wonderful manner.

The spiritual manifestations of Moses, although upon a grand scale, and affecting the destiny of thousands of people, infesting a whole nation with lice, and flies, and frogs; killing the fish, by turning the waters into blood; destroying man and beast by fire and hail; or enveloping the Egyptians in darkness that could be felt, were yet secondary to the manifestations through Noah, by which a whole world of humanity was at once destroyed.

The spiritual manifestations of the present day reach down to the material elements more as in the days of Daniel, or as in the days of Jesus, who operated so largely upon human bodies as combinations of the elements of earth.

While the spiritual manifestations which obtain among the Shakers, are first upon the spirit, affecting the conscience, then upon the soul, removing the causes of physical diseases in the mortal body, inculcating the law of "Go, and sin no more," by correcting all bad habits, and teaching to use all the elements of this present world as not abusing them.

Baptism of Consecration.

BY O. C. HAMPTON.

Sweet inspiration's gilded wings
Are hovering near the earth,
And in her tuneful voice there rings
The song of a new birth—
A birth to higher, holier life,
The burden of her song;
A birth from rudimental strife,
And every groveling wrong.

My spirit feels her quickening power
In every quivering nerve,
Forever, from this burning hour,
Humanity to serve;
To move in God's eternal peace,
In ministries of love;
To cause the tears of grief to cease
Below me, and above;

To make the bow of hope serene;
To span the mourner's sky;
To rid earth of the monster sin,
And every tear to dry.
My inner temple first to cleanse,
And live a sinless life,
Forgiving foes as well as friends,
With patience ever rife.

Thus peals sweet inspiration's hymn
Across the slumbering years,
As on our planet's glittering run,
Her angel form appears.
She calls to you, she calls to me,
To let our light so shine,
That men shall be compelled to see,
And own a power divine.

The records of the fading years
May leave no history bright,
Of all our labors, pains and tears,
Or arduous upward flight.
What matter, so we work in love.
The work God gives us all,
We walk serenely, far above
Fame's best or basest call.

What though our pilgrimage be lone,
And little rest we find,
Still they are angels of the throne,
Who love and bless mankind.
A preacher of reform I'll be,
And practice what I preach,
And purpose of my destiny
Sin shall not overreach.

So shall I walk heaven's heights sublime,
And bless my fellow man,
While I remain in rolling time,
And in my weakness, can.
To leave for aye the fogs of sense,
The rudimental plane,
And take my final journey hence,
Far holier heights to gain.
Need we in starry realms to peer,
To find heaven's blest abode?
We walk the heights of heaven here,
If loving, pure, and good.

Ye saints above, ye saints below,
Help me my vows to keep;
Henceforward in this path to go,
Rich gems for heaven to reap—
Rich harvests of the souls of men,
Ripe for the realms above;
Rich spoils to take from earth's domain,
By works of peace and love.

What is Religion?

BY SAMANTHA HOWIE.

It is an awakening of truth in the soul; a love for God; giving a just sense of one's duty, by opening the eyes of the soul to the great end and purpose of life—redemption. It does not consist of words, thoughts nor actions; but these are governed by the living principle of religion.

How admirable is that religious belief, which, while it seems to have in view, not alone the soul's felicity in another world, but effectually secures its happiness in this life!

Religion is being good; and this is being like God. The various names given to religion are subject to much odium; but all admire the fruits of religion in a pure life. Morality is one step towards pure religion. Spirituality is in its advance. All things of real beauty and worth have their origin in pure religion; and nothing will satisfy the soul's demands but practical religion.

Under the influence of true religion the soul is mild, humane, and only spiritually inclined, working untiringly for humanity. It teaches souls to serve God through the love of a pure life, and not from the fear of his displeasure. There are many creeds, but there is one only religion, and this will make of all humanity, one relationship in spirit, by bringing all into a life that is alone found in Christ—pure, virginal, pentecostal.

Who Wonders?

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican does not wonder that some former members and the Shakers parted company; for, from the utterances of the departed, it is of the opinion that they would not grace any moral company, but be a disgrace to any respectable community. "Why go they out from among us? Because they are not of us;" they want the world, the flesh, and the excitement of perverted sense. These we deny to all, holding union with us.

No honorable Shaker has ever failed to merit and receive the respect of those who differed with him in matters of faith; while a suspicion follows and distrust rests upon those who depart their principles, and practice the world. It is no honor to any sect, to have a seceding Shaker become one of their number, for they leave us for nothing purer, better. *

The Avesta—Fire-Worship—Baptism.

BY J. M. PEEBLES.

Man, made in the Divine image, is naturally a religious being. In all ages and under all skies, have been found symbols of man's faith and worship. The soul's better aspirations, ever tend heavenward.

The most graceful and dignified people that we saw while traveling in the East were the Persians. They do not, as Christians have represented, worship fire, but consider fire a symbol of the sacred fire—the infinite light of the universe.

Some of the religious books of the Parsees are exceedingly clear in statement, and spiritual in tendency. To thinkers, the "Avesta" especially is a most valuable work; enabling the student to compare its divine truths with those of the Vedas, the Koran, and the Jewish and Christian scriptures.

The Parsee religion is much older than Judaism, and has been considered by distinguished religionists, a purer faith. Their sacred books, aflame with inspiration, taught the immortality of the soul, the certainty of compensation, and the importance of purity of heart (rather than the sacrificing of animals for sin-offerings) centuries before these doctrines were prevalent among the Jews. At a time when the ancestors of the French and English nations were accustomed to sacrifice human victims to their sanguinary deities, the Parsees taught that heaven was attained only through repentance and purity of life. Though teaching the negative and relative eternity of evil, they also taught the final restoration of all souls, during the progressive period of the resurrection.

There have been different opinions as to the age of Zoroaster. The earliest and best authorities upon this subject are the Greek writers. It is a suggestive and remarkable circumstance that all the Greek authors who wrote upon the Magi and the Parsee religion previous to the Christian era, put Zoroaster back to a period 6,000 years B. C.

Xanthos, of Lydia, one of the first writers upon the subject, living about 450 B. C., was a younger cotemporary of Darius and Xerxes. He reckons, according to the statement of Diogenes of Laerte in the proœmium to his "Lives and Sayings of Eminent Philosophers," from Zoroaster to the time of Xerxes' expedition to Greece—about 480 B. C.—6,000 years. Therefore Zoroaster would have been living at a period about 6,500 B. C.

The philosopher Aristotle, and teacher of Alexander the Great, is very positive in his statement. He affirms, according to Pliny (Natural History, xxx, 2) that Zoroaster lived about 6,000 years before the death of Plato, 348 B. C., which would carry us to about 6,350 B. C. A similar calculation and statement was made by Eudoxus, distinguished for historic accuracy.

Hermippus, of Smyrna, one of the most ancient authorities among the Greeks upon the religion of the Magi, lived about 250 B. C., making the Zoroastrian books the study of his life. This Hermippus, according to Pliny, was informed by his teacher, Agonakes, a Magian priest, that Zoroaster lived about 5,000 years before the Trojan war—occurring 1,180 B. C. This would take Zoroaster back to 6,180 B. C.

The historian, Hermodorus, and other Grecian writers, confirm the above statements. The ancient Greeks all believed that Moses, living several thousand years later than Zoroaster, taught the Jews the magic he had learned in Egypt. It is quite evident that the Egyptians obtained their knowledge of psychology and magic from India and Persia.

That there was a Zoroaster living in the time of Hystaspes, Darius' father, is not disputed. As Jesus was a common name in Syria, so was Zarathustra, Zoroaster, in Persian countries. There were certainly three distinguished persons called Zoroaster, the last living nearly a thousand years before the Christian era.

Before us lies a volume rich in the sayings and dogmas of Zoroaster. Listen :

"Come from far and near and hearken to what I shall proclaim. * * * The wise have discovered that this universe is a duality. The maternal cause is double, having received from the Father matter and spirit. * * * Praise the creator Ahura-Mazda, the shining the very shining!"

"I will proclaim as the greatest of all things that one should be good and pure, praising only truth. Ahura-Mazda delights to hear those who speak for and further the good."

"All that have been living, and will be living subsist upon the divine bounty. The souls of the pure attain at once to immortality; but the wicked have to undergo age-lasting discipline. Such is the rule of the wise Ahura-Mazda."

"All Hail, to the divine Intelligence, which holds in itself the Word of excellence. All pure beings who were, are and have been, existed through it. The world is of male and female nature. Oh, let us put down our gifts of praise in the dwelling-place of the heavenly singers."

"The heavens are a point from the pen of God's Perfection, the world is a bud from the flower of His Beauty, the sun is a spark from the light of His Wisdom, and the sky is a bubble on the sea of His Power. He made mirrors of the atoms of the world, and threw the reflection of His own face on every atom."

The Mendai Ijahi of Persia, were by their countrymen, called Sabians, and considered descendants of Zabii, a pre-historic race. It is very evident that Jews and Greeks derived the principles of their ascetic philosophy from India, through Egypt and Persia. After the Jews had mingled with the ancient Chaldeans, and the Persian "fire-worshippers," we find traces of the effects of it in the ceremonies of Jewish service, and also in such phrases as these: The "camp of fire" in the appearing to Abraham—the "flame of fire" in the Lord's appearance to Moses—the descent "in fire" to give the law—the devouring of the Sons of Aaron "with fire from the Lord," because they offered in their censers, strange fire—the "pillar of fire" that went before the Israelites through the wilderness—"the fire" that the Prophet Elijah proposed to convert the Prophets of the god Baal; and, "the sacred fire of the Lord," that was ever "burning in Zion." In the apostolic period of Christianity—"our God is a consuming fire"—was a common term, symbolizing the destruction of earthly dross and the necessity of spiritual purification.

Fire and water were used typically by all the ancient religionists of the Orient. The East was long the land of sign and symbol. No historian will deny that the old Brahmins of India, baptized at certain seasons in the Ganges for the remission of sins, supposing the waters contained a sanctifying quality. Hence, people flocked to the banks of this divine stream, even from remote Tartary, to be therein baptized.

The Egyptians practiced immersion as a religious rite; they also bathed immediately after having touched a swine, considering themselves morally defiled by the contact.

For a somewhat different purpose, they were baptized in the Nile as an act of reverence towards its sacred waters. (Herodot. in Euterpe, 47.)

The learned Spencer, in his work on the "Rites and Institutions of the Hebrews," says: "Not only was baptism practiced among the Jews, prior to the time of John," but, he assures us, "that they borrowed it as they did circumcision from Pagan nations—for he adds—'among the Egyptians, Persians, Greeks and Romans, baptism by plunging the whole body in water, was customary to purify those who were to be initiated into the mysteries of the sacred orders.'" The Christian father, Justin Martyr, not well versed in ancient history, yet seeing, or rather knowing that "baptism was prevalent among the heathens," accounted for the fact, by supposing that the "demons invented it in imitation of the Christians." This church father, and others also of that period, claimed in their ignorance, that the Hebrew was the original language of mankind. Max Muller and other noted philologists have completely exploded this idea. The Sanskrit of India, was a language much older than the Hebrew, as well as more rich and elegant in structure.

No thorough scholar will dispute that baptism by immersion, was a very ancient rite—implying in different countries physical and moral cleansing—change of religious faith and practice—"a washing away of sin"—a "putting off of the old man with his deeds," etc. But for a pure, perfect, and sinless individual to have presented himself by the banks of the Ganges, Nile, or flowing Jordan as a candidate for baptism, would have been considered a joke bordering on blasphemy. Only filthy bodies require outward washings—and only imperfect, sinful men need inner baptismal purifications—the descent and abiding power of the Christ Spirit. This, in the Evangelists, is called the "baptism of the Holy Ghost," or rather Holy Spirit, for Spirit is a much better translation of the Greek pneuma, than "Ghost."

The Essenes, sometimes denominated Cœnobia Ascetics, true to the principle of "all things in common," practiced the rite of baptism, clothing themselves in white robes after coming "up out of the water." This ceremony, considered by them a symbol of the washing away of a sinful nature, was preceded by a full confession of sin. This cross-bearing people, ever a center of moral force in the East, regarded purity as the only passport to Paradise. And, in harmony with the same inspiration, Jesus taught that "the pure in heart shall see God."

It was the custom for Saviours in the Orient, to submit to the ceremony of baptism. India, Egypt, Persia, Phœnicia, Greece, Judea—all ancient nations had their Paradises lost and gained—their Millenniums—their Crosses—and their Saviours too, baptized with the Christ Spirit. The prophet Obadiah, with vision unsealed and soul all aflame with inspiration, said: "Saviours shall come up on Mount Zion." God is no "spectator of persons, nationalities or periods of time." There were many Saviours in the past. The good and the pure, are Saviours to-day. The influence of angel ministry is to elevate humanity. The tendency of the spiritually minded in all ages has been from grossness to refinement—from promiscuity to chastity—from chastity to holiness—from holiness to divinity. This is "growing in grace," traveling from Adam to Christ.

Universal Obedience.

BY R. W. PELHAM.

"He that keepeth the whole law, and yet offendeth in one point, is guilty of all." This doctrine at first view appears unjust, but close examination will show it to be strictly correct. God requires universal and perfect obedience—the whole heart. Now the intentional breach of one of his commandments, as fully proves the want of this is the neglect of all of them. God will, undoubtedly, be merciful to our frailties; but a deliberate and willful act of disobedience cannot pass for frailty; it sufficiently shows the state of the mind, and proves that the whole spirit of obedience is wanting. A servant being commanded by his master to do ten things all equally just and right, may do nine of them with great exactness; but if he obstinately refuses to do the tenth, he cannot be considered an obedient servant, but a rebel. Indeed, he is just as willful and disobedient as if he had refused to obey all the commandments of his master. His spirit is a spirit of rebellion and not of obedience. There is no good reason to believe that he has done one of the commandments of his master from a pure spirit of love, and simple desire to do his will, since such a motive, would lead him to perform the tenth requirement as faithfully as any or all the rest. Hence, we may be assured that some selfish end, and not purely the love of his master—not a true spirit of obedience—prompted him to do what he did; and that, therefore, he had no true obedience, because he was destitute of true love.

How do We do It?

The New York Tribune lately reported that some seceding Shaker was lecturing against the protective measures instituted among the Shakers, upon shaking hands, kissing, etc., at the same time dilating upon the beauty and necessity of celibacy.

It is refreshing to us to have The Tribune "give it as our opinion, that when our friends, the Shakers, yield the point of kissing, celibacy will naturally go next." When those, inimical to us, complain of our celibacy, we are led to remember how much we have suffered upon the charge of secret corruption, and since it is not a question, but a charge, how we live, we force the question, "How do we do it?" When any attempt Christian celibacy and succeed, without many simple abstinences and effective crosses, then we will admit being over scrupulous, and extravagant cross-bearers.

Past, Present and Future.

BY ANTOINETTE DOOLITTLE.

The longevity of some of the ancients, who attained to the great age of five, six and nine hundred years, seems a long period of time; especially, if we look upon the race of men, as more perfect then, than at the present time.

We speak of the blissful Eden state; of man's innocence when he came from the hands of the Creator. This is well, if rightly understood. The innocence of childhood is beautiful; but it cannot be trusted like the positive innocence of mature years, gained by trial, and battling against temptation in its multifarious forms.

There are persons with us to-day, who recollect distinctly when sailing vessels, or stage coaches were the swiftest modes of transit from continent to continent and over kingdoms and countries. Future generations will look upon those modes of traveling, somewhat as we look upon historic records of the long past. And since science has developed the power of steam, and the intelligence of man has systematized, tamed and made it subservient to his use, the desires of people to travel and visit foreign lands, have become so intensified, that we should need some hundreds of years to accomplish our designs if required to return to the modes of travel which our grand-sires possessed.

If we look upon the early history of our race, as in a childhood state, undeveloped, but possessing all the germs of perfect men and women, who, by progressive degrees, under proper guidance and instruction, would attain under the full stature of manhood, progressing in natural law pertaining to the rudimental sphere in which we live, and also learning more of the higher spiritual laws which relate to the soul's welfare that must guide and control it in the life beyond, then we can understand why the ancients needed so much longer time than the present generation to accumulate knowledge which, in a large degree, was bounded by their own personal experience; while we have the benefit of the accumulated experience of past ages added to our own.

The progressive degrees of development have been under the control of teachers adapted to the condition of the people, and their powers of receptivity. Hence, the word of the Lord at one time, was not the same as at another; not that God, or truth changed, but lessons were given, as the people were able to receive.

Wise parents in nature do not force a knowledge of the arts and sciences upon their children whose minds are weak and tender; but they give them such mental food as they can digest. Thus has it been with the Universal Father and Mother of all intelligences. How clearly we see this law in operation in the first epoch of bible history concerning man; whether that history be correct, or not, the rule and deductions to be drawn therefrom, are equally true.

Their first necessity was to learn to provide sustenance for the physical part; how to cultivate the soil, and gain an honest living; and in obedience to natural law and physical truth they received great blessings. The natural precedes the spiritual—that is the law. When they were sufficiently developed, lessons were given by degrees, relating to the immortality of the soul. Their condition was not the effect of violated law, but they were immature. It would have been an impossibility for them to have received direct communication from Deity, as much so as for an infant to understand the science of astronomy. Tutelary deities were appointed to preside over them, who were not of the highest order of spirits, yet, so far progressed, that they were capable of imparting all the knowledge and truth necessary for the time being.

The Angels who first began to minister to the people, were so near to earth, that it was difficult to decide whether they were veritable men or disembodied spirits. But, as the people grew and waxed strong, the ministrations to them were more spiritual and interior; and occasionally a ray of light from the inner spheres, which we call the Christ-heavens, where spirits dwell who are clothed with power to baptize souls with resurrection life, shone upon them. Only Prophets of the highest order were capable of communing with spirits from the inner heavens; but they were sought unto by Kings and Princes. The King of Israel at one time, called four hundred Prophets together, that he might enquire of the Lord through them. The god of the Jews was a warring god; and he purposely put a lie in the mouths of those Prophets to deceive the blood-thirsty King; and only one was found who prophesied truly, for which he was hated and consigned to prison. The more truth the Prophets possessed, the higher their Mediumship, the more they were feared, hated and persecuted. Thus has it ever been. Truth, and its defenders, have had to battle against error, as the prison, rack, and flame would attest.

At length, under the law of progress, Prophets of the higher Order, were multiplied in the land. The Christ Spirit,—“the Rock,” which followed them in the wilderness, visited them and touched their hearts with the fire of inspiration and stirred the deep feelings of their souls; and in a vision they saw the beauties of a coming day, and prophesied of a coming Messiah, who would be anointed King of Saints; and his throne be established in their midst, and he would dwell and walk with them.

Thus, from age to age, the generations of men were prepared for higher degrees of spiritual truth; and in due time, Jesus the Nazarene, according to prophecy, was anointed from the Christ-heavens; and through the Medium of the Sonship, the Everlasting Father was revealed. And as Jesus became a Son of God, to as many as received him in his Father's name, he also baptized them with the same spirit and they became sons of God; all brethren of one spiritual family. He gave to his disciples divine gifts, and empowered them to transmit the same to others. To Peter, he gave the keys of the Kingdom (the gift of divine revelation); that was a new epoch in the history of our race, when the Bridegroom came forth from his secret chamber.

As it took centuries to fill the former epoch and prepare the way for the advent of the male Messiah, so also centuries passed before a way was opened for the Bride, the female Messiah to come forth from her closet where she had been concealed from mortal view.

In the first Christian era, a church was founded upon a true basis, i. e., a Virgin Life, community of Goods, and Non-resistance. But there was so little love to just principles, and the love of earthly idols so strong, that the people “gave their power unto the beast,” and Anti-Christ dethroned the true Christ, and himself sat in the temple of God for ages persecuting the saints. Civil and ecclesiastic powers combined to make war with the followers of the lowly Jesus, and a bloody reign ensued.

While we bestow honor and praise upon those who embraced the Christian faith, for their firm adherence thereto, and willingness to endure torture, imprisonment and death, rather than violate their highest convictions of right, may we not give some mitigating considerations to their persecutors! They were defending the religion of their fathers, which justified war, and taught the law of retaliation, “an eye for an eye.” The traditions which had been handed down to them were as sacred to them as the Christian religion was to its new converts. Viewed from our standpoint, in the light of the nineteenth century, they are not only reprehensible, but nearly allied to demons, deserving the tortures of the Calvinistic hells! But there is a tribunal higher than man, where all things will be weighed and duly balanced.

Would not the same intolerant spirit, even in this age of progress, again lift its head and stretch forth its persecuting hand, if there was not a controlling and balancing power? Let the religious Pharisees—the learned Rabbins of our time, who so devoutly desire to see the name of God and Christ placed in the National Constitution, succeed in the attempt, and they would show us how the Sabbath breaker should be punished! It would require the strength of many Washingtons, Paines and Jeffersons combined, to stay the hand of persecution, and set things right. Would it not be well to have an amendment to that proposition, and let woman's name be inserted instead? Let her voice be heard, and her influence felt in the councils of the nation; and let God and Christ be enthroned in the human heart, quickening the conscience and guiding it in all the practical duties of life.

When woman finds her proper place, she will help to frame the laws to which she is amenable and by which she is bound, and plead the cause of the down-trodden of her own sex. She will help to inaugurate her own rulers, and cease to be the slave of man's passions. Then, may we not hope when the law of chastity is broken, guilt and shame will rest where it justly belongs? Now man assumes the right to allure woman into vicious paths, there to leave her despoiled, helpless and hopeless, while he walks defiantly away to his companions, who receive him into their fashionable circles without a rebuke! The woman is an outcast from respectable society, left to drag out a miserable existence, while he is honored! Shall this state of things always continue? Nay! as God is just, an end will come. The powers of the heavens are moving, and justice will arise and shake terribly the earth in this respect! A light is dawning upon our earth which gives promise of a day of freedom for woman. The strong influence of the Dove Messenger sent from the bosom of the Eternal Mother in Deity, who a century ago called upon a few prepared souls to enter into the secret tabernacle of the Most High, and hide in that Pavilion which has been guarded by the Cherubims, called the most Holy Place, because it is the house of the virgin character, is felt far and near to-day. That spirit has been working like leaven to open a way for woman to escape from her physical, moral and spiritual servitude. And at the present time a voice is heard: "Woman shall be free as man is free! Let him or her who violates the law of chastity, bear their own iniquity."

Faith.

BY F. W. EVANS.

"Believe in the Lord your God individually; so shall ye be established in your organization."

Believe his Prophets, in and as an organization; so shall ye prosper and grow, "increasing with the increase of God,"—of Truth Divine,—in your collective capacity, as a living body of Christ, ministered unto by Christ Spirits, those of the Resurrection Order, who never touched the generative life in human beings in the past, except to prophesy of its future death; and who never touch it in the present, except to kill it, and to elevate the powers and faculties involved therein to higher uses, on a spiritual plane—the Resurrection Order.

After Jesus passed beyond John, who, as a Jewish priest, had been his Elder under the Jewish Law, and was baptized with the Christ elements, he "trode the wine-press alone," like Adam or Noah, or Abraham, or Moses had done in his day and Dispensation; and as all godly Reformers have ever done in the degrees of the Dispensation in which they stood and labored.

Principles are eternal, and Prophecy is of no private interpretation, but is of universal application to humanity.

Thenceforth Jesus had no Elder on the earth, unless he came short of the glory of God in any one of the planes of progress in the natural order; then he would have been amenable to the Elders of that plane or order.

As "the Resurrection," he was ministered unto by the Angels of the Order of God that is eternal in the heaven of heavens.

The Shaker in State Prisons.

Friend David Sargent has been visiting the Shirley Shakers, and writes us his impressions. He is a man of keen sensibility, deep convictions of the right, and appreciates the life-labors of the Shakers to be "the best illustration of Christianity on the face of the earth." Friend Sargent superintends Massachusetts'

State prison at Charlestown, and it must have been a genuine relief to his care-worn soul and overtaxed body, to visit a people who are not only physically and spiritually free, but are daily crucifying that which would make them otherwise.

May the SHAKERS, that monthly go to State prisons, work out a reformatory influence with their inmates; and we would not object, nor be surprised, if many of these preceded in the heavenly race the multitudes of bigoted pharisees.

The Christian's Sacrifice.

BY JOHN HODSON,—THE AQUILLA.

The gospel light began to dawn
Upon Columbia's happy land,
And many gladly hailed the morn,
While more aloof did boldly stand.
Aquila and Priscilla's cot
Stood near the ocean's surges wild;
Peace and contentment was their lot,
They had but one, one only child.

The gospel trumpet reached their ears,
And wakened up a sense of sin,
Producing doubts, producing fears,
They found all was not right within.
They found they were from God estranged—
That they'd been traveling into loss;
From sin's broad path they now must change,
To follow Christ, and bear his cross.

The testimony, clear and plain,
Which unto them was ushered in,
Was, Christ has now appeared again,
To save his people from all sin.
The sanctuary to make clean,
Immersed in Jordan's rolling main,
Made fit to drink salvation's streams
For sin, no more to thirst again.

Confess, repent, the dross remove,
Before the soul can entrance find
To Zion's ark of peace and love,
Or sweet contentment clothe the mind.
All sin the soul must now forsake;
All carnal ties must now break down;
This sacrifice it now must make,
Or fail to win salvation's crown.

From sin, from sorrow now released,
Walking in truth's straight narrow way,
Aquila and Priscilla's peace,
No pen nor tongue can now portray.
By love's pure river, trees of life
Stand spreading free, and fair to view;
Their leaves heal envy, hatred, strife,
Their lovely fruits the strength renew.

But, walking in this narrow way,
A goal is reached; they must be tried,
The voice of God they must obey,
And offer up their only child.
At this the mother shed a tear,
The father's heart athwart recoiled;
"Can God of love be so severe,
To part from us our only child?"

"O mother, dry those fruitless tears,
Father, stand firm," the daughter cries,
"The God of mercy 's not severe,
This only breaks the carnal ties.
The gospel day no more requires
The blood of bulls, nor goats, nor men,
But selfish animal desires
Upon the cross must now be slain.

"Like Jephtha's daughter, I will not Lament for my virginity;
But be contented with my lot,
And live a life of purity.
In heavenly joys I will increase,
All vile affections prompt repel;
I'll live in love, and joy, and peace,
So parents dear, farewell, farewell."

Now when this parting scene was o'er
The parents found all worked for good;
Their sun grew brighter than before,
On higher, holier ground they stood;
No selfish passions filled their breasts,
But universal love did reign.
They felt for all who were oppressed
With sin and sorrow, grief and pain.

With faith in Christ, their lead, before,
They press along their path with joy;
They to the world look back no more,
But prayer and praise their thoughts employ.
They're verging to the heavenly land,
Ready the summons to obey;
Upon its borders joyous stand,
While angels beckon them away.

Elder F. W. Evans frequently has an attack of admiration for The Golden Age. In a recent letter to this office, he tried to excite our jealousy, we suppose, by enclosing the following paragraphs, but he failed:

THE GOLDEN AGE

Is pure, free from love stories, which corrupt the young. Its columns are open to all representative writers, who can condense their thoughts. It concentrates the living ideas or issues of the Age, being the organ of Progress for the day or time. Is independent, possesses strong convictions; impartial in criticism; not fearing even its best friends, but "hears before it strikes."

If all who read THE SHAKER subscribe for The Golden Age, they will, thereby, assist in actualizing it.

What Shall I do to be a Shaker?

At present, this is not a very popular question, but is nearly as much so as its synonym—"What shall I do to be saved?" In answering either, we answer both; for if we are saved from doing wrong, we are in the enjoyment of Shakerism—if we are genuine Shakers, then are we saved. Shakerism purposes an end of sinful works: nor this only, for much that is good on the earthly plane, it rejects as useless to Angelic life. Not only does it save individuals from the commission of sin, but resurrects them to an exceeding godliness, than is possible while living on the earthly animal plane. It asks none to forsake any earthly good, until it presents something better of a heavenly nature, and thus it teaches souls to rise from earth to heaven. We claim that it is radical Christianity. That it takes hold of our lives, moulds them anew, just as it reformed the Jewish nature of Jesus into a model for all Christians. The most radical Shakerism is simple, unadorned Christianity. The first is a monstrous system to worldly appreciation; but so is the last in its genuineness. What is popularly called Christianity does not resemble Shakerism at all; but what is called Shakerism, is a fac simile of thorough Christianity. Radical means root; and that which is Christian at its root, will inevitably produce Shakerism in its every branch. Let any Church remodel its creed in accordance with the Christ life—the pattern—and who will deny that its believing congregation would become a genuine Shaker Society? And wherein would this congregation materially differ from the hosts of heaven with whom it hopes soon to consolidate? Is the prayer—"Thy will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven," impossible of realization? We know it is not. Let any individual attempt to live as nearly angel-like as he conceives an Angel's life to be, would he not resemble a Shaker in his daily practice? Let him conscientiously investigate Angelhood; compare or contrast it with his desires, inclinations, passions; and what is the result? Do the Angels eat, drink and are clothed? Certainly. But they are very unlike this animal—murdering, bibulous, and fashion-loving race. Contrast what we know of the Angel diet with the same of the gluttonous worldling, or even of the commonplace Christian! What an opportunity for improvement. Do the Angels use tobacco, imbibe the ardent, and dress a la Eugenie? Some may, but they are not Christians; nor will good imitations of, present such features. Let us pursue. Arriving at mature years, those “of the world” marry; and who in the world will object to this! Our question is, how will this compare with heavenly practice? How will the auditors of Ward Beecher and of most Revs. compare with the characters, as seen by the Revelator standing “with the Lamb on Mount Zion?” How would a Shaker practice compare? How will the paraphernalia and fashionable gew-gaws of Chapin’s, Cuyler’s, St. Paul’s or Trinity’s congregations compare with the uniform of “those who have come up out of great tribulation? Let us be reasonable. Some believe, and teach sin to be a necessity. Is there sin in heaven? In heaven or earth will there be any iniquity? If heaven is ever realized here, which must change, the Angel life or the worldly life? Is not their difference sin? Christianity was the introduction of “thy will be done on earth;” and Jesus, in obedience to Christ principles was the pattern of the new life. Whoso lives as he did, will bear the cross; will not sin, will not pervert, corrupt, nor be aught but heavenly. The same causes that made Jesus what he became, will regenerate us into the same results. These causes or principles will be like waves of progressive life, each advancing the individual adopting it, into an increased, heavenly altitude, or like the reappearing of the Christ Spirit in various cycles, making demands of us of further renunciation of the worldly and a deeper adoption of, and consecration to the heavenly.

Do you ask: “What you must do to be a Shaker?” In the usual, simple manner, I will answer: 1. Seek for a Christian conviction of, and sorrow for sin. Confess every wrong action, and renounce every evil consideration. Repent—solemnly promise to do so no more, and faithfully fulfill the obligation. Settle all indebtedness; if you have at any time wronged an individual, seek to repair the injury and accomplish reconciliation. 2. You are now a candidate for the acceptance of the Christ Spirit, and adoption of the Christ Life. Be as a Virgin henceforth; abstain from fleshly lusts and from lascivious thoughts. Had you a wife? Now use her as a sister. Is she unwilling? The Spirit never concedes to the flesh—stand firm. Are you persecuted? retaliate not, bear and forbear. Have you property? Use this for the care of your unbelieving family. If your family is one in faith with you, consecrate your earthly goods where you and they have consecrated your physical lives, and from which cause you are enjoying a foretaste of an eternal pentecost. Yours is now an hundred fold, and in the life that now is, you are experiencing the entrance upon a new and eternal existence. Yours is an exceeding peace. “The world” will seem and really be beneath you; your companions of yore will not interest you, and the life of the “old creation,” you will verily hate. You are becoming a “new creature.” The life of the flesh renounced; a virgin character pronounced and adopted. All vicious habits rejected; cleanly, temperate and healthful substitutes accepted—you are a Shaker in the first degree of Angelhood—be faithful, be patient, the next cycle will open upon you. Here is where all true Shakers should aim to arrive in this life—and many do. Others arrive where, in accordance with their renunciation of the worldly, and agreeable to their consecration to the cross of the Spirit—if these are much, so is their gain; if not much, they are trifling with their gospel call, and tampering with inferior desires—and the consequences too often are, the backslider’s career! Have we advised anything that Jesus did not, or would not, were he here? Is there any unchristian performance recommended or the neglect of any Christian duty advised? Have we proposed the abandonment of any relation that can continue in the heavens, or of any practice but “perishes with the using?” For wars of nations and of households, do we not give in exchange, peace? For the generative life of the world do we not offer an Angelic resurrection? In the extinction of the sexual works of the flesh, do we not present the fraternal relations of the sexes as found in Christ? What becomes of the selfishness that was concentrated in self or found recognition under the title of MINE? It is diversified over a very large household and is mine no longer, but ours. What takes its place? An ambition to be an unreserved worker for the good of souls; for their salvation, even as we have been and are saved from the commission of sin. No more reliance upon the physical death of Jesus, but upon the beautiful practice of his life—a life to God, and a death unto the world of sin. This is Shakerism. This is Christianity. This is the way we become Shakers, experience salvation, and enjoy a life eternal. Thus we are seeking and learning more truth; and thus we measurably enjoy here, the Angel life—Christ’s life. “And let him that heareth say, Come! and partake of the bread and waters of life freely,” in our heavenly Father’s and Mother’s home. *

Truth, Faith and Reason.—No. 3.

BY R. W. PELHAM.

It is a fixed and immutable law of the generative order, to multiply and divide—to keep up a continued series of successive separations and separate interests.

The fixed and immutable law of the Christ Order, is aggregation, “gathering together, uniting in one all in heaven and earth in Christ.” (Eph. i, 10.)

“To be carnally minded is death, to be spiritually minded is life.” In this aphorism, Paul again sets forth the eternal antagonism of the flesh and spirit; it is but the utterance of a fixed, immutable and eternal truth; a truth which every one who has been made alive in Christ, knows just as well as Paul.

The antagonism between the flesh and spirit does not take place in the air, but in the human soul, and every spiritually minded man knows that this conflict is irreconcilable—knows that his carnal, lustful, generative nature, is not subject to the laws of God in Christ, or in the regenerative order, neither, indeed, can be—knows he must keep up an unceasing warfare against it, at the peril of his spiritual life, until it is subdued.

“If ye be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ dwells.” Those who are subjects to this resurrection—those who have risen with Christ and lived in his sphere which is “above” the flesh, “neither marry nor are given in marriage.” They are “children of the resurrection” order, exalted with Christ above the generative work.

Be cautious of forming or adopting systems.

When men become wedded to a system, either of their own or another’s, their minds are liable to be so biased, that they will desire to bend everything into conformity to it; and in their eagerness to support the system, they lose sight of truth.

Truth is a unit. No one truth can be opposed to another truth. And one truth harmonizes with every other truth, therefore, any system or part of a system opposed to one single truth, is opposed to all truth, and utterly foundationless and false.

As light is pleasant to the eye, so is truth to the understanding.

The Catholic Church requires her members to believe in Transubstantiation, contrary to the evidence of their senses, and to renounce opinions as heretical without any proof of their error; but all such requirements are as unwise as they are tyrannical and unjust, because it is impossible to comply with them.

If a man is required to sacrifice his rational faculty in order to salvation, what will he have left worth saving? He will be no better than a maniac or ourang-outang.

He that requires a man to believe mere assertion against the clear convictions of his own understanding, demands the surrender of his rationality, and would rob him of the chief attribute of man.

Nothing fears investigation but mistrustful bigotry or determined ignorance.

He who feels confident of the rectitude of his opinions and actions, fears not investigation.

The fear of investigation, or of being investigated, are certain marks of bigotry or dishonesty.

Faith founded in ignorance, is always exposed to the assaults of light and truth, and therefore constantly in danger.

The better one understands the why and the wherefore of a theory, the less liable he is to have his faith shaken.

He who through bigotry and ignorance builds on falsehood, is under continual necessity of guarding against the approaches of light and truth.

The most effectual way to shake off unbelief is to demonstrate truth to the understanding.

He who goes about to divest himself of unbelief by violently shaking his body, will be about as successful, as he who should try to satiate his hunger by running a foot race.

He can swallow incredible things whose interest prompts the resolve not to be choked by any thing.

He that is most positive in his opinions may nevertheless be positively mistaken.

I am tired of systems and system mongers; I desire to know nothing—to feel nothing but gospel simplicity—to believe nothing but pure truth.

He that loves truth for its own sake, likes it best in its pure unadorned simplicity. Great names, high sanctions, or even mighty miracles, if they do not indeed detract from its merits, can add nothing to its value.

Physical Death versus Future Life.

The World's Crisis very sharply and unchristianly criticises Otis Sawyer's "Shaker Cemeteries" in JUNE SHAKER; also Bro. Peebles' remarks in same number. It very plainly asserts that Spiritualism and Shakerism are not of God, but of him who fathers all the iniquities of the world since first he whispered in Eve's ear what she should never have known. The Crisis is stirred to this because we believe and know of a future existence—immortality. It knows only of the grave and its dead; the resurrection has not occurred to its Editor and numerous readers. But as a dead tree compares with a living and fruitful one—as a dead man and a dead God contrast with men of life and a God eternal—so do the teachings and philosophy of the physical resurrection of dead, and twice dead bodies compete with the religion of life which comforts us that our loved ones are not, and never were dead; but that "their spirits are living, in beauty they are blooming" on the eternal shore. Were there any truthful philosophy in "an irresistible force striking an immovable object," then might the "irresistibility" of The Crisis, affect the "immovableness" of THE SHAKER, upon the truth of immortality. A few days will decide this point to any who now live and have doubts. But it is a curious fact that Second Advents do die; for in all the spirit peregrinations we ever heard of, not one of them has been found in the spirit world!

We will not say The Crisis is of the devil; but we do infer it is blinded by the flesh, is leading souls in the dark, and needs the enlightenment and resurrection of the Spirit which we have been favored with. *

Disappointed.

Elder J. B. Vance, in an address at Troy, stated that many of the requirements of Shaker Communism appeared like the lions in the way of Bunyan's Pilgrim; and which exist more in the imagination than in anything else, being dissolved by attack, into thin air. Just so; much that we dreaded, becomes our delight to engage in.

Some fear the Confessional—yet the relief obtained therefrom compensates the soul so much, that it is never relinquished by the faithful nor its absence desired. Some dread the Dance: One individual said, "he would like to unite, but he could not agree to dance, particularly on the Sabbath."

This being his only objection, he was excused, with the proviso that we should not be compelled to keep out from the dance. He having no fears of this, "set out" to be a Shaker. But a short time elapsed, before he broke into the circle, and was the most zealous dancer in the room! It is difficult for us to get individuals to wear their own apparel; whereas ours presented an appearance too plain, before they united. Just so are individuals disappointed in their fears of what they must need do to become members of Shaker Societies. We say, if you will live the life, we care little what your theology is, what your fears are, desires have been, or hopes may be. The spirit of oneness will prevail, where all are united in the purpose to maintain a pure, virginal relation, as is found only in Christ. Only let an individual confess all their sins on the start in the race, and keep a conscience undefiled, and we predict all their fears will be turned into pleasurable disappointments. *

The Paradox of Jesus.

Calvin Green, of Mt. Lebanon, once said that "Jesus was the Sarcastus of his day!" Reference in this was had to "Go tell that fox, etc." But where can a greater, apparent inconsistency be found, than "He that saves his life shall lose it; but he that loses his life shall find it? The pronoun it, apparently refers to the same life; and only as the two lives of humanity are understood—the natural or earthly life, and the spiritual or Christ life—this paradox is not and cannot be comprehended. Would you gain the Christ life, you must lose the carnal, Adamie, generative practice that is opposed to Christ. Would you save this, then be not disappointed if you find that you have not found Christ. Though paradoxical, this is one of the most beautiful sayings of Jesus, and is worthy of a whole life's study. Probably no passage in scripture is generally less understood, and at the same time of greater value when comprehended. As in this saying so much is enclosed, so let our lives "be hid in Christ." *

THERE is a beautiful piece of music attached to "Spirit Prophecy." Believers desirous of obtaining the same, may address our young and noble Prophet Elder, THOMAS SMITH, Canaan Corners, N.Y. *

"SHAKER COMMUNISM" has not yet arrived from England. When it does we will notify. All orders for the same, may be addressed to this Office, or to Elder F. W. EVANS. See list of Publications. *

WE are in receipt of several letters from individuals who ask, among other questions, concerning our position on the wearing or non-wearing of the beard. We answer, that for uniformity, we shave smoothly twice or thrice a week. This is our present custom. We attach no religious importance to it, other than union of action. That we are physiologically wrong, many of us have no doubt; and that we shall eventually change present habit, we doubt still less; but until there can be a unanimous voice in the change, we shall abide present usage. It is a nonessential to the salvation of the soul from present sins, only as it affects the body seriously by shaving; and when individuals remove greater difficulties in their path to righteousness, the shaving or not shaving the beard will assume less proportions. Let us be alive to whatever is progress in the right direction only. *

Spirit Prophecy.

BY THOMAS SMITH.

Rivers of waters shall open in Zion;
And thousands shall seek to be cleansed therein—
"Save us, oh, save us!" I hear them crying,
"From the curses of Babylon, from darkness and sin!"
Away with your doubting, ye feeble and fainting!
Away with your fears for the Zion of God!
The Lord in his infinite wisdom is guiding
The feet of the wanderer to Zion's blest fold.

A RELIGIOUS journal tells its readers, spitefully, that it costs the heathen Chinese $400,000,000 annually to run their religion, "whatever it is."

That, the Chinaman might reply, is the strange part of this religious interest. The Christians, before settling among themselves what Christianity is, hasten over to convert China whatever it is; whereas, if they knew Christianity and Bhuddism as well as the Chinese know Bhuddism, they might perhaps admire the wisdom (politically at least) which liberally spends so much money on a system of religion that can keep three or four hundred millions of people whole centuries as a unit, without rebellion or schism, giving out of itself an educational system which faithfully reaches one hundred per centum of the population, and to which, to our sorrow be it said, the best Christian school system is but a feeble and as yet rather ineffective copy. It ought to be a good religion, which is worth $400,000,000 a year to keep up, and, no doubt, the Chinese are proud that no where but in China can a religion be found which is valued even half that high.—American Land and Law Advisor.

Conservatism and Progression.

How shall they be Reconciled?

BY ELIJAH MYRICK.

The desire and effort for preserving what is established, as first principles of rudimentary truth, are not necessarily antagonistic to Progress. Radicalism is the forced, unwilling antipode of near-sighted Conservatism. Conserve and preserve are synonymous. Hence, what is good, sound, and true of the past, should conserve the present and future, interblending like the colors of the rainbow.

The conflict between finality and young germs of truth, in the individual mind, is carried into sects and communities. The former depending upon its defensibility, forces the latter into a war of triumph, as portrayed by Bunyan.

All real progress is sanctified by adhering to first principles. The prophets and philosophers of each dispensation could only give utterance to the truths of their day. "The old heavens and earth" will continue to give place to the new, in each succeeding cycle; and, when reason and wisdom shall take the supremacy of fear and superstition, the change will not necessarily be attended with "a great noise." Isaiah, 45: 22. "They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat; for, as the days of a tree, are the days of my people; and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands."

This beautiful, significant figure, symbolizes growth; and the existing harmony between conserving and expanding, rightly recognized, is mutually dependent; and an issue is detrimental to both. Should the extending bud refuse to respond to the inward pressure for a new growth of life, and say to the sun of revelation, "Touch me not"; this is the final growth; obedient to God's law, I shed my foliage, and his cold winter closed me up forever," the internal pressure, induced by the external warmth, would produce an argument in favor of eternal progress; a fitting rebuke to the adherents of the dead past.

All real good belongs to the present; and the present should willingly yield to the future; not lay dormant, to be exhumed hundreds of years hence. Let each dispensation glory in, and be glorified by, the other.

Conservatives, as leaders of old organizations, block the wheels of progress, and falsify the declaration and prophecy of future increase.

Resistance to improvement contradicts the noblest instinct of the soul, and begets its opposite—fanaticism of reform—caused by the obstructions which perverted conservatism has thrown across the stream of progress; and revolution is the sudden sweeping away of barriers which should have been reasonably and seasonably removed.

On Progression's banner is inscribed, "Let there be light;" and may the time soon come, when all human governments shall form a co-partnership with the divine, in carrying this baptism and benediction into fulfillment. The beautiful fragments of the Roman aqueducts made level across vallies, and through hills, for the want of the knowledge which every intelligent child now possesses, are often cited to test the power of their builders; but, they are only so many monuments of their weakness, instead of strength. Job, 38: 35, "Canst thou send the lightnings, that they may go and say unto thee, 'Here we are?'" If that question were put to modern science, it would answer in the affirmative.

When thought cannot find vent, the mind ceases to think; it will not continue to produce its births of power and beauty, to see them fall dead-born into the world. Even the rapt spirit of Isaiah would droop its wings, but for the effulgence of the vision they project, reflecting pictured glories on the solid earth.

What deep floods of the direful miseries of superstition and barbarity have, in consequence of stifled thought, been poured upon the world! Hence, a disastrous alienation has ensued between the disciples of science and the teachers of religion. Between science and true religion there can be no conflict.

With an earth, sky, and heavens full of truths all around and before us, upon the extreme margin of which we are but just entering, how can such a world produce a dogmatizer, or a bigot? Bigotry shuts itself up in narrow limits, and would bind the thoughts, and manacle the limbs too, had it the power. Forming a co-partnership ages ago, with its natural allies (ignorance and superstition), it strove to hinder the discovery of hitherto unknown parts of this globe, and the navigation of the same, and denied the true astronomical knowledge of the terrestrial, as it now does of the celestial heavens.

But let us think, betimes; knowledge is but an instrument, free alike to the profligate and the just; therefore wisdom must be commissioned its guardian. The unpardonable error of education has been, that it did not begin with simple truths and elementary ideas, and rise by gradation to combined results. It began with teaching systems, rules, schemes and complex doctrines, which years of analysis would scarcely serve to unfold; all is administered in a mass. In this way, errors and truths are passed over to our successors, done up in the same bundle, and they pass them to others, and so onward, to be perpetual sources of error, alienation and discord. A new era is opening upon the world! the history of the future is like a widening stream, and is about to pass through regions such as have never been traversed before; we must prepare ourselves to pass with safety through this new ordeal:

"Put hand to the plow of endeavor,
Place feet in the truth-furrowed track;
Set face to the future, and never
One wavering moment look back.
For none, who confidently center
All hopes on the by-gones, and ban
The present, are fitted to enter
The on-going progress of man."

Just in proportion as man becomes Christ-like, he passes out of the region of finality—system building—into the region of perpetual activities for good; his is the religion of philosophy, science, love, which expands the mind, reaches out to every capacity; says: "Suffer little children to come unto me;" and as "I am lifted up (progressed) so will I draw all men unto me." Could Jesus stand where we now stand, and view his record o'er,
Would he still cling to that star light,—and that alone restore?
And say 'tis done, 'tis final, all that man can ever be,

That through one twain the race did fall, by one alone they're free?
He was the promised Saviour; first saved himself from loss;
Then said, "If ye would Saviours be, come bear your daily cross."
His life was one great prophecy, which told of future good;
Declared, the state of Infancy betokened angel-hood.

All truth undiscovered, or unrevealed, partakes of the nature of the concrete; it is like gold in quartz; a part of the mass;
and as it forever sparkles, it is viewed by some as a mere curiosity; by others as an object of worship, not knowing its value and use, till some adventurous hand liberates it from the crude mass. Then, despite the bigots who claim this to be the only known specimen, other discoveries are made,
and the supply is found to be inexhaustible.
Then every known appliance is brought into requisition, and new ones invented to blast and grind, wash and melt, and coin, till the whole nation is enriched thereby.
And the poor devotee sees his past object of adoration appropriated to the living present. So with first principles; they discover truth, pure truth, to be wrought out under the hammer of reason, and smelted in the refiner's fire, till in their conscious purity they can look smilingly in the face of every essayer.

I freely endorse Elder Frederick's article in the July SHAKER, on "FINALITY."
I think it meets the demands of the age.
The diversity of opinions and beliefs respecting a certain book has been the means of disintegrating society, creating confusion. The world would be a thousand times better off to-day, were it to drop all the old systems of theology, and adopt the simple, childlike religion of the human soul.
All the blessings of the past would be combined with the present, and make the religion of to-day grander than that of any preceding age.

Rejecting still the corner stone, which devotees
have worshipped 'round,
Forgetting greater works are done by those who rear the building,
They falsify that holy truth, that progress means perpetual youth;
And all the living must, forsooth, be to the future yielding.

The too common practice of looking exclusively to the past, is unworthy of this enlightened age. A hitching post is good when ahead; when passed, it is of no further use. In no age of the world's history was discrimination between truth and error so acute as now. Reason assumes supremacy, and demands fearless investigation. Is not the subjugation of, and ruling over woman, traceable to sacred tradition, and legend? And is not the world depraved by such antiquated belief?

Brigham Young is a fac-simile of the wisest man of Bible fame; and children are still taught to do homage to his exalted wisdom. If either of them now lived in Massachusetts, they would be escorted to a temple of justice.

Physical Resurrection.

BY CECILIA DE VERE.

Is this temple—painful prison—
With its throbbing bolts and bars,
All the dwelling of the spirit,
When redeemed from earth-made scars?
Shall the body be triumphant?
Shall this accident of sin
Make or shape the life eternal,
Clog, or give us power to win?
Shall the humpback, and the cripple,
And the dwarf, diseased and lame,
Take their bodies, somewhat bettered,
But essentially the same?
Shall the soul that hid its evil
In a beauteous form of clay,
Still unchanged, and undiscovered,
Dwell in heaven's unclouded day?
Shall the face that screened, and shaded Feelings tender, deep and true,
Mask the soul that toiled and suffered
For a life and spirit new?
All things in the Lord are perfect;
Accidents are not of Him;
They belong to earth's confusion,
To our own perceptions, dim.
If we seek the heavenly portion
Of the meek in heart, and pure,
God will mark our earnest travel,
Bless, and make our treasure sure
Then the soul shall dwell in victory,
Far above the body's fate,
And be seen undimmed, unshadowed,
In its true and perfect state.
If we feel the resurrection
Of the spirit day by day—
Feel the power of God, that bears us
From earth's elements away—
Shall our thoughts to graveyards center,
When our loved ones are set free?
Shall we give our loathsome body
All our wealth of sympathy?
We are called to know the spirit,
And let dust to dust be given;
While our hearts, with love unflinching,
Find their kindred hearts in heaven.
O how pure, and how exalted,
Is the faith by which we're taught!
Through the door of Revelation,
We can "see what God hath wrought."
From the earth he made the mortal;
But he never marked the place:
Why should we of death's dark portal
Seek or leave the slightest trace?
Lay my frame in earth's cold bosom,
When my spirit takes its flight
To that land, where fruit and blossom
Never suffer frost nor blight;
Not on stone, or sculptured marble,
Be my memory ever traced;
But from hearts that hold and love me,
May it never be erased.

Second Revelation of the Gospel, vice Christ's Second Appearing.

BY R. W. PELHAM.

When the writer first visited the Shakers, in 1817, he soon became a sincere and deeply interested inquirer into their faith and theology; and the most puzzling thing he met with, was the statement that Christ, or Jesus Christ, had made His second appearing in a WOMAN!
Whatever recondite sense they may have attached to the word Christ, I understood it to mean the man called Jesus, or Jesus the Christ, who lived in Judea 1800 years ago, and of whose history we have a fragment in the New Testament. And, I asked myself, do they mean to say that this man has made his second appearing? And, still more perplexing, that He has made His second appearing in a Woman! How could He come in a Woman?
This phraseology was in full use then, and probably had been from the beginning of the institution, and is continued to the present day. After becoming a member of the Society,
I set about probing the meaning of this mode of expression, and trying to deduce the radical idea, and to set it forth in rational and intelligible language. In this search my thoughts ran in this wise: Jesus the Messiah was the first man in and through whom the way of salvation from sin was revealed. This revelation was called in Greek, Euaggellion—Good news or Glad tidings. Jesus first promulgated it under that name, translated "Gospel," Matt. 4: 23, and elsewhere. Its true principles were first practically carried into effect on the day of Pentecost, when the community of goods was fully established at Jerusalem;
though previously Jesus and his disciples had their needs supplied from a common purse, and Judas was their deacon or trustee. That true church, through divers causes, mainly a relentless persecution by Jews, Romans and Catholics, was ultimately "trodden under foot of the Gentiles;" and that glorious Evangel or REVELATION was banished from this sphere of being and became extinct among men. As this Gospel was not a human invention, it could only be restored by a SECOND REVELATION.
When, therefore, the Shakers tell you that Christ has made His second appearance in a Woman, they mean that the Gospel which was revealed in and by Jesus, the Christ, after having been lost, has been revealed a second time through a woman. Thus, we do not pretend that Jesus Christ has made his second appearing in a woman, or in any other way literally, nor do we believe he ever will; but we testify that there has been—not a second appearing of Christ, but a SECOND REVELA-TION of the Gospel first revealed by Jesus, the Christ; and that revelation was made through a woman. This is plain common sense, easily comprehended, and without mystery; and, for one, I should like to have our testimony presented to mankind on this subject in this way.
But if it be generally preferred to continue the old mystical method, I am well aware that in Paul's writings there are abundant examples to support the practice. With his licentious use of the term, almost anything means Christ, and Christ means most anything you please. We shall notice some of the figurative and mysterious senses in which it is used in his Epistles. Under Paul's manipulations the term Christ becomes impersonal. The personality is lost in the principle, and the individual character diffused in the Church or community, and as a body—a unit—that community is the Son of Man—the Christ, the Lord's anointed, the Lord from Heaven. "For," says Paul, "we being many are one body. For as the body is one and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, though many, are one body; so ALSO IS CHRIST! For by one Spirit [God] we are all baptized into one body, whether we be Jew or Greek, whether bond or free, and have been all made to drink into one Spirit!"

Paul sends his salutation to Andronicus and Junia of Rome, "who," he says, "were IN Christ before me." In Christ does not mean in the bowels of Jesus the Messiah, but they were members of the Church before him. So he often uses the term Christ with scarcely an allusion to Jesus of Nazareth, or Jesus the Messiah. Again, he speaks of there being "one body in Christ," "helpers in Christ," "approved in Christ," etc., etc., all the time meaning in the Church. He also makes the term signify the Christian religion. "Christ," says he, "is the end of the Law." The Christian religion or institution is the end of the Mosaic law. "If Christ be in you:" If the Christian religion or Christian spirit be in you, etc. "Christ liveth in me:" The Christian religion is manifested in my life; or, he may mean that his life was a transcript or true pattern of the life of Jesus the Christ. "Christ hath redeemed us:" The power and efficacy of the Christian religion hath redeemed us, as he says in another place: "The Gospel is the power of God to salvation." After all these, and many more varied senses, in which the term Christ has been used, it remains a simple truth that the original application of it to Jesus was to designate him as the Messiah; translated into Greek, the Christos; into English, the Anointed—not a proper name but an official title. (See Jno. 1: 42-3.) "We have found the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, (in Greek) the Christos, and he brought him to JESUS." This Hebrew term Messiah, or Greek Christos, or English Christ or Anointed, then, was the functional title of Jesus, and not his proper name, nor the name of some invisible being distinct from him. We find not the least trace in either of the four Evangelists, or even in Paul's epistles, of the Gnostic doctrine that the pigeon or dove seen by John the Baptist was a high intelligence—a person—distinct from Jesus, that came from the Pleroma, and took possession of him. That dove was simply a visionary sign given to John to point out to him the Messiah, as he himself declares: "I saw a spirit descending from heaven like a dove. He who sent me to baptize, the same said unto me, 'Upon whom thou shalt see a spirit descending, the same is he who baptizeth into a holy spirit.'" He who sent John was God, as the Evangelist declares: "There was a man sent from God whose name was John." It was this same

God who inspired Jesus, anointed and qualified him for his mission to preach and establish the Gospel, reveal the new dispensation, as he himself testified in the Synagogue at Nazareth: "The Spirit of Jehovah is upon me, because he has anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor," etc. Thus, Jesus possessing the proper endowments and qualities, was authorized, inspired and appointed of God to the Messianic office—to initiate the new dispensation; to preach the Gospel, which, as Paul says, is the power of God to salvation; that is, salvation from sin. There is not the least hint that any intermediate spirit came in between him and Jehovah. He was not the Son of a Christ, but the Son of God, by virtue of regeneration and the new birth. He himself was the Christ, and was inspired, led and directed of God the Father, as he himself declares.

As to this Jesus, or Jesus the Christ coming the second time in person, it never will be. The promise of his coming is to be understood as other similar prophetic language in Scripture. It is not necessary that the same person should come, but one who has the same spirit to minister, the same revelation to make, and possesses the same "power of the spirit," and promulgates the same Evangel. The second coming of Elijah the prophet had been promised the Jews, and they looked for the same person; but Jesus, pointing to John the Baptist, said: "If ye can receive it, this is Elijah that was for to come." The Evangelist Luke also speaks of John as going forth "in the spirit and power of Elijah." So we point to Ann, or Ann the Christess, by and through whom a SECOND REVELATION of the same Gospel, with an increase, is made; and testify that "this is the Jesus, or Jesus the Christ, that was for to come." And she, also, came forth in the same power of the Spirit, was inspired from the same eternal source, and qualified of God to initiate and establish the SECOND REVELATION of the Gospel, and she did it! I will only add here, that as it was the special mission of Jesus to reveal the Fatherhood in God, so it was the special mission of Ann to reveal the Motherhood in God. This Revelation is day by day revolutionizing the world.

Stability of Principles.

BY ALONZO HOLLISTER.

Mankind are continually tossing like the waters of a troubled sea, forsaking present opinions, fashions or improvements for something they fancy is better, or to return after a season to the same again, because no solid foundation of happiness is attained. Pleasure is oft the impelling motive, and this is sought in sensual indulgences, or in ease, riches, or in novelty and change, none of which afford happiness; for abiding happiness is the result of growth, and stability in the principles of virtue and goodness; and its proper nourishment can only be obtained by self-denial.

Young minds partake very largely of this changing element; and the more so as they receive their mental pabulum from the fictitious, passionate and trashy literature of the day.

If they ever become reliable and substantial members of society, it is necessary that they should grow conservative; not shut up in the unreasoning elements of passion and will, but their feelings must be weaned from those external and changing elements of superficial excitement, and become fixed to the principles of understanding and habits of thought.

The principles of eternal life revealed in Christ, are unchangeable, remaining the same to every individual that receives them, now and ages hence. For instance, the doctrines of the New Testament, which lie at the foundation of our faith, and which are just as real and important to believers, in this day, as they were to those who first taught them, more than 1800 years ago; the revelation upon which we claim to be founded being a new revelation, not of essentially different truths, but of the same truths, by the same spirit, to every soul that receives that Spirit; and a revelation of further truths in the same line, as the increase and growth of souls in these, and the general progress of the work of God demands them.

One can no more neglect any of these and be a disciple of Christ, than he can skip over the four fundamental rules of arithmetic and become a mathematician; or than he can neglect the letters of the alphabet and be a good philologist. Those whose motives and conduct are guided and governed by these principles will exhibit a uniform and stable character, in all the varied conditions and circumstance of life—a character which they have not naturally in them, though the natural disposition of some will approach nearer it than others—but a character that is formed in them by the agency of the Holy Spirit, ministered by the gospel, in obedience to its principles; a character that will overcome and eventually eradicate from the soul every disposition, opinion or principle that is contrary to the pure nature of God.

My Experience.

BY JANE MARIA BRAINARD.

The second chapter of Matthew gives a parable, clearly illustrating a Christian character. I know of no people who so readily accept a stranger, as a brother in full fellowship, if earnestly seeking the truth, as the people called Shakers. They open their hearts and homes to such, and say: "Come, partake with us, of all our good things." It apparently matters not, whether such are blest with this world's goods or not; or even if they must need be cared for in many ways. The hungry, naked and sick are attended to; the afflicted are comforted, and the seeker after righteousness is shown how to be a practical Christian. I often think how secure I am, from many evils that are in the world; how shielded I am by visible friends, and the invisible hosts of heaven, by living a Shaker life. I have a feeling for those not blest as I am, and would let them know what I have found. I am glad a way is opened, whereby streams of goodness can flow from our Zion, to my needy fellow-beings. I feel confident that the little SHAKER will be the means of turning many from their unrighteousness, to the way of truth. We read of the necessity of improving our talents, and of the utter darkness into which one was cast for failing to improve the one talent given him. I want to throw in my mite; it may feed some hungering soul. My parents were Methodists, and very strict. They labored continually with their children to keep them from what they termed "the follies of the world;" keeping precepts and examples, and the Methodist discipline always before us.

When eleven years old, there was a revival among the youth. I was one of its subjects, and felt conviction for sin, and much release-ment; it was whispered, I had met with a change. I did have a feeling at that time, which though I could not utter it, yet was impressed that Christians should not live like the world! This remained on my mind as a sacred truth. Thirteen years after, I took up a book at the house of a friend, commenced reading it, when I felt as if cold water was running over me. Its title was, "Christ's Second Appearing, by the Shakers." I found on inquiry that they lived like angels; and that unuttered feeling again came upon me, and I resolved to visit them. I did so, and cast my lot with them; have never, for a moment regretted doing so; for I know I have found true Christians. Their daily life is my life; and their sacred truths are food to my soul.

I have lived a Shaker more than forty years; and have eaten the bread of life from my heavenly Parents' table, and can never be satisfied any more without it. If my mite should prove a crumb to some soul similarly hungry, I shall be thankful.

Idolatry.

BY ELIJAH MYRICK.

Would men draw down the smiles of heaven, let them convert the lavish, sinful expenditures on the dead, to the comfort and elevation of the ignorant and poor; turn all the Mt. Auburns and Greenwoods into homes of industry and comfort, or into grain fields for their support. Such institutions for the dead have wrought an unworthy reformation (?) by setting up the image of the beast, caste, in place of the beast seet, which made the church-yard their burying place. How aptly does the saying of Jesus apply: "Let the dead bury their dead."

Magna est Veritas.

It is beginning to be suspected now that digestion and indigestion have a good deal to do with "a Christian spirit and temper;" but investigations of this kind proceed very slowly, as it is so nice to eat and drink what we like, and so trying only to eat and drink what likes us. Rich dishes look like that fruit in Eden, "pleasant to the eyes," and we forget the shadows behind them. This morning I met our excellent and worthy church-warden, quite in low spirits about "church-rates," and other sublunary matters, and I knew well the reason of it, but it wouldn't do to tell him. Entre nous, there was a supper last night, and the roast beef and strong ale have at last taken an ecclesiastical shape.—Good Health.

At the recent meeting in Kelloggsville, Ohio, things were spiey for a time. Bigots refused to permit our speakers entrance into one of the so-called God's houses. At last the Shakers came. They said, yea, yea, we will try and get into the church. The bigots exclaimed, Oh yes! we are willing to let the pure Shakers in. And so the Shakers went in. Spiritualist preachers took the same road. The bigots were dumbfounded, when the Shakers declared from the pulpit that they were out-and-out Spiritualists, and that Spiritualism led to purity of life.

Love and Lust—the Difference.

Love is lasting, lust is shifting,
All unrest and ever drifting;
Love adores and saves its object,
Lust would make all virtue subject.
Love subordinates low feeling,
Lust lives on by double-dealing;
Love doth bear the heaviest crosses,
Lust ne'er counts its victim's losses;
Love doth bridle speech and action,
Lust for law hath no attraction;
Love doth pity, breathes compassion,
Lust doth spurn sneh kindly fashion;
Love doth lavish all protection,
Lust doth urge to misdirection.
Love, disease and woe would banish,
Lust, would make all beauty vanish;
Love in use and joy abideth,
Lust in base indulgence hideth;
Love doth give the hearty hand-clasp,
Lust may give, but with the death-grasp;
Love builds homes and makes them brighter,
Lust its withering chain draws tighter.
Love is an angel, Lust is a devil,
Stalking where furious passions revel;
Love is the voice that cheers the dying,
Lust is the coward his victim flying;
Love is the sunlight, warm and cheering,
Lust is the dread flame we go fearing;
Love is the hope that cheers the living,
Lust is the lease that dies with the giving.
Love is saviour and redeemer,
Lust a fraud—a treacherous schemer!
Love doth selfishness despise,
Lust, never bloated self denies.
Love, spikenard pours on broken hearts,
Lust seeks fresh victims for his arts;
"Love is fulfilling of the law,"
Lust is a traitor—scorns that saw!
Love gives worth, and wealth, and labor,
Lust robs dearest friend and neighbor;
Love is the coin that always blesses,
Lust is the counterfeit that curses;
Love is of home the light and charmer,
Lust the destroyer, deadly harmer;
Love wins sweetly, all devotion,
Lust makes a hell—a wild commotion!
Love yields fruits of the richest flavor,
Lust wrecked hopes and a rotten savor;
Love is the tried and true availer,
Lust is the lawless vile assailer;
Love doth bloom in happy faces,
Lust doth lurk in low disgraces;
Love may promise, none to doubt him,
Lust may swear good faith—we scent him!
Love is the freedom time makes stronger,
Lust is the slavery time makes longer;
Love doth lead to the noblest teachers,
Lust doth abhor all faithful preachers;
Love doth brave the greatest danger,
Lust is to courage true a stranger;
Love doth unmask the frowning despot,
Lust in excuse is a senseless bigot;

Love doth exalt both man and woman,
Lust is the foe of all that is human!

Who are Christians?

BY G. JOSIAH BARKER.

Christ answers this question in Luke xiv, 26. If the people are judged by this standard, how large a proportion would be found to be the true followers of Christ? If they are not followers of Christ, can they be Christians? We assert that the majority of professing Christians have not fulfilled the text, and are not walking the self-denying path Jesus trod before, inviting all who would be Christians to follow.

Are they admirers of Jesus' life? Or, do they jeer and ridicule those who live as he lived, and is now living? Why are Christian Shakers maligned by evil reports, if it is not because they bear Christ's testimony and live the life? They believe faith without works will never make a Christian; and believe that the doctrine of the atonement is an invention, to save man's nature from the cross. If men believed they must live as Christ lived, then would there be a difference in their lives. The people have been blinded by blind teachers, who have sugar-coated vital passages of scripture, so as to mean, that the people may live in the base indulgences of their passions, while Jesus alone must bear the cross! How absurd!

If we are ever saved (and we are not Christians until we are saved), it will be by a thorough self-denial after the manner of Jesus, the Christ. Professing Doctors of Divinity say Jesus was God, and therefore could not be our exemplar—for we are not divine! It may be a pleasure for them to teach such foolishness, but it will be a bitter disappointment to them when the truth is made apparent. They do not want to live as Jesus did; it is not because they cannot, but because they will not! Hoping to go to heaven sometime; expecting to be an angel in time to come; yet while the filthiness of the flesh presents its enticing charms, they are content to be the slaves to lust, while they sing of how good a Christian Jesus was! We are willing to face the question—do you live like Christians? We take the responsibility upon ourselves of being like, or unlike Jesus. If unlike, we are not his followers, and only as we subdue our inclinations to sin, we are not the followers of him who said: "Be of good cheer, for I have overcome the world"—we are not Christians. Now, who are the followers of Christ—those who speak many good words for him, or those who live a very good life like him?

They are Christians, who are daily denying themselves of worldly pleasures and sinful lusts; who are living on earth as the angels are living in heaven; who, acknowledging Jesus as their Elder Brother, follow his example, overcoming as he overcame—not relying upon his merits, but their own. Such do not look to the future for salvation, but experience it to-day—such alone are Christians.

Individuality and Organization.

BY O. C. HAMPTON.

DEAR SHAKER:—While so many peculiar views are receiving attention through the columns of the SHAKER, I am inclined to say somewhat upon the subject of Individuality. The Spiritualists harp on this a great deal, and are very jealous of their individuality; so much so, indeed, that they systematically attack and resist every effort at organization that happens to be suggested by any of the more progressed among them, with the argument that all organizations are in danger of neutralizing and destroying their individuality by subordinating the same to the proposed organization. There seem to me to be two plain issues to this question: 1. Mankind must go on in their present isolated and completely selfish condition, and individual efforts represent all the good the world may ever hope from Spiritualism, or any other reform which may arise to bless and improve them; or, 2. Spiritualists must organize in some shape or other, even at the risk of the loss of their individuality more or less (if there be any such loss involved, of which more further on). But how is this? A Spiritualist will tell me it is his duty to develop his individuality to the highest degree; and, consequently, he must keep aloof from all organized institutions, because no organization can exist which will not more or less cramp and compromise this individuality to the behests of itself. This same Spiritualist, however, will straightway go and get married. Where now is his individuality? It is no where. He has become part of a duality. In process of time he has a number of children. Now he is no longer even a duality; he has developed himself into part of a plurality. His independent existence is completely gone up, and his fate is inexorably tethered to his wife and children. He is a complete slave. True, he may be so unenlightened as to hug his chains; but he is none the less a slave on that account, and leastwise his individuality no longer exists. But suppose he is pleased not to shoulder the responsibilities of a married life, but still hankers after "the fleshpots of Egypt" only enough to desire a mate of the opposite sex, to whom he shall be partially attached and devoted, to the exclusion of others equally worthy of his love, and perhaps far more so? Here, again, his judgment is a slave to his inordinate affections, and he is shut up from the Godlike exercise of that universal equal Love which Jesus enjoyed (see Matt. ch. 5, v. 44-45). How dwarfed and wretched such a love, when the conscience is all the time proclaiming in thunder tones, "The whole world is famishing for your love, and you are wickedly lavishing it upon one single individual, violently subordinating your higher, holier obligations to your lower instincts." And this must be the conclusion, leaving out of the account the consideration that this exclusive love is merely a gilded, glittering ignus fatuus, the design and object of which is to attract the sexes toward each other for the ultimate purpose of coition, and so belonging entirely to the animal plane. At all hazards individuality must be bartered away to obtain it, and Spiritualists should be the last ones to plead for such partial love or favoritism.

On the other hand, organization is a condition of complete individualism in the highest and most glorious sense of the term; that is, organization such as was exhibited in the Pentecostal arrangement of old. Here every man's and woman's best talents, qualities, loves, affections, may go on expanding in all heavenly and sublime directions to all eternity. Not only so, but the wholesome rules and scientific arrangement of such an organization tend continually to protect its adherents from those lower influences of our common nature—"the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye and the pride of life," the very influences which alone cramp, belittle, enslave and gradually extinguish all our independence and individuality. Shakerism professes to be established upon the Pentecostal principles of Celibacy and Community of goods—all things in common, etc. And the Shakers are willing to be judged by their works in regard to this, their high profession. Therefore we would advise all progressed Spiritualists to give us a call before looking elsewhere; and, above all, before staking their all upon the issues of any organization not having for its basis "Celibacy and Community of goods."

Lafayette.

Lafayette visited Mother Ann Lee at Watervliet, in the early and trying season of her settlement there. She told him his time had not yet come to be a Shaker; that he had much suffering to undergo, and a great work to perform in this world; but when he went into the spirit world he might then unite with her children. Abijah Worcester, being a medium of the Spirit, was violently moved by the unseen influences while Lafayette was there; and Lafayette would touch him, as with a view to receive the influence. Abijah said to him: "You love this power, don't you?" "It seems very desirable," was the reply. (Witness) LUCY WOOD.

It is a curious fact, that fifteen days before Lafayette's death was published in the United States, the same was made known by himself to a medium at Watervliet (now Shakers), N. Y., and was a matter of common conversation among our people. He, at the same time, referred to his visit to Mother Ann, when on earth, and of her remarks to him. The above Lucy Wood was an eye and ear witness of Lafayette, in propria persona. *

Pruning Apple Trees.

BY F. W. EVANS.

Trimming these so that they shall bear the largest quantity of fruit, other things being equal, is good economy.

Professor Mapes once stated to me that he trimmed pear trees so closely and scientifically, as to insure each fruit bud, a blossom; and each blossom, a pear.

That is the principle. Look at a young apple tree, beginning with the trunk, and ask yourself, how many of these largest size limbs does that tree require? It has six; you take out three or four, for two or three main limbs springing from the trunk, will make a tree. Is it well balanced? Then look at each one of those main limbs, just as you looked at the tree; and see how many of its largest limbs you can take out. Do the same by the next size branches. And, if your tree is still too thick, follow the same plan, trim the next size, until nothing remains on the tree that may not blossom without waste, and bear fruit without there being any to drop off.

Your apple tree will then be neither full of poles, trimmed up to make room for them; nor yet so crowded, that it spends its forces in blossoms that cannot set fruit; nor in setting fruit that can never ripen.

The Devil—Has he Reformed?

MY DEAR EDITOR:—It would seem, by the perusal of a couple of articles in a late World's Crisis, that the editor, Miles Grant, has made some wonderful discoveries, and is in great tribulation because of certain articles in the SHAKER. Hear him talk:

"We are most fully persuaded that the whole thing (Spiritualism) is but the devil's system of religion; and that it has nothing in common with the religion of Christ, any more than a counterfeit bill has with one that is genuine."

To prove this assertion, he quotes largely that most excellent article from the pen of James M. Peebles, in June number of the SHAKER.

In this article, as your readers will remember, Brother Peebles says that Spiritualism will call for "speakers with tongues of fire, hearts pulsing with prayer, and souls touched with the baptism of the living Christ." His concluding remarks were: "Let us, Oh Spiritualists, be true to our convictions, true to our moral and religious natures, true to the principles of purity and right."

From such sentiments as these our friend finds conclusive evidence that it is the "Devil's religion." Why, what a change has come over that noted old personage with the cloven foot! We had supposed his teachings were just the opposite of those quoted. It helps, however, to prepare our minds for his comments upon the article entitled Shaker Cemeteries; of which he says: "Shakerism and Spiritualism are half brothers (true). They have both one father—the Devil. Both systems are founded on Satan's lie—'Ye shall not surely die.'"

Can it be possible that the old deceiver and lifelong enemy of purity has repented of his past life, confessed his sins and become a Shaker! For, of course, he must be a Shaker if he begets children who are Shakers!

If this is really so, it puts Paul's conversion quite in the shade, and must be set down as the most remarkable instance of change of heart on record.

If he can have half as much influence on the minds of the millions now as before his conversion, when they were so ready to be led by him, what wonderful changes will take place, even in what is called Christian Society!

Instead of serving Mammon they will choose to serve God; instead of fostering pride they will cultivate simplicity; instead of war, with its slaughtered thousands and ruined cities, we shall find peace that bindeth up the broken-hearted and maketh glad the waste places; instead of lust, that now fills the land with corruption and murder, we shall find continence, purity and mercy; instead of riches and poverty—twin evils and legitimate children of selfishness—we shall find universal brotherhood, with its community of interests as exemplified in the first pentecostal Church. The whole Christian world will be converted to Christianity! And even friend Grant would realize how much better it is to save men from their sins than it is to burn them up in their sins.

Alas, in the midst of my exultations therein, comes the thought unbidden to mind, that even the Devil would lose his influence upon the minds of so-called Christians if he should become a Shaker!

In former times he has shown them the whole world, and said, "all this will I give if ye will fall down and worship me." And how few have refused!

As a Shaker he would show them the whole world and say, "all this you must forsake if ye would fellowship with me." And how few would accept the terms!

Realizing how anxious the old adversary is to retain his present very large company of followers, we shall require the very best of evidence to convince us that he has decided to be a Shaker, or his "half brother," a true Spiritualist. It occurs to us, also, that this is not the first time that the Devil has been calumniated. We read that in ancient times certain of the Jews accused him of assisting Jesus to cast out devils, which charge was afterwards proved to be false, as this will be.

As to our founding our faith on Satan's lie—"Ye shall not surely die"—we see too much evidence of that death that comes from sinful works, to have the least desire to put our confidence in that or any other of Satan's lies. But we do have confidence in that promise, and trust that friend Grant will yet be induced to, given by Christ through Jesus: "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die."

Yours, JOHN B. VANCE.

War.

BY DANIEL ORCUTT.

Those who defend war, must also defend the dispositions which lead to war. Now those dispositions are absolutely forbidden by the Gospel. Our Saviour said, "put up thy sword," and ever since that time true Christians must not, cannot go to war. The safety of a nation is not to be found in arms; and morality and true religion forbid war, both in its motives, and consequences.

"From whence came wars and fightings among you?" asks the Apostle; "Come they not hence even of your lusts, that war in your members?" If these warlike passions were effectually subdued, all wars would cease. Those who are governed by these passions, are blind to their own interest; they are blind to their own best good, both for time and eternity. "Wisdom is better than weapons of war." Eccl. ix, 18. Warlike passions are hard masters; and they should be subdued betimes and thoroughly. Otherwise their power will increase over that of reason, and will in the end lead to ruin. At the advent of our Saviour was published the glad tidings of "Peace on earth, good will towards man;" and Peace was his last gift to his disciples. "Peace I leave with you, my Peace I give unto you." "Blessed are the peacemakers." Christ is the Prince of Peace, and his kingdom is one of Peace. But war belongs to the Prince of this world. War is contrary to all Christianity; but wars will continue, as long as that policy is maintained, which is calculated to promote a warlike spirit. The power to overcome warlike passions is found in the Gospel. It imparts a peaceful, holy influence, which enables those who submit to it to conquer their passions, and even to love their enemies, and thus to conquer them. Many have conquered kingdoms who could not conquer themselves, and many crowns have been given to conquerors of ancient and modern times; but God himself has prepared a crown for all the self-conquered, bearing this inscription: "He that overcometh shall inherit all things."

Life in God.

BY WILLIAM N. REDMON.

In the creation, God has given to his works a specific identity, nature and destination, which must ultimate according to the Divine Will and purpose. All the lower orders, as far as we are informed, are satisfied with their condition; having no aspirations of changing, and rising to a higher order; or of retrograding, and sinking into a lower. The conditions assigned each species, whether on the earth, in the water, or the atmosphere, seem to be consonant and satisfactory.

Man alone seems to be the recipient of discontent, unrest and aspirations; not feeling at home, but an inhabitant or tenant at will, liable to change of tenure at any moment, and removal from earth. The acquisitions of time are not his, only the portion necessary to his sustenance while a tenant; the stores of earth, of whatever nature, fall into other hands, and remain in their appropriate sphere.

The extreme folly of selfishness, as set forth in the parable of our Lord, in the case of the husbandman, whose barns, store-houses and granaries were already full, and his contemplations and anticipations looking forward to larger barns, store-houses and granaries, remains a standing lesson to after generations.

"Thou fool! This night shall thy soul be required of thee, and whose shall all these things be?"

Man brings nothing of earth with him into time, consequently has nothing of lasting ownership in all his possessions, and can take nothing with him when he departs. If he has acquired little, or nothing of the true riches, he leaves earth in poverty, and has to begin a new acquisition in the spirit home; very different his compeer, who was called into the Vineyard of his Lord on earth, receiving wages of the kingdom of righteousness, and clothed with the garments of salvation.

Man having the Divine impress, and aspirations in his soul, must attain to the Divine Nature, and become one with the Creator, in his capacity as a recipient; this attainment, and this alone, can satisfy the unceasing desires of his Nature: Man cannot escape from himself; he must be a man; yea, a man of God; or be forever miserable! The trust and responsibility lie with himself; and the sooner he commences the all-important work in the new life, the better; for procrastination increases the burden, and at the same time lessens the ability of bearing it.

With the outward man ceases the ability to use the alimentations and desires of earth; the soul must be the happy recipient of the spiritual and divine benediction of a higher order; of which there are ample preparations in the heavenly mansions, according to capacity and advancement. The provident Lord, before he left time, paternally and fraternally informed his Apostles, that there were no suitable mansions for them; therefore, he was going to prepare a place, that he might receive them unto himself. In all probability there will be astonishing disappointment to many of the professors of Christianity, who expect to be taken immediately into the mansions of the Lord; whose claims are mostly resting on a mere profession; having made but little, or no advancement in the Divine Life. The annunciation in all probability will be, "depart from me, for I never knew you!" They will be compelled to take mansions more suitable to their conditions; and thence commence the divine life, and progress onward and upward in their own order and fraternity; never being able to attain the Apostolic advance; but must always remain in the rear, according to attainment and allotment.

Our Heavenly Parents, in the Gospel, have called, are calling, and will call all their children; and all who accept, and enter into newness of life, following the example of their Lord by invitation, will be placed in the mansions of the kingdom, and continued in their places, according to faithfulness in their heavenly Home. Those who reject their privilege, and take the retrograde and downward course, "counting themselves unworthy" of the call, must be content to take the station of the disobedient and froward, and bear the sad reproach of disloyalty!

The impossibility of man erasing from his mind the divine aspirations for the heavenly life, by attainment in the Divine Nature, he cannot be satisfied with the filthy nature, and its degradation; and after he has gone his whole length, and nothing remains in the lowest deep, then to his great mortification, when he comes to himself, he has to retrace his steps to his Father's house, and commence the new life, in the self-denying, narrow way of the Saviour; for if we go to his kingdom, we must follow him in the regeneration, living the new life.

Justice alone can give us our dues; and these must be the result of our own choice, volition and attainment; and just here the decrees of God come in, and leave the children of earth without excuse or palliation; for the Heavenly invitation is, "whosoever will, let him come and partake of the bread and waters of Life freely."

We cannot shift the responsibility. It was a great favor to the prodigal son to be accepted, after his sad experience in the swine region.

It is a matter of mercy, as well as justice, to assign to the inhabitants of earth, mansions according to attainments; for how could the soul, just released from the precincts of alcohol and the narcotics; smoking, chewing and snuffing tobacco; swearing, blasphemy, and debauchery, bear the presence of the redeemed Saviour, clad in the white garments of the heavenly kingdom?

O, the blackness of darkness! O for a place to hide this debauched and adulterous generation!!

And shall we repeat the heavenly record, "Come unto me all ye ends of the earth, and be saved." "Be ye pure, for I am pure, saith the Lord."

"God Speed the Day."

BY E. H. WEBSTER.

He speeds the day; it is his own,
And hastens swift along;
For suffering souls there yet is born
A gladness bright and strong,
He speeds it most in seeming ill,
In times of trouble sore;
For when each earthly idol's still,
We turn to Him the more.

A peace is born of conflict deep
With carnal selfish ways;
And those who this sweet peace can keep,
Fear not while truth delays.
He speeds it in the hurricane,
The fiery fiend and hail,
To help us find that greater gain,
Which tempests can't assail.

He speeds it in the justice deep,
Which sinful living scorns;
That what we sow we sure shall reap,
And not the grape of thorns,
That if our life is full of greeds,
And narrow, selfish aims,
The sphere we move in feels the seeds
Which such a life proclaims.

The miasmatic state it breeds,
Engenders evils sore,
Until in pestilence the seeds
Spring up and grow the more.
Or, if in burning lust or hate
The life be only spent,
The outer sphere is only mate
To that by which it's rent.

Essentials and Non-essentials.

Progress means a movement upward, forward; and intends that we leave the errors of the past, as soon as they are demonstrated to be such, in the rear.

To cling to a custom, for custom's sake, would deny to us the benefits of all modern blessings, and in all things we should compare with the old custom of going to mill—on one side of the horse's back, the grain in the bag, on the other, a stone to balance it. We have proved the stone a non-essential; and there are many such, that are now disturbing the balance of mind, in many otherwise estimable Believers.

To some the wearing of the beard is "wanting in refinement, neatness and convenience!" This was a sister's remark, at Enfield, Conn. To others, the wearing or non-wearing has a religious importance attached to it—if to either, we should agree to do as Jesus did—but we don't believe in attaching so much importance to customs, opinions or theologies, which are antiquated, unreligious and non-essential to salvation. "The union is the gift," is a truism of our Mother Lucy Wright; and we must learn to be united on all points of doctrine, of custom, even if new, when proved to be essential to our well being, and when in conformity with our visible lead. The stubborn conservative, hurts the union—the gift—and ties the hands and hearts of our good Ministry, from yielding their consent to have Society improve in all that would make her beautiful, without departing a hair's breadth from the essential, heavenly, fundamental principles of our beautiful Gospel. If Society really needs an organ to improve it, then let us be united, regardless of past custom. If the beard will prolong life, or induce better physiology, who will take the responsibility of lost health and life by its further abandonment? We do not say we are now in their favor; but should the decision be made in their favor, we will abandon all opposition.

We want only the good and pure in life; we want all the protective measures that can be had, to throw around our young people, and to save them from sin. We want to make home so delightful, so beautiful, that it will gather and retain individuals, and would not omit a single feature that did not conflict with the purity of life, as taught by the saints, and practiced by the angels. Therefore, begone, all opposition to music and flowers; to any and every improvement that will and can stand on our everlasting foundational principles. We do not ask sympathy for a progress into anything that will breed a lack of industry, or permit the lending of an eye, ear or feeling to worldly inducement; but we do ask the consideration of all, the good, and the too-indifferent, if we are not faltering in an age of progress to our harm.

If an individual will be pure and good, yet wants to retain some instrument of music; wear his beard or keep some theological whim, shall we reject him as an associate in the higher life? Shall we refuse him a privilege to unite with us in our consecration? We propose the throwing away of the tobacco-box in preference to the organ; and the pipe and snuff-box rather than the continued absence of the harp; the flesh-pots of mutton, beef, etc., rather than the fruits and flowers, indigenous to our climate. Let us move away from the wrong, and only towards the pure and good. The new cycle calls for progress, as really towards some things as away from many improprieties. We ask charity of our comrades for our radical propositions; we feel deeply for Society's improvement, and would stop any and every leak of her strength.

Things I Love.

BY G. T. SPIRIT.

I love the honest, truthful soul,
Who is not ashamed to say,
"I own I'm wrong; help me to walk
In a more perfect way."
"A wrong confess'd is half redressed,"
Pray speak of it no more;
You have acted nobly, and I love
You better than before.

I love the artless, noble soul,
Who will not wince, nor start,
To learn his faults, though from a foe,
With malice in his heart.
"Strike on, strike on, keep striking on!"
The wise old Roman said;
"Your blows, good friend, may mend my heart,
And will not break my head."

I love the brave and fearless soul,
Who dares, in open day,
To meet his heart alone, and hear
All that it has to say.
"If you have anything to say,
Speak on, good friend, within;
Together let us seek the light,
And search out every sin."

The Shaker.

Most radically religious monthly in the world. Organ of the societies of people called Shakers. Teaches thorough Christianity, unbiased by man-made creeds. Proclaims self-denial to be the efficacious remedy for sin. Declares that Jesus was baptized CHRIST, and thence became the pattern for all who name the name of Christ, to follow. Gives information of Shaker life, habits, economy, success; theology, prophecy, inspirations, revelation and expectations. Deprecates war, either in the nation or in the household. Demands of all Christians, lives devoted to communion of interests. Certifies that celibacy is the order of heaven, and that marriage belongs to the earth only, and is not practiced by Christians. Testifies against all intemperance, lusts of the flesh, and worldly pride. Inculcates true love; separation from worldly customs, politics, etc. Claims God as Father and Mother of all souls—a duality, and therefore teaches the equal rights of their children, regardless of sex, color, race, education, circumstances, or custom. Is a radical exponent of true Spiritualism—Shakers are Spiritualists. Objects to riches; poverty; slavery of either mind or body. Establishes the only true system of dietetics, and is a preserver of health. Guarantees salvation to all who will live as our great exemplar, Jesus, lived. Believes all can be baptized by the same Christ Spirit, and thus become saviours to the lost or fallen, first being saved themselves. Is just the thing for the uneasy infidel, and bigoted sectarian. Loves all, means all shall be saved; teaches the way. Every individual expecting the re-appearance of Christ, should read THE SHAKER, and learn that the SHAKERS believe Christ's life puts an "end to the world."

Price fifty cents per annum; costs, and is worth one dollar. Address G. A. LOMAS, Editor, Shakers, N. Y.

Society Record.

Passing through Hancock recently, we were pleasantly surprised at her improved appearance. Always neat, she now looks beautiful. Meeting-house modernized; the antiquated, elevated aqueduct by the roadside is no more; beautiful stone fences, with posts and boards above; large permanent gates, painted red, and fastened by spring padlocks—all looked rejuvenating. Very likely her people are being illustrated as those consecrated souls who "put their hands to work, and give their hearts to God."

DIED, at Hancock, June 26, FESTUS MILLER, aged 70.

MT. LEBANON is alive to many new things. THE SOUTH are building an extensive chair factory, with tenant houses attached. A thousand-dollar engine from Haskell's Albany works is to drive the machinery. THE CHURCH have also purchased a powerful engine from the same firm, for their herb and root department. Paint has been busy here on many buildings this season. As Brooklyn is noted for churches, so may THE NORTH be for nice, commodious barns. Another mammoth has arisen on the flats, and is, no doubt, ere this well filled.

Orrin Haskins had his ankle broken by an accident on the 6th August.

We hear that the Mt. Lebanon Ministry speak enthusiastically of the singing now heard at Canterbury and Enfield, N. H., when connected with their organs!

At SHAKERS (Watervliet, N. Y.), some improvements are apparent. THE CHURCH remodel their workmen's lodge into a building of fine appearance. THE SOUTH have just laid nearly a hundred feet of aqueduct, fifteen inches diameter, boiler iron, between the middle pond and machine shop—the wooden one having given out.

SOUTH UNION and PLEASANT HILL have each their respective Ministry's Order, as years ago, but of recent date they were consolidated. We wish both many blessings.

UNION VILLAGE, O. Daniel Miller reports a large gathering of believers and Spiritualists at Mason, O. The Shakers bore their testimony faithfully, which the Spiritualists received kindly, but silently. Among the multitudes of Spiritualists there are a few who, having received light and testimony against sinful works, are practically fulfilling the call of the Spirit, and failing to fulfill unspiritual, fleshly lusts.

ENFIELD, CONN. Our visit here was short and sweet. No prettier Society do we know of. All looks neatly; buildings in good repair, and improving. THE CHURCH have built an excellent carriage house and stable, and have so improved the farm as to double its yield. The family garden is already a picture, as well as affording an abundance of vegetables for home use and for sale. Of its magnitude let us only mention that it has a thousand pear trees. THE NORTH seem very flourishing. Their new shop is nearly finished, and is of palatial appearance—the prettiest we ever saw. THE SOUTH looks beautifully clean and inviting.

Died: July 30, Louisa Blanchard, aged nearly 57 years.

August 6, Johanna Wells, aged 70.

Notice to Believers.

THE SHAKER, under its present patronage of subscribers nearly or quite sustains itself.

We would consider it a personal favor, if any interested in its success, would write us their opinions, by answering the following queries, or their equivalent:

1. Does THE SHAKER pay as a missionary enterprise? if not, why not?
2. Would it be sustained, if its size and price should be doubled?
3. Are you in favor, or not, of its suspension for 1873?
4. What substantial encouragement do you feel to assure to it from your locality?
5. Are you in favor, or opposed, to the insertion of modest advertisements?
6. Wherein could THE SHAKER, in your opinion, be improved?

Remark: We circulate 5,000 copies monthly, among the best classes of society, over an extensive territory; the benefits to advertisers are clearly apparent. Please reply.

MADAME OLYMPE AUDOUARD says in her speech on Woman and her position in marriage, a speech delivered in France a few months since, "The only thing which can make of marriage a calm, happy and ennobling union, instead of, as it is now, an eternal torture, is divorce."

The Beauty of my Shaker Faith.

BY HARRIET HULLARD.

My call to be a Believer is something more than a casual circumstance. I feel its force, and realize its holiness. As a woman in the sphere of nature, I realize how enslaved I should be, to the fashions and life that gratify the merely animal; the object and slave of man's passions. As a sister in the spiritual family of Christ, I am relieved from earthly servitude, and am a free being—free to live and to be as pure as the heavens, with companions who also are pure.

I have the association of brethren, upon whom I can depend for my spiritual and physical protection—who are not seeking the spoliation of the angel virtue in woman. We, as their sisters, are enabled to be their ministers of comfort and love. The reciprocity of gentleness and sweet companionship between brethren and sisters, who are true and well tried, may find an equal illustration in the heavens, but no other condition on earth yields an equal joy. I realize every day of my life, the beauty of my gospel faith. Living in pure virginity, apart from the excitement of a worldly life; with a privilege of confessing and forsaking the mistakes of the past, and of feeling my attachment and relation to the spirits in the heavenly world. My whole being is under the guidance and ministration of the superior world. I love its discipline; I am happy in my call to an entire consecration of soul and body to a cause so noble; and though many rebel against the call of God, I know the discipline of a Shaker life is of God, and that its principles can never fail. I have tasted of the bread and waters of a regenerated and eternal life, and to every sincere seeker after truth, I send greeting, a welcome to share with me.

Briefs.

"The Shakers have most certainly struck at the root of all evil, but in our opinion they have struck a little too deep." Thus writes Dr. R. T. Trall; and yet, who cares how deeply any strike, if the object of the stroke is accomplished, and the root of all diseomfiture and separation from godliness annihilated?

Deacon David Osborn had frequently met neighbor Camp, and compared their knowledge of the scriptures, until the Deacon was nearly out of patience. In a hurry, he was passing near the field where friend Camp was at work, when Camp, as usual, began: "David, do you know what Baul says?" "Yea," replied the Deacon, "It is good for a man not to touch a woman!" "No, no," said Camp, "I don't mean dat, not dat!"

Issachar Bates, Sen., was getting his horse shod at a smith's, in a western State, when he, as usual, opened a sermon at man's fallen fleshly nature, and assured the company present that Christ had come again, and that he was a representative of the new gospel. He then showed the necessity of a man's confessing his sins, and living a new life like Jesus, and he should then be enabled to do greater works than even Jesus. While preaching to his motly hearers, he was annoyed by one who kept demanding a miracle! "What shall I do for you?" he finally asked. "Turn that cart-wheel into a horse!" replied his annoyner. "That's just like the evil one," he remarked, "to leave the owner of that cart only one wheel to go home with."

Father Joseph Meacham was convinced, it is said, of the truth of Mother Ann's mission, when, after a question from him as to her authority to preach Christ's second appearing, she replied: "When the Man (Jesus) is gone, the Woman has her right."

At the great religious revival, in Kentucky, many years ago, it will be remembered that a little boy was spiritually wrought upon to speak with much feeling and eloquence. Closing an appeal to sinners, with the dropping of his handkerchief, wet with tears and perspiration, he exclaimed: "Thus will you drop, sinners, into hell, unless you repent!" This little boy is now the very reverend John Rankin, who has told the story often, to many, without in the least inferring that he was once that little boy.

We wish to circulate a few hundred copies of our "Brief Exposition of Shakerism," and "Universal Church," and will do so, post paid, to any address, on receipt of ten cents. Parties, at all interested in the people, called Shakers, can get a good view of our system and government, multum in parvo, by the reading the above, little but very expressive works. Other works not in the list of Publications, can be procured at this office.

What Cheer?

BY E. H. WEBSTER.

There's a light streaming forth from the east,
That gilds the horizon afar,
And says to each suffering heart,
Look aloft to the blest morning star,
There's a promise of day in its beams;
There's a promise of freedom and right;
There's a promise of peace on the earth,
And the triumph of love over might.

There's a joy for the clean and the pure;
There's a rest for the weary of sin.
There's a peace for the conqueror of self,
And its seat and foundation 's within.
There's a love for the trusting and frail;
There's a tender, compassionate heart,
That weeps o'er the sinner, and cannot assail,
Nor add to its suffering smart.

There's a light glowing bright in our heart,
For our Father, who led us this way;
There's a love, ever warm in our breast,
For our Mother, our comfort and stay,
Who suffered and toiled to spread the pure faith
That shines on our every-day life,
And lightens and cheers us thro' sorrow and toil
To faint not, nor sink in the strife.

There's a gratitude due to our King,
For all of his infinite care;
There's a duty we owe to our Queen;
A loyalty everywhere;
To honor their cause, in word and in deed,
And light up the temple anew;
And worthily walk in their footsteps, so pure,
And oil in our lamps oft renew'd.

There's a question will come to each soul,
When eternity opens its light;
There's a sorrow will over us roll,
If we keep not our lamps burning bright.
Let us banish all discord, and work while we can,
And lighten each burden we may,
While joyfully walking in duty, and use
The straight and still brightening way.

How to be an Angel.

BY H. L. EADES.

It is but rational to conclude that all who enter the kingdom of heaven, in the spirit world, on leaving this, are angels (I go, said Christ, to prepare a place for you—John 14: 2, 3), and that they became so, previous to their entrance there. How to become so is the grand problem the world has been trying to solve from Adam to the present hour. For this purpose are all religions instituted among men, that they may be prepared to reach the home of angels when their bodies are consigned to dust. If this be true, it is important that we should know how to become angels, before we ascend to knock at the pearly gates, lest it may be said to us, "Depart from me, I never knew you."

Comte says, every "Religion demands the concurrence of two spontaneous influences:

the objective—intellectual; the subjective—moral." He should have said spiritual, but thank him for not making the animal a necessity. One thing is very certain, and that is: All religions that ever existed were, in the beginning, precisely alike, that is, their basic pillars are the same; all the deviations arise from the modes of building after the religious idea is conceived. The first is a feeling of dependence on some power above that of man; the second is the desire to know something of that being or power on whom they depend; the third is the desire to know how to act to propitiate his favor, and come into harmony with him; the fourth is to pray to, love, and worship him. These are the basic pillars of all religions, and as said, all the variations after this arise from the modes adopted by each to accomplish the above ends. Leaving all others for the present, I will present the true Christian or Shaker plan, which is, in a nutshell: to confess, repent of, and forsake all sin; take Jesus Christ as our exemplar; follow his footsteps, and live the pure, chaste, and holy life that he lived. I might stop right here, only for the fact that thousands declare the impossibility of mortals bearing so great a cross, or living a life so pure as to become angels on earth—to be "overcomers as Christ overcame," and thus secure our right to sit with him in his kingdom. But as it has been done, and is now done, I propose briefly and inductively to tell how, after assuming the above pure conditions necessary to our union with Christ. "Religion," says Gould, "undertakes to encourage man with hopes; if he will expend his vital energy in the development of his higher powers, he will be happier. It also deters him by threats from resisting his spiritual instincts, and burying them in fleshly indulgence," legal or illegal. "For man's faculties sweep far beyond the development of his sensual life. He derives his liveliest gratifications and acutest pain from objects to which his animal consciousness is a stranger." He further adds this great truism: "If man requires a great exemplar, so does woman require one, too. A religious system which would provide man with a model, and leave woman destitute of one, is imperfect, and inadequate to supply the wants of human nature." Thus he makes his own Roman Catholic, and all other religions inadequate, Shakers alone excepted, who have Mother Ann Lee as the exemplar of woman-kind, who bore the same testimony, led the same life, and overcome the same adversary as did Jesus Christ, her Lord. Thank him for the compliment. What I shall say is equally necessary for both sexes to know and practice, in order to become angels, and must ask pardon for any necessary plainness which may exceed their sense of the true bounds of modesty.

It is a matter well known to physiologists that all have the power, by their will, to direct and precipitate the vital forces to any part of the system, to develop and strengthen the animal, intellectual, or spiritual brain, or any of the organs of the body. "For intellectual development, the spontaneous force must be precipitated on the cerebral hemispheres. For sentimental [spiritual] development, it must be turned upon the sensory ganglia. For animal development, upon the cerebellum, or lower brain. That luxury and sexual indulgence are ruinous to mental, and therefore to moral health, is well known to physicians." In man, the intellect is coupled either with the spiritual, sentimental, or animal brain, at pleasure. When it is coupled with the cerebellum, it is for the purpose of inventing means to aid and heighten animal pleasures; when coupled with the cerebrum, it is for the purpose of devising means for spiritual growth and happiness. "Now [the highest] happiness is to be found either in the co-ordination of all the faculties, mental and bodily (and this the sensualist claims), or in the development of the highest, at the expense of those less noble. If a man is content to remain on the dead level of the majority of other men, he will adopt the first course. If he feels a desire to rise above them, he will adopt the second." Now, because God has endowed us with animal and lower faculties, as well as the spiritual and higher, it does not relieve us from culpability when we submit to the rule of the former instead of the latter, because he has made us "masters of the situation." "The government of the passions," says Locke, "is the right improvement of liberty; nor let any one say he cannot govern his passions [if he take the proper means in time], nor hinder them from breaking out, and carrying him into action; for what he can do before a prince or great man, he can do alone, or in the presence of God, if he will." In order to retain this ability, the work must be begun in the mind, and the vital forces precipitated upon the cerebral hemispheres, and not upon the cerebellum and animal organs. "What I say unto one, I say unto all, watch." When the mind is permitted to dwell on sensual delights, the vital currents are directed to the generative organs, when a state of orgasm is induced, and active and vigorous secretions there commenced, and graduated at the expense of the higher faculties and upper brain; for nearly seven per cent. of the solids of the adult brain is pure phosphorus, and this, to be continually posited in the generative system and cerebellum, makes the man or woman a brute, and the cross of Christ and higher life become to either an impossibility, yea, not even desired by them, so thoroughly subdued are all their spiritual aspirations. They now can join with Heine in saying,

"I scorn the heavenly plains above me,
In the blest land of Paradise," or with the exclamation of Jean Reynaud, "Ah! Christ, how your paradise scares me! I prefer my life with its lights and shadows, tribulations and pains, to that blank immortality with its sanctimonious peace."

This is the smitten, low, and hardened condition that mortals reach who allow their thoughts to run on sensual and carnal things, instead of intellectual and spiritual. When even a state of orgasm is not perceptible, the indulgence in luxuries and carnal thinking will polarize the phosphoric fires on the cerebellum, and strengthen the animal, which will predominate, govern, and direct the body. We then hear the complaint, "Oh, I can't bear the cross; were it not for this one requirement, I would join the Shakers forthwith," etc. But you can bear the cross, the weakest mortal, if you will take the course indicated; but if you do the contrary, all your prayers will be unavailable, for then

"A transient gust, Spent in a sudden storm of lust," will be the consequence. There is no retreat, as some suppose, by reabsorption into the blood, by the will, of misspent organic life, and thence carried to the upper brain for spiritual uses. Its stand is taken; it will not retreat. "The wise foreseeth the evil, and hide themselves, but the simple go on, and are punished." Yea, the simpletons go on, repeating the process again and again—resolve and fail, and re-resolve and fail, until they become wholly subdued by sensuality, their angel of hope droops her wings, and they sink in the gulf of despair. Then they may well repeat to themselves the vision of Jean Paul, "All around me is a wide, petrified humanity. In the dark, unpeopled stillness no love glows, no admiration, no hope, no aim—I so all alone! Within me the dumb, blind Demigorgon is concealed, and I am in it. So I proceed into eternity—and who knows me, and hears my sorrow?—I. Who knows me, and hears to all eternity?—I." Now, by heeding what I have said, this terrible state can be avoided. Take not, I beseech you, my young friends, the first backward step, then the second will never be taken. But bear with me a few moments longer, if it be not too great a strain upon your patience and modesty, whilst I state a few things it would be the part of wisdom to avoid, though considered by many, harmless and inoffensive. I address those now who really desire in their hearts to be successful in cross-bearing, and gaining the pure angelic state. Those who chant the little popular song, "I want to be an angel, and with the angels dwell," will find it necessary to avail themselves of the smallest advantages, to insure a speedy progress to the angel condition. It is written, "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you." But it is a poor time to resist, after you have invited him into your sanctum, and embraced him. Those who really desire purity above all things, will refrain from reading novels and love stories, or singing worldly love songs, or any sexual dalliance; arm-in-arm promenades; moonlight riding, and masquerades, balls, bacchanal carousals. Such will find the words of Byron but too true:

"The gay companions of the bowl
Dispel awhile the sense of ill;
Though pleasures fire the madd'ning soul,
The heart—the heart—is lonely still."

Yea, things that seem still smaller, may be noted, such as holding the fingers after the grasp of friendly recognition; fondling with dogs, cats, and other animal pets ("without are dogs," etc.); looking at and contemplating half nude pictures; reading stories of crim. con., and unnecessary conversation thereon. Yea, the truly earnest soul will take the Christ stand, rejecting all partial affections of natural kindred (since now you have a better), husband, wife, children, father, mother, brother, sister, uncle, aunt, cousin, or what not. If, since you have chosen the spiritual relation, they will not come with you, let them have the natural; being "joined to their idols, let them alone." All these, and such like things, precipitate the vital forces downward, and strengthen the animal nature—yea, "cause the animal nature to tread out the life of the spiritual nature, and lower man to the beast, and this is sin." As the old saying is, they "make Jordan a hard road to travel." But let no discouragements come over your spirits, or weaken your resolutions, for complete victory is within your grasp. These are the words of experience. The maxim is true, "Whatever can be diminished, can be destroyed." Only keep up the diminishing process, and the end, to your great joy, will surely come, when you will fully realize the truth of Pope's beautiful picture:

"Happy the blameless vestal's lot,
The world forgetting, by the world forgot;
Eternal sunshine of the spotless mind,
Each prayer accepted, and each wish resigned.
Labor and rest, that equal periods keep;
Obedient slumbers that can wake or weep;
Desires composed, affections ever even;
Tears that delight, and sighs that waft to heaven.
Grace shines around them with serenest beams,
And whispering angels paint their golden dreams."

Extend the Truth.

BY S. G. HURLBUT.

We will premise the necessity of some definite and concerted action for the spreading of the doctrine of Believers. Ignorance is the great barrier to its reception by those prepared for it. Whatever will enlighten the minds of the people, helps the spread of Shakerism. There is now not one in a thousand that knows even theoretically anything about what constitutes the difference between Shakers and the rest of Christian professors. We aim to live a life of purity—absolute purity—free from sin and all evil. This is the ideal Christian life, and had we the capabilities of an archangel, and the voice of Gabriel's trumpet, we might tell all of earth's inhabitants, at once, that there was something to do besides buy and sell, to get gain, marry, and build up selfishness, and run riot over the rights of each other, the strong oppressing the weak, and they in turn cursing their oppressors. In the absence of these powers, we will content ourselves with writing the truth as sharp as possible, and send it forth on its errand of mercy. If it executes judgment, we will not sorrow; truth will harm no good.

Our needs, as an organized body of Christian Believers, at present, is increased facilities for giving our peculiar views to the world. There is an unprecedented call from all quarters of the globe for more light on the very subjects that, of all others, Believers feel themselves in advance of all other people, viz.: how to live pure lives, and enjoy the social relations between the sexes at the same time. How can we do this better than by doubling the size of our missionary sheet, THE SHAKER, trebling our efforts to fill it with well worn, bright truths, and then quadrupling our efforts to spread it to all who would appreciate or pay for it? If there is a better way than this, let us have it. "The best way is as good as any." We have the greatest good revealed to us of any mortals that we know of. It is our duty to spread it "in all the ways we can." It seems fitting that from the multitude of home blessings we spare a portion to the needy and honest seekers outside of our community. They ask not the bread that perishes, but the truth; and they expect it, and reasonably, too, of us.

Shakerism.

Extract from "Hints towards Reform," by HORACE GREELEY.

With the Shakers, so nick-named, I have some personal acquaintance, and I am not ashamed to own that I have been instructed and cheered by them. They have never been fairly appreciated by the world. Their utter condemnation of marriage and of individual property,* the grotesque ceremonies of Divine worship, and their incessant declamation against all departures from celibacy as impure and sinful, have repelled and disgusted nearly all who are not of their own body. But, might not a more expansive philosophy, a more liberal culture, discover in these very excesses a moral worthy of the gravest attention?

Are our relations as men and women so universally pure and exalted that we may rightly despise those who, unable to separate the palpable evil from the latent good, reject both together? Is exclusive property so beneficent a feature in our social order, as practically exemplified around us, that we may fairly stigmatize those who, not needing its incitements to thrift or industry, see fit to decline them?

The peculiarities of Shaker worship I readily abandon to the ridicule of the caviller, only wishing that theirs were the only absurdities committed in attempting to honor our Father in Heaven, and that no religious errors more popular and enduring than theirs were worse than simply ridiculous.

* This is a gross mistake on the part of a large majority; we never condemned either. G. A. L.

When all that may be said against these simple-minded ascetics has been freely admitted, there is yet left enough in their character and history to challenge our admiration.

They present the sublime and hope-inspiring spectacle of a community founded and built up on the conquest of the most inexorable appetites; lust, avarice, ambition, revenge—these are not merely discountenanced by the social economy of the Shakers, but this economy is based on their entire crucifixion. Nor can I see how any man can rationally conclude, as some have nevertheless asserted, that all this show of subduing the appetites is hypocrisy and a delusion. I can conceive no earthly motive for practicing so much outward self-denial, at so great inconvenience, and with no hope of honor, or popularity, but a certainty of the reverse, if not based on obedience to an inward conviction.

The uncharitable theory supposes a refinement of absurdity and self-annoyance which never yet possessed for any period the brain of any sane man, much less of a whole community for ages.

Let us, then, profit by the lessons which these enthusiasts read us, while disarding their unpardonable errors. Let us remember that they have solved for us the problem of the possibility, the practicability, of a social condition from which the twin curses, pauperism and servitude, shall be utterly banished. They have shown how pleasant may be the labors, how abundant the comforts, of a community wherein no man aspires to be lord over his brethren, no man grasps for himself, but each is animated by a spirit of devotion to the common good.

When I have stood among the quiet homes of this unaspiring, unpoetical people, and marked how they have steadily, surely, advanced from abject poverty to amplest competence; when I have observed how their patient but never excessive toil has transformed rugged barrenness into smiling fertility and beauty, how could I refrain from thinking lightly of that blind dogmatism which asserts the impossibility of inducing men to labor except for their own selfish gratification, and affirms the necessity of the stimulus of personal acquisition to save mankind from sinking back into the darkness and destitution of barbarism?

Real Christianity versus Profession.

"There is one argument in favor of Christianity, which I could never reason away," said a young man who was trying to be an infidel, and could not, "and that was the consistent, godly conduct of my own father." To which any bystander might have replied: "There is one argument against Christianity, which I could never reason away, and that is the inconsistent, ungodly walk of a majority who call themselves Christians. These men and women are fathers and mothers in our own neighborhood, and are asking all to become Christians, which means a profession of something which grants an indulgence to its possessors to do that which should make humanity blush."

If to be a Christian means to follow the example of those who monopolize that title, I, too, must look in another direction. And if to be a Christian means to be good, I will try to be good, without making confederates of a set of hypocrites.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

Communism.

BY WATSON ANDREWS.

The idea of communistic life seems to have been entertained by men in very early times. Instances are not wanting, even before the advent of our Saviour, of communities established upon this principle. People, in all time, seem to have been aware that there is not only a disposition, but a necessity in man's nature leading him to hibernate; to congregate into communities, and live in as close a relation as the nature of his circumstances would permit. In obedience to this law, men have endeavored in various ways, and at various times, during their history, to establish communities, wherein all the members should fare and share alike; having common interests, tables, and privileges generally, varied only by the tastes, condition and capabilities of the individual. And although there has been no lack of talent, of means, nor of good intentions engaged in these enterprises, they have, for the most part, signally failed. And the cause of these failures is always the same old story—disagreement, antagonisms among the members; a preference for self and family connections in the individual.

Nature, first of all, must needs provide for the reproduction, care and culture of the race, and the way she has chosen to effect this, was by endowing man and woman with the parental instincts; an unlimited partiality for their own offspring. Without this, the race could not have survived a day; and with it, there was necessitated private families, private property, and private residences. Hence all attempts to maintain community of interest and of residence, while retaining the family relation must ever fail; for it is no less than attempting to do away with an effect, while continuing the cause.

The human race depends for its existence upon the family relation; and the family relation, as we have seen, depends upon isolation of interests and of residence for its existence. Likewise, the human race depends for its happiness upon congregation—the community relation; and this equally depends for its completeness and permanent existence upon identity of interests and residence, and both phases of human life are alike called for by the nature of things.

The family relation, therefore, is a great primal necessity; perverted though it is, yet it is a fundamental necessity nevertheless; the seed-field of the human race. It antedates the birth of the race; it produced, and it sustains the race; and the last echoes of its knell will be heard only by the last of the race.

The communistic relation also is a great necessity; a kindred necessity, of even more importance. And although not primal, it is final, and completes what the other begins; being the harvest-field of the human race.

The necessary self-love of the one, with its consequent antagonisms, and the equally necessary social-love of the other, with its consequent harmony, are alike but parts of the Divine economy in the affairs of men, for growing and harvesting a crop of human souls divine. And "the husbandman that sowed the seed is the Son of man, the field is the world, and the reapers are the angels." In the first, self-preservation is the standard of excellence; in the last, self-abnegation. In the first, except a man provide for his own household, he is said to be worse than an infidel; and in the last, if he do not "forsake and hate" his own household, he is an infidel. Beside these, there is no true way for men and women to live upon this planet; all others are but these in incipency or decay, presaging or recalling normal, human society.

The family relation requires that a man be governed by the selfish sentiments; an almost exclusive care for himself and family. Directly or indirectly, whatever he plans or executes, has for its object the support and comfort of his own household. He contributes, it may be, to the support of the state; to liberal institutions and various public enterprises; but it all means only this: that his nature prompts him (and very properly) to provide for his own in preference to another's. He gives in charity where he can, without depriving his own, not otherwise; self must have the preference, or the race would speedily become extinct. And this is by no means the result of calculation mainly; but it has its source in man's original nature—in the necessities of the case.

The true communistic relation, on the contrary, requires that a man be governed by the liberal sentiments—an almost exclusive care for his fellow man. Whatever he engages in has for its object the well-being and happiness of his fellows; for he has learned that the way to be happy is to make others happy. And the only way to do this permanently, is to make a full sacrifice of all selfish considerations; all natural, partial, private relations and possessions—"father, mother, brother, sister, wife, children, houses and lands; yea and his own (peculiarities of) life also."

Retaining a preference for any of these, proves a rock to the voyager in communism, and a rock upon which, sooner or later, he is sure to split. For the least thing partaking of the nature of possession, possesses the nature of antagonism, and antagonism and harmony are incompatible; and harmony is the cement of society, without which it speedily falls in pieces. No matter what the society, whether savage, civilized or Christian, there must needs be a common bond of union; a universally pervading element, in which all interests centre, and toward which all aspirations point, as the needle to the pole, in order to have that degree of harmony which creates, and which alone sustains, society.

In natural, generative society, this harmonial bond is the reproductive instincts (erroneously called love), culminating in the family relation, with its "trouble in the flesh"—its care, its anxieties, its fears and its sorrows. Antagonistic in its nature, and limited in duration, its pleasures are necessarily limited, and speedily pass away.

In spiritual, regenerative society, this harmonious bond is love—love to God supreme, and neighbor as self; culminating in the communistic relation, with its freedom from "trouble in the flesh"—the cares, the anxieties, the fears and the sorrows of the family relation. Harmonious in its nature, and continuous in duration, its pleasures are necessarily unlimited and never pass away. For, having reference mainly to the spiritual of man's life, which is eternal in its nature, the true religious communistic relation is equally eternal;—a life—habits of thought and of social intercourse which time cannot affect, and which death does but sever from whatever of annoyance things of time occasioned. Instead of stripping the soul of its treasures, death does but place it in the full enjoyment of all that constituted its happiness while on the earth. And this is eternal life, the voluntary relinquishment of all that death can take from the soul; and the formation of tastes and habits, while in time, which will eternally endure, and in the exercise of which souls are forever increasing in wisdom, in purity and in happiness.

And as fast as men progress to the condition of understanding these great truths—of comprehending the grand system of nature—of God, with regard to man; that it necessarily embraces a harvest as well as a seed-time, a regenerative as well as a generative dispensation; that these two states are necessarily of an exactly opposite character, inasmuch as the one is a purely natural state, indispensable in the development of natural beings, and the other a purely spiritual state, equally indispensable in the development of spiritual beings; that the ripening of the spiritual depends upon the decay of the natural, as really as the ripening of the grain depends upon the decay of the stalk; and therefore that what is pleasurable in the one is painful in the other; what is life to the one is death to the other, and vice versa;—so fast will they comprehend that all pertaining to the natural, generative order, either in this mode of existence or any other, must be stripped off from the immortal mind of man, as the chaff from the grain, before he can become capable of those complete soul-blendings with the Divine Source and his fellow man, which alone produce the harmony, and ensure the happiness of heaven.

Wait no Longer.

BY ANNA ERVIN.

"Shall we wait and wait forever,
Still procrastination reeling,
Self-exertion trusting never,
Always dreaming, never doing?"

Truth claims limitless dominion,
Ease and pleasure, what are they?
There are souls well worth the winning,
Who must live through endless day.

Souls there are that long have slumbered,
Great in heart, and strong in hand;
Awake, awake, rise unnumbered,
And scatter truth throughout the land.

"Wait no longer! Hope, faith, labor,"
Bear our spirits to the prize;
Let us give unto our neighbor
What has made us heaven-wise.

What wait we for? 'Tis for thy blessing,
O God of love, of life, and power!
Give us zeal to aid progression,
And around us light to shower.

Daniel and John.—No. 2.

BY F. W. E.

John saw (by symbols) the four great dispensations, which extend from the beginning to the end of human history.

Daniel saw (by symbols) four great kingdoms, beginning in his own times, and running parallel with John's vision to the end.

Daniel was a subordinate, John a universal prophet. John was "more than a prophet;" far beyond even John the Baptist.

A prophet was not, necessarily, any better, personally, than the people to whom he prophesied; even as a spiritual medium is so physiologically, not necessarily any better, as being either morally or religiously superior to the body of Spiritualists.

But John the Baptist preached repentance, in addition to foretelling future events; and John the Revelator, in his private life, walked closely in the footsteps of his spiritual guide and leader, Jesus. He was not only a prophet, but a good man, which is being more than a mere prophet, like Balaam, and many others, who were beautiful Christ Prophets, but who did not reduce to practice the principles they set forth, that would finally redeem humanity.

Daniel saw a lion, a bear, a leopard, and a complex beast that had ten horns. These were the Babylonia, the Medo-Persia, the Greek, and the Roman empires. The fourth beast, or system, is represented as "dreadful and terrible, strong exceedingly. It had great iron teeth, and it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it." This was the Roman, and is graphically described. "It was diverse from all the beasts, or systems, that were before it, and had ten horns." In truth, the other systems were merged in it; so that all the elements of preceding human governments were incorporated therein. The ten horns, or powers, represented Republicanism, which was gradually rising and predominating over every other form of governmental polity; the antithesis of despotism or monarchy—the one-man power—being a subdivision of power among the many men.

This fourth beast gradually supplanted despotisms, monarchies and aristocracies, and destroyed them.

Again. In the midst of this system came up a little horn, or power, before which there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots. "In it were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things,"—the Papal power. The Babylonia, the Medo-Persia, and Greek systems were subdued into one universal government—the Roman.

Pagan Rome built the Partheon, a house for the gods and goddesses of all nations; thus blending them together in one grand system of theogony. She offered to put a statue of Jesus with the rest; but the iconoclastic Christians waged a war of words against all other deities but their own Trinity; and "the little horn" prevailed over all other civil governments upon the earth.

But Daniel gives us the history of the rise of still another, and more interior power—"a little stone cut out of the mountain without hands." "I beheld till the thrones"—despotisms and monarchies—"were cast down, and the ancient of days did sit. A fiery stream issued and came forth before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened." Memory is the book; the memory of each individual—his and her history. It was not by adulation and praise, but by their lives, the product of their free-agency, that these souls ministered to and stood before the Ancient of Days. It was human history, the judgment day, in which the errors of each individual will be illuminated by the light of God's countenance, by the presentation of the abstract principles of right, as seen in the judgment upon human history, or accumulated human experience, as they exist in the Christ element, into which all the prophets, at the time of their prophesying, were baptized.

This judgment scene is paralleled in John's vision, thus: "And I saw a great white throne"—Shaker Order—"and her that sat on it, from whose face the (old) earth and the heaven"—the theologies of Babylon—"fled away; and there was no place for them" in the new spiritual, or Shaker Order. "And I saw the dead, small and great," in the spiritual world, "stand before God; and the books were opened"—memories of their past histories; "and another book was opened, which is the book of life;" because it is the memory of their present and future obedience to the testimony of Jesus, the principles and orders of the new creation. "And the dead," who had had the everlasting Gospel preached unto them, "that they might be judged according to men in the flesh," "were judged out of those things that were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea—world—gave up the dead that were in it; and death and hell," not being eternal, "delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man" (and woman) "according to their works; and death and hell," being mortal, "were cast into the lake of fire," and destroyed. "This is the second death;" being the death of death itself; the destroyer is destroyed: he that leadeth into captivity is gone into captivity; and there remaineth life eternal.

See the Shaker Order, under the title of New Jerusalem, still more minutely described in Rev. xxi.

"Because of the voice of the great words which the little horn spake, I beheld till the fourth beast was slain and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame." This fourth beast, or man-Republicanism, will be destroyed by the burning fire of truth, and a system of dual or true Republicanism will be substituted therefor, in which the male and female elements will be equally represented in the executive, and will form the more interior order of the senate, with the house of representatives as an external covering; and having Divine revelation, conjoined to human experience, as the soul of the whole governmental system.

"As concerning the rest of the beasts, or systems, they had their dominion taken away; yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time." What could better portray the gradual supplanting of one system by another, whether civil or ecclesiastical?

DUPLICATE VISION.

The same idens, represented to Daniel under different imagery. "The four winds of heaven striving upon the great sea" of humanity, is a beautiful use of the natural to convey spiritual conceptions. "The four beasts coming up from the sea, each diverse, as they follow in the grand procession of empires, is sublime symbolizing of truthful history then in the future, now actualized and actualizing.

The great image: head of gold—Babylon; breast and arms of silver—Medo-Persia; belly and thighs of brass—Greece; legs of iron—Imperial Rome; feet and ten toes of iron and clay—man-Republicanism again.

All the systems blended together in one history; then comes "the little stone cut without hands, which becomes a great mountain, filling the earth"—the Christ revelation. It smites the image upon its feet—in the latter days; and the iron, clay, brass, silver and gold are all broken in pieces together, not annihilated; for in Babylon—mixture—they all still exist, and nullify each other. The great image, and the four beasts, are duplicated history of male governments, which the revelation of the Mother element in deity and in humanity will remove, displace; and "no place will be found for them." For the dual natural civil government, and the dual spiritual religious government "will fill the whole earth." This will be the Millennial period, the culmination of all prophecy.

"I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man"—a female—"come with the clouds of heaven"—Shaker communities—"and came to the Ancient of Days; and they brought her near before him; and there was given her dominion and glory, and a kingdom"—the kingdom of heaven—"that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve her. Her dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and her kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." This is the appearing of the Christ spirit in the female humanity, described by the Christ prophet, David, as "the King's daughter, who was to forget her own people, and her father's house, that she might become the mother of spiritual offspring, whom she might make princes (and princesses) in all the earth;" or, as the Christ prophet, John, expresses it, "kings and priests unto God and the Lamb," who should administer the resurrection to the countless myriads of souls who had passed from earth, and were still in the generative order, in the spirit world.

Well might the Spirit say (through David),

"I will make thy name to be remembered in (or by) all generations. Therefore shall the people praise thee forever and ever."

John says (Rev. 14: 14), "I looked, and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sat like unto the Son of man, having on her head a golden crown, and in her hand a sharp sickle." Nothing so like the Son of man as the Daughter of man. "An angel cried to her that sat upon the cloud"—Ann Lee—"Thrust in thy sickle, and reap; for the harvest of the earth is ripe. And she thrust in her sickle, and the earth was reaped."

Behold the days in which we live, and the great "winepress of the wrath of God" against lust and war (which grows out of it) will be trodden without (or outside) the holy city—the spiritual Order—being in the natural order itself, which will execute judgment upon its own members; and "blood will come out of the winepress, even unto the horses' bridles"—the guides and rulers of the Order. For the whole natural order, civil and ecclesiastical, is "turned to blood." The rulers and their people are alike baptized into the spirit of murder; for there is no place, nor people, excepting the Shakers, exempt therefrom; as was shown in the late civil war.

And the Shaker Order—"the little stone"—"the kingdom of heaven," for the coming of which, humanity have all prayed, although as yet in only its mustard-seed state, is assuredly destined to become "a great tree," among whose branches the birds of heaven—the religious, spiritually-minded—can find food and shelter; and beneath whose shade—the civil government—the beasts of earth—the natural or earthly-minded—can rest in peace, and "none to make them afraid." Thus constituting new heavens and a new earth, wherein will dwell, in place of oppression, war and bloodshed, peace and plenty, in universal righteousness.

Sketches of Shaker Life.—No. 1.

We very agreeably comply with an urgent demand to know the inner life of the Shakers, when we begin these "Sketches," and give notice of their continuance. We are often asked: "Are you happy?" "How do you amuse yourselves?" "Does your business engross your whole attention?" These are a few from a multitude of questions constantly recurring. Ere we conclude these "Sketches" you will know. We were one of a happy party of four that took the early Boston and Albany train for Canaan, N. Y., being invited to a

SOCIAL GATHERING,

under the auspices of the Novitiate Order of Mt. Lebanon. Arriving at the Canaan Families not far from 8 o'clock A.M., we leaped from the carriage with hungry stomachs, but with merry hearts, received by Sister Louisa Green and others. Breakfast was waiting for us, prepared by our Sister Marcia, and this thirty miles from home! We again entered the carriage, and were conveyed to Mt. Canaan, only 150 perches from the buildings—a spot made by nature to greet the children of Grace—where, upon our arrival, nearly fifty voices, singing in harmony, opened a welcome hymn, while, from all around, beginning with the Elders, and extending to the multitude, greetings of welcome met our eyes, ears and feeling, while the trees and undergrowth seemed to lend their assistance to the mountain breezes, to accord with the hundreds of voices in the jubilee of welcome. The school children had remembered us, for their busy fingers had worked upon a wire net-work, with tiny white flowers, the letters in good Roman—WELCOME!

A large awning, on the top of the hill, was sufficient covering for all, in case of a storm—which, however, they never have needed for this, as the best of weather has annually cheered the spot for twelve years, by some arrangement Elder Frederick claims to have made with "Old Probabilities." Seated 'neath the monstrous tent, a set of "Resolutions" were in order; their tenor being, that each one assembling there, should love every other body present! Of course, so easy a rule was adopted unanimously. A dialogue followed, spoken by eight of the children, upon "Useful Knowledge," which was well arranged and nicely spoken, closing with a pretty song.

Individual contributions or essays, prepared for the occasion, were next in order, and these gave evidence of having been filled with the results of good mental culture, and deep, religious feelings. Again the choir sung "Jerusalem" in harmony, and with such spirit as to remind one of a thorough-going Methodist after his baptism by Shakerism!

Now a very agreeable circumstance was enacted: Six or eight young sisters spoke for half an hour or more, a dialogue of their own composition, upon "The Fundamental Principles of Shakerism." Its composition and delivery were worthy of any institution of learning, and contained so much information that is worthily and eagerly sought for by many, that we urged its publication.

Next, we had an address by Elder F. W. Evans, upon "Active Shakerism;" and by Eldress Antoinette, upon the "Purpose and Value of this Jubilee;" then a few remarks by the writer, upon "The Honor due Modern Saints;" when recess and refreshments followed; then lemon juice and frozen cream mingled very agreeably with our mortality. Soon, a call to dinner: and now, oh, ye epicures, attention! ye who dream that meals without meats are without pleasure or profit, look over the tables!

The tables could not groan, or they would, beneath the weight of fruits, flowers, vegetables, eustards; all the products of the dairy, and these conjoined to the cereal class. Here was "the staff of life," unrobbed of its muscle-making bran, which is so basely displaced by violence to the animal creation, and with such poor returns, by the yet uncivilized barbarities of our age! Here was a table that would have adorned any Eden ever thought of; and while we joyed in its health-giving pleasures, the flocks and the herds, whose dead carcasses would have disgraced the occasion, were frolicking in the fields, praising God with us!

Next followed a very agreeable chit-chat, which amounted to a real love-feast, and this might have continued ad infinitum, had not a call to the tent notified all that our time of departure had arrived.

Now we received love; and now we realized more than ever, that hosts of the invisible world were enjoying with us the beauties of the occasion. A beautiful farewell song was rendered for us, as our carriage arrived to convey us back to the depot; and here ended the loveliest six hours of our existence. And as we left the grounds, we responded in our hearts: Farewell, dear, loving souls! You whom the world at large look upon as robbed of all comfort, you, alone, are the true comfort-takers; for, as you shake from your souls the bondage of sin and selfishness, all heaven flows in upon you. Yours is already a life eternal; "a thing of beauty, a joy forever." All was concert, all was love; and here was a Shaker Picnic—a Social Gathering—where souls, whose lives are thoroughly virginal, were giving and receiving an affectionate love, unequaled by anything else in the world. True Shakers are happy. One place on earth, thank God, can that, which has been said to exist only in the dictionary—"happiness"—be found and continually enjoyed; and this place is in a Shaker life, at a Social Gathering, with F. W. Evans, Levi Shaw, Antoinette Doolittle and Olive Holden as its living heads—who are, most truly, "the servants of all" their people. We never expect to be worthy of a second invitation; but whoso is the guest, let him or her "proclaim it upon the house-top." *

Angel Messenger of Peace.

BY OLIVE STEBBINS.

Fly, fly through the heavens, thou Gospel proclaimer,
To earth's needy children, I earnestly pray;
For truth and salvation will greet God's creation,
O, may they thy warning and precepts obey.

Fly, fly through the heavens, thou angel of mercy,
Proclaim the glad tidings of "peace and good will;"
To cultivate earth, use your warlike utensils,
That it may bring forth, and your granaries fill.

Let news from Mount Zion waken every sleeper,
To rise from their slumbers, and hail the glad sound,
For now is salvation from war's desolation,
Where righteousness reigns, and rich blessings are found.

For all wars will cease where the Gospel is planted,
Christ's mission was "peace and good will" unto man;

The same voice to-day, in this last visitation,
Since it is revealed through our good Mother Ann.

We now have a warfare, not with carnal weapons,
The war we engage in begins at the gate;
The sword points within us, the pure testimony,
Our own life of sin we must certainly hate.

All sinners must bow to the Lord in his temple,
Before his true witness their deeds bring to light,
Or they cannot enter this beautiful city,
Where purity reigns as a standard of right.

O come, all ye weary and ye heavy laden,
To Mount Zion's borders, where sweet rest is found;
O come to the feast, is the kind invitation,
O come and be saved on God's holy ground.

Says Dr. Holley:—"No faith is more easily misunderstood and misrepresented than that of the Shakers. The metaphysical explanation of it is so different from popular apprehension, that great pains and some talent are necessary in conducting a moral analysis, to do justice to this remarkable sect."

Reminiscences.

BY D. A. BUCKINGHAM.

HONESTY THE BEST POLICY.

It was the labor of Mother Ann and the first Elders to impress upon the minds of their immediate successors, or members of the then Shaker fraternity, the importance of true honesty and just dealing, one with another, and with all mankind. They were so strenuous on this subject, that they thought it wrong to take even the amount of a pin of that which did not belong to them personally, in any dishonest way. If necessity pressed any one to take or use that which belonged to or was under the care of another (in their absence), it was to be returned to its place immediately after using, and an acknowledgment rendered, or restitution made or offered to the owner or caretaker, as soon thereafter as consistent. Special care was taken to avoid all grievances and all wrangling; knowing that small errors led to greater ones, as does a "little leaven leaven the whole lump," or as the "little foxes spoil the vines." This agrees with the testimony of Jesus, that, "Whosoever shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven." Or, according to the Apostle James, that, "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all."

Thus the necessity of being strictly honest, dealing justly, walking uprightly, in all places and cases. To some persons it may appear like folly to be thus mindful in small matters. But in the observance or non-observance of minor duties or things, we testify to each other, and to all around us, the principle by which we are governed—whether by the true spirit of honesty, or by the spirit of selfishness and double-dealing.

In a fraternity like ours, where all things are held in common, and no one in truth and reality calleth anything, of all he possesses, his own, how important it is to closely adhere to the fundamental principles and rules by which our first founders were guided and governed. There is a just and proper way of doing things, and of dealing one with another. Let us have the right. We read that "God's house is a house of order, and not of confusion." So each and every person, with each and every thing, make up the consecrated whole—the common Brotherhood; all of which—though not mine nor thine—is yet under the special care and superintendence of some individual or individuals, and is ours.

Would it not be well for the present and rising generation of believers in Christ's second appearing, to compare themselves with the above, and see how nearly they carry out the principles inculcated by our first founders?

The Modern Baptist and Christ.

The much-abused and neglected Swedenborg stock is rapidly rising in the theological market. A writer in the Golden Age thinks the whole tendency of religious thought, for thirty years, has been in this direction. Now, let it be understood, that Swedenborg was the angel of Spiritualism, the forerunner, or John Baptist, of Mother Ann; that he did declare, "the Lord is preparing at this time, a new heaven, of such as look to him in their lives." Let the good work proceed. The body of Christendom is being found and acknowledged in the labors of Swedenborg; the soul of Christianity will inevitably appear in the life-labors of those who practice the principles inaugurated by one, ANN LEE. We call especial attention to the leader in March number of THE SHAKER, Vol. I, upon this subject. *

Correspondence.

The following letter was written by a Shaker sister to a lady in Mt. Holly, N. J. As it contains answers to ever-recurring questions, we place it before the readers of THE SHAKER with pleasure; and shall give other letters from the same pen to the same individual, as space will permit us: *

"DEAR SISTER MARY:—We feel it a duty to 'be ready always to give an answer to every one that asketh a reason of the hope that is in us.' But I am no theologian, and cannot pretend to answer your questions in orthodox style, but will endeavor to give you true and simple answers according to my own experience, feelings and reflections. You ask, 'What were the reasons these good men and women had for retiring from the busy world and leading the life they do?' No other reason or motive than a purely religious one—an intense desire to live pure and spotless lives—in a word, a desire to become true Christians—true followers of Jesus. Not merely outward followers, but to gain and possess his inner life—his spirit. 'If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of His.' Rom. 8: 9. And if we have His spirit it will be manifest in us by our 'walking even as he walked.' I John 2: 6. You next ask: 'What reasons do you give for dissolving the ties of husband and wife, parent and child—the ties which we consider, of all others, the most binding?' Perhaps you will understand me as thoroughly as by any other answer I could give, were I to say, we dissolve those ties for similar reasons, that a young man 'forsakes father and mother and joins himself to a wife.' He has outgrown his childish and boyish affections and ties, and looks upon the married relation as a higher enjoyment and happier life. So the Christian, when he becomes 'wedded' to Christ—when he gets a taste of divine, unselfish love—when he feels that same sacred and holy tie of love to Christ in his true members—in his brethren and sisters in Christ—he is weaned from all partial, sensual and lower loves, and gives his whole heart and all his faculties to the building up and support of this holy relation and institution. And who can doubt that this divine, spiritual life of Christian love is infinitely higher, holier and happier than the sensual life of the world, with all its comparatively low ties and relationships? If the Christian institution has no ties, no loves, no relationships nor enjoyments which equal those natural ties and relations of the world, as professing Christians testify, what can it do for the world? How make them happier or better? And with all reverence I would

CIRCULAR LETTER.

MOUNT LEBANON, COLUMBIA CO., N. Y., JAN. 20, 1887.

Dearlly Beloved Brethren and Sisters.

Ever interested in the great and Noble Cause whereunto we are called — the salvation and redemption of souls from the sins and corruptions of a worldly life. — We again address you in behalf of our only circulating publication, the “Manifesto.” Owing to the delinquency of some families and societies in forwarding their quota of assessment to the Publisher, it is found impracticable to continue its publication without a reformation in this matter. — Some appear to have the idea that the object of publishing the paper is for Believers only, therefore, such measure what they suppose they should pay for its publication, by the number of copies they choose to take in their families, this is a mistaken idea of the object of the paper, which is twofold: 1st, As a missionary to the world, 2nd, As an educator and union bond among Believers. For the past two years we have been sending out 1,500 copies to the various reading rooms and public Libraries in the United States, and some to Canada and Europe. The enterprise has not been fruitless, much good has been wrought. Copies not needed at home should be sent abroad, or left in the publisher’s office for that purpose. The Gospel has not been given to us for ourselves only, but as said Mother Ann: “We are called in relation to all the souls of men.” But if we neither circulate our testimony by publications, nor by sending out living missionaries, are we not living to ourselves only? — It is not a little instructive relative to the worldly effect of riches, that some families and societies among the most wealthy of any among Believers (and of this class only) appear to feel that they are taxed too much, and more than they can afford for the Gospel Cause, and these are the only delinquents to remit. Some think they are taxed too highly in proportion to others. But the Ministry of New Lebanon solicited an honest report from each society, of its wealth, and took special pains to ascertain the basis upon which such report was made; then, from said reports, divided the tax pro rata. And, among the complainers, as all complain alike, we think the allotments of assessments was as near right and just as it could be made. New Lebanon, however, though not the wealthiest society, was taxed the most.

But, is it right to put our light under a bushel, fold our arms, and spiritually, socially and supinely lie down to die? The society of New Lebanon, and all east thereof, feel we ought to sustain the paper; and it is proposed to try if the paper can be printed cheaper; and to this end try a tax of two thirds the last assessment. By inquiry in Boston, we find it cannot be printed for less. If all would promptly pay this amount, it would raise $1,000.00; and with this amount the effort would be made, on trial, to continue the publication of the paper. — Do all our friends unite with this arrangement? And, if so, will you promptly remit this amount? A reply at once is essentially necessary, or the paper cannot be printed the present year. Please be prompt, as there is not time to lose. If this arrangement is adopted, those who have this year paid their full former quota, will be credited one third for their next year’s tax.

MINISTRY OF NEW LEBANON,

ask: Why should Jesus expect that men and women would forsake fathers, mothers, wives and children, houses and lands for His sake, and in order to become His disciples, as he required, unless His religion and its relationships would afford them higher enjoyments? Indeed, our Saviour did promise 'a hundred fold' of gospel relations in exchange for the natural relations of the world, which He required them to forsake. This increased and spiritual relationship is the promised inheritance of Christ's true followers; and to us this promise is fulfilled. The inworking of the spirit of Christ ultimately develops this high and holy state of the affections, and those who hear its still, small voice and follow it diligently will surely be led in the right way; and this, dear sister, is my prayer in regard to you.

"It is according to the spirit and practice of the world to propagate its species; but the spirit and work of Christ and of Christians, who are one with him, is to save those that are propagated. And they have business enough of their own, without meddling with that of the world, out of which they are called and chosen. 'Come ye out from among them.' 'I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you,' saith the Saviour to His followers. So, then, as it is the law of the first Adam, and the propagating order to 'forsake father and mother and cleave to the wife,' it is the law of Christ and His order or institution, to 'forsake father and mother, wife and children,' 'ALL' for Christ's sake and the Gospel. Luke 14: 26, etc. Of course, if any of these relations choose to go with the Christian into the higher spiritual life of Christian love, they will be embraced in that impartial love on equal terms with others. The Gospel is an expansion of love, not requiring us to love our natural relations less, but to love others more, and all on a different and higher principle. It is only such as hate and reject Christ that are to be forsaken, and even they are still to be loved and prayed for. We can only know the spirit of Jesus by His teaching and example, till the same spirit takes its abode in us and becomes a saving power. On a certain occasion, Jesus was teaching an assembly, mostly of his disciples, and some one informed him that his mother and brothers stood without, desiring to see him. He did not do as the spirit of the world would have dictated; he illustrated his teachings by his example. He asked, 'Who is my mother? and who are my brethren?' and he stretched forth his hand toward HIS DISCIPLES, and said: 'Behold my mother and my brethren! Whosoever doeth the will of my Father in Heaven, the same is my mother, sister and brother.' Mat. 12: 48, etc. Thus He rejected all mere fleshly ties, and gave His disciples a practical lesson to do the same. He owned no parental relations except those of a spiritual nature. With him the mere fleshly relations of the world were nothing; those of the kingdom of God everything. On another occasion, Jesus assured His disciples, 'that there is no man that has left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, for the kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting.' Luke 18: 29. In Mark, 10: 30, the things to be received and enjoyed in this present life, instead of those forsaken, are more particularly specified. 'Houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands.' Now, as all the names of relations here mentioned as being restored are the names of spiritual relations, we must see that 'wife,' though mentioned among those to be forsaken, is not named among those to be restored, because it is the name of a carnal or fleshly relation—a relation not known to the kingdom of Heaven or Church of God. In view of these sayings and doings of Jesus Christ, and more that might be mentioned, we think the question, 'What reason have we for dissolving the ties of husband and wife,' is the same as to ask why we have become practical Christians—real followers of Jesus Christ. We have dissolved those ties because He required it of all that would become His disciples—Luke 14: 26—because our spiritual natures demand it—because we hungered and thirsted for righteousness, and were totally dissatisfied with our own earthly, sinful, sensual lives, and because we longed for a higher, holier inner and outer life than could be found in any of the earth relations. I know it is as you say, that those natural ties 'are, of all others, the MOST BINDING.' And it is a sorrowful fact that they bind too many from entering into the more happy relations of the kingdom of God.

"You further ask what reason I can give for men and women living in celibacy. This question, I think, has been already in some measure answered, and much more might be said on the subject; but the very best reason we can give is, that Jesus, who was set as an example, that we should follow His steps, did set us this example, and encouraged us by the promise of all the blessings of earth and Heaven, of time and eternity, to follow him in this thing—to forsake wife or husband—forsake ALL for His sake and the Gospel. You add: 'Marriage was appointed by God—by it the human race is propagated.' So it was appointed by God, and so is celibacy. The first was given to the old man, Adam—the second to the New Man, Christ. Therefore Christians are required to 'put off the old man with his deeds, and put on the new man, which, according to God, is created in righteousness and true holiness.' 'The first man (Adam) is of the earth, earthy; the second man (Christ) is the Lord from Heaven; and as is the earthy, so also are they that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, so also are they that are heavenly.' See 1 Cor. 15: 47, 48, etc. That is, the followers of the first Adam are like him, and the followers of the second man (Christ) are like him. 'No man can serve two masters.' And now, sister, you say, 'Perhaps I think you should not ask such things.' But indeed I do think you should ask just such things, and as many more as you may feel an interest in asking; and if, in my broken and fragmentary way, I have satisfactorily answered you in any one point, I shall be pleased. If I have failed, do try me again. Tell me where the lack is, and I will try and do better next time.

"Truly your friend, SARAH."

What is a Celibate?

DEAR ELDER GILES B. AVERY:—On last Feb. 26, I sent a communication to THE SHAKER for insertion. It was headed, "Second Revelation of the Gospel," in which was set forth my objections to the statement, "Christ has made his second appearance in a woman—in Ann Lee," or to the kindred phrases such as "Christ's second appearance;" "He, Christ, has made his second appearance in a woman." I set forth how I was puzzled with this phraseology, when in my youth I first tried to grasp Shaker theology. In those days of my simplicity, when I had but one single idea represented by the word Christ, to wit, the man Jesus, I had not then learned the hocus pocus game that might be played with that protean term—how many changes of form, and different meanings it could be made to represent. Christ then to me represented nothing but the man Jesus, and how He could come in a woman was past my comprehension! When I came to learn the real facts of the case, the true interpretation was this: That the man Jesus had in his day revealed the true way of salvation—the Gospel; that Rerelation was ultimately lost, and after a thousand sects with as many different gospels, and through many centuries, had cried lo! here, and lo! there, proclaiming their false gospels, behold, the true Gospel, which Jesus the Christ had first revealed, was now revealed a second time, by and through a woman. So, then, it was not Jesus the Christ—the man that had come the second time, but his Gospel had been revealed a second time. This, I believe, is a fair outline of the communication above mentioned, and I close this preliminary by stating that I was not much disappointed that it was not published, nor have I the least dissatisfied feeling toward our good editor, believing that he only exercised his undoubted right. The following communication I had designed as No. 2 to the one above outlined; but as that was not accepted, I do not present this for publication, but for the consideration of our much beloved Central Ministry, and for them to dispose of as they may think proper.

There is a term which has, I think, come into vogue within the last fifteen or twenty years, which I think is very improper, and ought to be dropped, as it really misrepresents, and does not convey the idea intended. The word is celibacy, and its kindred term celibate. The first is thus defined by Worcester: "The life or state of a person unmarried, a single life." The other, as a noun, is defined: "One who adheres to, or practices celibacy; an unmarried man, a bachelor." As an adjective, this word is defined, "unmarried, single." Not one idea of virginity, continency, or even chastity in either of these definitions—nothing that implies the least restraint on licentiousness, or the libidinous instinct. In fact the "bachelors and unmarried men" of our cities are the most thorough debauchees, and in calling ourselves celibates, we rank ourselves with this class. In olden time we carefully avoided professing celibacy, and assumed to be virgins, to live virgin or continent lives. I do not object to the terms "celibate" and "celibacy" because they are of recent introduction among us, but because they really misrepresent us. For myself, I had rather be called a monk than a celibate. There are thousands of celibates throughout our country, but very few who live continently, or live in virgin purity. Those who do not so live, would do quite as well or better to take Paul's counsel: "If they cannot contain, let them marry." As one of our poets says:

"If they're in pain, and can't contain,
And will not serve the Lord, you know,
Then sure they must live in their lust,
And take their just reward, you know."

One thing is certain: the term celibate cannot be applied to Shakers distinctively, and we must have it, if at all, in common with a class whose purity of life is very questionable, or rather unquestionably impure and unchaste.

As observed above, we did not in former days use the terms celibacy and celibate, as characteristic of our lives and practice, and it was intentionally avoided. I can remember well that our good elder of the novitiate order would often correct outside inquirers, when they called the Shakers "celibates," or spoke of our living lives of "celibacy." He would give them a definition of the words, and show them that they did not characterize or distinctively apply to us. Whoever will examine our early publications, will discover that these terms were never used by our former writers. "The Kentucky Revival" was published in 1807; "The Testimony" in 1808; "The Manifesto" in 1818; "The Mil. Ch." in 1823, and "The Book of Testimonies" in 1827, besides divers smaller pamphlets, and I question whether those objectionable terms can be found in any of those works.

There is another unanswerable objection to applying the terms in question as characteristic of the Shaker society or institution. They represent the males only. The females, full one-half of the community, are ignored and unrepresented. There is not the least respect paid to "woman's rights."

Again, there is a respectable proportion of the members of these societies who are married people. They, too, are unrepresented, and a chosen few, who can properly be called celibates, represent and give name to the whole community. Is it true that all married men who come into our Society, thereby become celibates? I see in the statistics of London, 1860, they number celibates or bachelors by themselves, and make a distinct class of the widowers, confining the celibate class to single adult males who had never been married. A certain man once informed me that he was raised in the city of New York, and was apprenticed to a mechanic who carried on his trade in that city, and employed several other apprentices. It was the custom of this man to take his apprentice boys once a week to a house of prostitution, and there indulged to the full. He was a "celibate," and his apprentice, my informant, was now forty years old, and he had practiced what his master had taught him—celibacy. He was a "bachelor, a single man, a celibate!" Ay, there are thousands of such celibates to one Shaker in this wicked world of ours; and though I am willing to call them brothers, as being of the same race, yet, to go by the same name, as a religious characteristic or designation, I emphatically do object. There are divers cases outside of our Society, in which the heads of families, the husband and wife, take separate lodgings, and live strictly continent or virgin lives, and yet keep their families together, and apparently live like other people. Are they celibates, bachelors, single people? In fact we must come at last to confining the application of the term celibates to the few adult males of our community, and leave the whole sisterhood, all the married males, and all the adolescent class unrepresented; or drop the title celibate, and call ourselves by a name that will legitimately represent the whole. As it is now, our testimony to mankind should be, "Come and join us, and be bachelors, live single, and eschew marriage." And as our title does not recognize the sisterhood, we should say, "If any women choose to join us, we will give them the honorable title of 'old maids,' which is the proper correlative of 'bachelor.'" But if we cast away our inadequate and absurd title, what shall we have in its stead? There is none better than virgin. Though this is more commonly applied to females, yet there is the very best of authority for applying it to males. Jeremiah, ch. 31:13, calls young men and old virgins. One of Worcester's definitions of the word virgin is, "a male who has preserved his chastity." He refers for authority to Rev. 14:4: "These are they which are not defiled with women, for they are virgins." Not being defiled with women shows that they were males. Parkhurst, in his Lexicon, defines the Greek word for virgin [parthenos], "A person in a virgin state," and adds, "The word plainly includes both sexes." Let us then boldly assume our proper title, and honor it by our lives. Your Brother,

R. W. PELHAM.

Natural Religion.

BY F. W. EVANS.

Is religion natural, that necessitates the murder of human beings? In China, the problem of population versus faith has been solved so far as the propagative order is concerned. There, four hundred millions of human beings have been stationary and stagnant for thousands of years, kept so by the law that two things cannot exist in the same place at the same time.

Not having sufficient foreign or domestic war to check population, China has legalized child-murder by parents; and, for ages, female infants have been and are still exposed, as was Moses, in little fragile arks, on some pond, or lake, or river, as soon as born, there to perish, or be rescued, as the case may be. There is simply space for no more human beings; nor is the power revealed amongst them to dry up the great river Euphrates, the river of human, animal propagation. J. B. Bradley, formerly Consul to China, is my authority for these facts.

In India, unknown ages ago, the same conditions were met by the institution of a spiritual celibate order—Indian Shakerism; Maria Childs asserting that thousands of monasteries and nunneries flourished in that country many ages before it was visited by Roman Catholic missionaries.

No ancient highly civilized nation is known which did not possess similar institutions. Egypt had her Theraputes, and the Jews their Essenes, all down through their history to the time of Jesus, who himself was educated in that remarkable order, which so correctly portrayed American Shakerism.

As the Chinese have set their faces towards the western continent, which seems to be the reservoir for the overplus population of the world, it is only a matter of time as to how soon the same point will be reached in these United States, that China has touched so many ages in the past.

Will any form of theology that now exists in this new world meet and solve this problem, except it be American Shakerism? In other words, is there any other that is justly entitled to be termed a scientific and natural religion? it being the only system that makes provision for two orders—the natural, or propagative, and the spiritual, or resurrection; each possessing its own dual government distinct from the other, like the moon and the sun.

When, by increased knowledge of law, and obedience thereto, there shall be "no more pain, nor sorrow, nor sighing," nor premature death, the result of physical disease, and war shall be a thing of the past; when there shall be no more poor, for all shall inherit the earth, Shakerism will be the last and only hope of the race; the godly and natural agency to balance the principle of population, and to check the unnatural increase of human beings on this limited earth.

No Surrender.

Self-denial is an enforcement of Christianity. There is no such thing as compulsory Christianity—individuals need not be Christians other than of choice; but whoso makes the profession, is under bonds to use an exceeding self-denial. The restrictions of Jewish law were heavy upon that people; but their observance brought blessing, and prevented the visitation of the direful results of disobedience. Christianity is an improvement upon Judaism, or it is unworthy of any attention. The improvement consists in a direct increase of self-denial upon those habits, customs, passions, that had, previous to the introduction of Christianity, made humanity noble types of earthly, reproductive life. Counting reproduction good, under perfected Jewish law, the same of all the attending practices connected therewith; still, Christianity, in its genuineness, is better and best. The government of Christ, being paramount to the professor of Christian principles, the laws, indulgences and general life of the Jews will be departed from, and the more beautiful, heavenly life of Christ ascended unto. Man, in Christ, being "a new creature," all "old things will be done away." Perceive, however, the attempt to engraft Christianity upon Judaism: From the Apostle Paul to the latest sermons, and life of the teachers of popular, but hybrid Christianity, the harmonizing of the earthly, generative life, with the regenerative, virginal principles, may be observed as being ever attempted, but proving a failure at every attempt. A Christian ceases to be the expositor of earthly principles, having been reaped from the earth, "and the angels are the reapers." Why is Christ "the harvest man?" Will not the assertion apply with equal propriety, that Adam was "a seedsman?" Adam should replenish the earth with individuals. Christ is harvesting ripened souls, above the employment of Adam, and thus replenishing the heavens. The followers of Adam are doing the works of Adam—reproduction. The followers of Christ are being resurrected with Christ, and are progressed above the generative life up to angelic spheres. Adam and his generative followers belong to the earth, and can never go to heaven, nor heaven come to them, other than a heaven composed of earthly joys. But, convinced of the joys of the higher life, they will ripen, and be reaped from the reproductive plane; and then, what was heaven, will constitute heaven no longer. New joys, new ideas, new life will ensue, and any return to "the beggarly elements of the world" will be accompanied by pain to the soul. See, then, the two orders—both necessary—one rudimental, the other transcendental. Though related, they are antipodes, and ever will be. Whoso attempts to live in both spheres, had better first attempt the possibility of residing at both poles of the earth, at one and the same time. "An individual cannot be in two places at once," is an old truism. Therefore, said Jesus: "Who seeks to save his (generative) life, shall lose life" eternal. "But who, for my sake, loses the former, shall find the latter." We know the earthly, generative life is very dear to those not yet ripe for Christ's harvest, and to such we say, your time has not yet come to be Christians—you are not Christians; you are, unthinkingly, wearing a false name, making an untrue profession, and expecting a reward of "life everlasting," while you are sowing the seeds that invariably and inevitably produce "corruption." Your profession of Christ amounts to naught unless your life is as was Christ's! Your profession savors rather of condemnation than any salvation. Better, far more honorable, to renounce the name of Christian, until your whole life comports with Christ's. Living like a Jew or a heathen, and then expecting a reward like Christ's! Supreme folly. "Behold I come quickly, to give to every one according as their lives shall be!" Amen.

We know the masses are not yet ready for these truths; some are, and more, in this enlightened age, ought to be. We hope our proclamation of them will prepare others. Men plead with us, to permit more license of earthly affections and lusts; to grant indulgence to their fleshly natures, if only in small degree. They tell us how numerous we should become, that "all men would believe on us;" they would flatter us, by making us believe that our long training in the school of virginity the better fits us for reproduction than any others. They would frighten us, by repeating to us that we are declining in numbers, with no prospect of replenishing, unless we "come down from that cross;" they argue, without tire, that we can be just as good Christians, and save to ourselves an abundance of earthly pleasure. To all of which we say: We testify of the the two Orders and their Leaders, "Choose ye this day which you will serve." There is "NO SURRENDER!" on our banners; and from this standard we will never recede. "Mankind may cry Peace, peace, but there is no peace;" our numbers may dwindle to the last individual; yet he, passing to "the better land," will, in his last act, raise the standard still higher, upon which is ineffaceably written: "NO SURRENDER!" The world may plead, flatter, frown, persecute and destroy us, but with the life of Christ as our example, with the testimony of Jesus and Ann as our Covenant, we will pursue the even tenor of our "narrow way," and patiently work for Priest and People, to experience "the baptism of fire and the holy spirit," when they will praise God for the firm stand we have taken, and with us join in the cry that shall reverberate through all heaven—the gladsome sound of "No Surrender." *

Jesus.

BY F. W. EVANS.

"Jesus is the Christ," or Anointed. Jesus is not the Christ; i. e., is not the Christ Spirit with which the man Jesus and the woman Ann were anointed. Both assertions are equally true in ideas, if not in words.

The Jewish high priest was the Lord's Christ, or Anointed. But the man upon whom the oil had been poured was not the oil itself with which the man had been anointed. The man might have sinned after he was anointed (as Aaron, when he made the calf); but the oil could not sin. When the oil poured upon Aaron's head (to oil him) ran down to the hem of his garment, it indicated that the Holy Spirit, put upon him, should be partaken of by every man and woman of the Hebrew nation. They constituted a "royal priesthood." "I would that all the Lord's people were prophets and prophetesses," was the utterance of the "anointed" Moses.

"I am the Resurrection." "I am the truth and the way." But the man Jesus, or the woman Ann, was not the Resurrection, or the truth or the way, or the life, any more than the apostles were "the light" because they walked in it.

Jesus was the first to be raised from the natural to the spiritual order; from generative life to virgin life; it was through faith and by self-denial. The same with Ann, and with every other man or woman, who then becomes the Christ, the Resurrection, the Way, the Life, etc., to other souls. "Because I live, ye shall live also," and do the same works, and even greater works than their predecessors; having a Mother to conceive and bear them again; which the primitive Christians did not have; nay, not even the twelve apostles.

Ages before Jesus existed, souls "ate the same spiritual meat that he did, and drank of the same spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ"—not Jesus—an unction from the holy of holies, ministered unto them by the Christ angels, from the heaven of all the heavens, to the lower spheres. "Far above all (these) heavens" Jesus ascended when he left the earth. There he awaited the coming forth of the Bride; and where they are, there also will be their children.

Keep thy Integrity.

BY A. G. HOLLISTER.

The Apostle exhorts his readers to "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good." If the inquisition of intellect is a test, then it is rife in these days; but to hold fast the good, which is necessary to make the former of any value, completes the process by bringing on the test of experience.

If all, who have been blessed with a talent of spiritual light, had been mindful, always to hold fast the good, there would not be so much instability of purpose and contradiction in character—so much trying to mingle flesh and spirit—light and darkness—bartering a real and eternal good for the momentary pleasures of sense, which ever lead from bad to worse, neglecting practical works of righteousness, which alone give true elevation, to achieve a fancied elevation by chimerical speculations that have no substance nor foundation in truth.

To hold fast the good, is to maintain integrity by fidelity to the light of rational understanding; ever heeding to do right because it is right. This requires watchfulness, unwavering determination, faith and fortitude; for it brings the soul into the test-crucible and takes away its dross. If fidelity to principle brings the soul into trial, it will also carry it triumphantly through trial, and endow it with regal power, which creates circumstances, or compels those existing to serve. Being wholly devoted to obey the highest and purest law of Deity manifest, Deity directs and works through it.

The soul that never willingly swerves from moral rectitude, moving with or against circumstances until adversity has tested it to the utmost, will at last feel blessed of God forever. Such were the characters wrought by Jesus, and Ann Lee, after they received the baptism of the Holy Spirit.

Resurrection of Life.

BY A. J. DAVIS.

When mankind shall have become spiritually larger and finer in body, they will have fewer and fewer children. Down in the lower stratum of society, behold how populous! Take the early races, they propagate rapidly. Earth's mothers have been broken down by their exceedingly numerous progeny. Rise higher in the scale and the married have fewer children and less frequently. Rise still higher in the mental scale and you can easily believe the time will come that reproduction will cease! There will then be fathers and mothers with their descendants, and the progeny will become as angels, neither marrying nor giving in marriage, having risen above the mission of reproduction. The cerebellum, I repeat, will one of these days cease to have any furniture with reference to reproduction! The finest and most poetic and spiritual minds gather nearly all their propagating power and essences into the front brain and top faculties. Only friends to truth dare to speak the whole truth on this subject.

Our Sweet Shaker Home.

BY JULIA JOHNSON, HANCOCK.

How happy the thought, that we have a home,
Where manifold beauties and blessings are strown;
Which have by the hand of industry been sown,
And want bringeth never a woe.
More worthy we'll walk and humble of heart,
From Wisdom's high oracles never depart—
Nor yet think to learn a more glorious art
Than sweet Christian graces to grow.

The temple within we will wall round about
With Faith, Hope and Love, never darkened by doubt,
The gaunt, ghostly demon, despair, keeping out,
Who blighteth the soul's fairest flowers.
Our steps shall be guarded with caution and care;
With friends tried and true, our interest we'll share;
More cheerfully aiding life's burdens to bear,
Thus tipping with gold, the dark hours.

Our hearts' pure affection we'll trustingly twine
'Round gospel companions, sojourning in time,
With whom we would rise to the regions sublime—
Our spirits cemented as one.
No more to be parted, forever at rest,
In unison joined to the righteous and blest,
With never a shadow of earth to molest
Eternity's beautiful home.

Music.

BY F. W. EVANS.

Music is a divine art; and, when perverted, the evil done through its influence and agency, is in exact proportion to its divinity.

In a tune, a discordant note is repellant and hateful. How much more hateful is a whole tune that is designed to allure and draw souls from their Creator, and to create antipathy towards each other?—a tune that is not in unison with the divine harmony resulting from a oneness, or agreement, between God and man.

To a redeemed man, or woman, martial music, used for military purposes, is as the howlings of demons. And licentious music and dancing, employed to allure the innocent and unwary into circuses, theatres and gambling-houses; or for entrapping them into the drinking saloons of our large villages and cities, which are as gates opening into the hells, from whence those who go down into them, like an ox to the slaughter, never return; such music is simply infernal.

And when believers, in their eager study of music, as an art, sing Babylon songs from the world's books, they will find, by diligent searching, that the influence proceeding therefrom is effectual to awaken the latent generative elements; just as martial music will arouse the dormant war spirit in an old soldier, however much he may have been religiously converted by war-practicing Methodists.

Every tune, or song, given by inspiration, and coming from resurrected souls (whether in or out of the body), inspires the emotional nature with love of the pure and holy, while each song, or tune, proceeding from souls who are in the generative life, tends to excite and feed that life in those who sing or play it, or who listen thereto.

Consequently, we would "stop our ears from the hearing of blood"—music. So should we close all of our soul senses from sympathizing with the music that proceeds from, and tends towards generation, or generative lusts; just as we would avoid lascivious pictures and novels, or any other agency used to seduce and draw souls down into, and retain them, in the pits (or hells) of this sin-cursed world.

What Shall we Call the Practice?

Plagiarism is a detestable practice, and excellent literature is so generally and familiarly studied, that but few expose themselves, by the theft of another's productions, to pass them off as their own; the risk is too great. But what shall we call the practice of those who will make sausages, and label them, "Genuine Shaker Sausages?" or who add, "Shaker socks and flannels for sale here," when these were never looked upon by a Shaker?

The Shakers discontinued the use of pork thirty or more years ago, and have made no sausage since. Scarcely a branch of business have the Shakers taken up, and succeeded with, ere they were confronted by counterfeits in market, that looked like their goods before being used, but which came to an end of their usefulness much sooner. We can refer any to numerous manufactures bearing the "Shaker" name, but which are the fruits of individuals with shaky reputations. It is a fraud we cannot help. We had supposed that when our founders adopted the derisive cognomen of "SHAKER," that we were safe from being counterfeited. But not so; the meanness of some individuals will permit the pulming of very inferior goods upon the credulous buyer, who thinks he is getting the genuine, while they probably have not a particle of Shaker religion in them; and what are goods worth, unless they are full of genuine religion? *

The Two Orders.

BY J. S. PRESCOTT.

"And be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you, a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." 1 PETER, 3:15.

The question is asked us, What authority have you for recognizing two orders of people on the earth? We answer, from reason, revelation, and Scripture. But, says the inquirer, I thought you repudiated the Scriptures, and set aside Jesus for authority. Not so! This is your mistake, and not ours. We quote largely from the Scriptures. We take the Bible for just what it is, and for nothing more.

It is true, we do not crucify Jesus as an impostor, at one time, and make a god of him at another; but simply take his life and example as our rule and guide to follow; believing they contain the greatest amount of wisdom, truth and purity of any example set, either in ancient or modern times. And this example he did not take with him; but, as the Apostle Peter said, "leaving us an example that ye should follow his steps; who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth." This, we understand, was after he was made perfect through sufferings.

Jesus recognized two orders, when he said: "My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight." Again, he recognized two orders when he said: "The children of this world marry and are given in marriage; but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead [dead works], neither marry nor are given in marriage. Neither can they die any more [i. e., the death of Adam]; for they are equal unto the angels, and are children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

What a gross perversion of Scripture this must be, to apply it to a complex marriage, in the flesh, in this world, to increase and improve on licentiousness, when Jesus himself lived a life of virginity, and was about to establish a new, divine, and an angel order on the earth—an equality with the angels in heaven, agreeably with his memorable prayer: "Thy kingdom come, and thy will be done in earth" [i. e., in earthly tabernacles—human beings, like ourselves]. The perversion of the language of Jesus is indeed lowering his standard very much; it is retrograding—it is bringing down the divine below the human.

Two orders of people are indispensable, and implied in the Acts of the Apostles, and throughout the New Testament. "Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name." "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters." Here we have the highest authority for two orders.

We would not object to an intermediate link being thrown between the rudimental and spiritual orders, to bridge over the chasm, the same as John the Baptist was between Judaism and Christianity. This may be necessary.* Man is a progressive being, and there is no stronger proof of his immortality than his perpetual dissatisfaction with everything earthly—his continual longing for something he has not—which illustrates his spiritual nature demanding spiritual food.

We have been quoting Scripture; but the Bible of the past can never supersede the necessity of the Bible of the present and of the future. We cannot possibly believe that an infinite God exhausted all his resources on the imperfect Jewish records, or on any age or nation. "Where there is no vision [i. e., revelation], the people perish." We believe in present revelation, as well as past, and that revelation teaches the importance of two orders of people on the earth, the natural and the spiritual, governed by two distinct general laws; and reason teaches, if a man progresses at all, he will ultimately reach a spiritual order.

No Place to Begin.

BY GILES B. AVERY.

A few years since, a little girl who was not so good but she might improve, was asked by her preceptor, why she was not a better girl? She immediately replied: "I cannot find any place to begin." Well, according to observation and historical narration, this is just the difficulty in the way of the world, relative to becoming evangelized and christianized. It is now, even as it was in the days of the advent of Christ, in Jesus of Nazareth. When called upon to embrace genuine Christianity, which will harvest them out of the world, and gather them into the garner of God, the kingdom of Heaven, they have "bought a farm to till; or oxen to prove; or have a father or mother to bury" or provide for; or, yet more, "have married a wife," or a husband; and, "therefore, cannot come;" or, they "cannot find any place to begin."

The apostles of Jesus found a place to begin, by leaving their fishing, and nets, also—they made a place to begin. But, though this bright example was set nearly two thousand years ago, very few have yet found "a place to begin" to be real followers of Christ; because that place of beginning is at the "end of the world;" and this, mankind appear to dread, not minding there is a better treasure in Heaven.

"No place to begin." Alas, that fearful contributor to delay! A plebeian once stood on the banks of a swiftly-rolling river, desiring to cross to the other shore; but, waiting for the stream to run by, thinking that a stream so rapid would soon discharge its waters—yet on it flowed, and flowed for ages, while many a traveler crossed, and pursued his journey, and obtained his life's pursuit—still stood the halting plebeian, sinking in infamy. Even so do many wait on the banks of Jordan's river (or the river of judgment for their deeds), dreading the reward of their works which true Christianity would present them; but linger, hoping to find heaven on this side of Jordan (judgment), but the river onward rolls.

* Very many have proposed an "intermediate link;" but this link invariably contained the elements of the lusts of the flesh—not in their plain and proper dress, but in the disguise of improvements to the present system. Admitting that there is an advance called for, to be made by us, we yet want no suggestions nor links, that intend the least amalgamation of flesh with the Spirit. The chasm between these is not sufficiently wide, and should be wider, and more distinctly and practically understood. We thus remark, to prevent any misconception of the above.—ED.

"Thou must walk on, however man upbraid thee,
With him who trod the wine press all alone;
Thou wilt not find one worldly soul to aid thee,
One faltering mind, to comprehend thy own."

"Poor wandering soul! I know that thou art seeking
Some easier way, as all have sought before,
To silence the reproachful, inward speaking—
Some landward path unto an island shore."

"But, across the Jordan, hear the benediction:
'Behold, we count those happy who endure;
What treasure wouldst thou, in the land Egyptian,
Repass the stormy water to secure?
For poverty and self-renunciation,
Thy Father yieldeth back a thousand fold;
In the calm stillness of regeneration
Cometh a joy they never knew of old,'"

"And Christ will come, in his own time and power,
To set his earnest-hearted children free;
Watch, toil on! through this dark and painful hour,
And the bright morning yet will break for thee,"

"But," says the faltering Christian, "I cannot find a place to begin!" Make one then. It was said of Napoleon, that on the advent of a terrible battle, his aids-de-camp said to him: "You will not risk a battle on this occasion; circumstances are against you." "Circumstances—circumstances," said Napoleon; "I create and command circumstances, not bow to them." So does the true Christian soldier, in the battle of life against the powers of sin.

"Live to some purpose; make thy life
A gift of use to thee;
A joy, a good, a golden hope,
A heavenly argosy."

Angel Eyes are Upon Us.

BY ANNA DODGSON.

Reading the Religio-Philosophical Journal, I was pleased with the summing up of the long article, "Search after God," in which I found the following beautiful sentence:

"Spirits alone can answer prayer. Ever hovering around you, ever showering down upon you the strength of their magnetism and love, to you they are indispensable. They know every thought, they sense every secret wish, they witness every act. Child of earth, beware! Your secret deeds are all known—every prayer is heard and recorded. Angel eyes are ever upon you. What better answer can there be to prayer, than that which comes from a spirit-band?"

Beautiful spirit-teaching, that is thus brought to bear so closely on our daily earth-life! What a protective influence would be shed over enlightened Christians, could they be made to believe that spirit-eyes are ever upon them! Who would transgress the rules of propriety in word, thought or deed? What a moral corrector such a belief would be—what a teacher of charity and universal love! How many prayers would be directed to the spirits of departed friends, in whom the highest degree of confidence for purity, virtue and love could be placed! and would not erring mortals long to find a Christ, dwelling in mortal form, to whom they might unbosom their secret thoughts, and confess their sins, that they might ever be ready for the communion of good and holy spirits? Who can bear the thought of being constantly accompanied by bad, unclean, selfish spirits? No one. But this must be the case, so long as the spiritual consciousness speaks disapprovingly. Nothing but humility, confession and repentance will repel a bad spirit; and earnest, sincere prayer will bring a good spirit to our aid. Let this belief be living in every Spiritualist, and Christian soul, and we should soon have a good world, of which we should have but little reason to complain. Shaker world, indeed!

Reflecting on the foregoing subject, I was reminded of a hymn, from which, in my youth, I received much instruction, and was conscientiously awakened to a realization of spirit presence. It was composed by Garret R. Lawrence, a physician of our Community, who deceased in 1837. He spoke by the spirit of prophecy, at his death, of a time near at hand when we should converse with spirits as freely as with each other. This was fulfilled to the Shakers, in less than a year after his demise, in what is known to them as the "Spirit Manifestation."

WE ARE SEEN.

All things here on earth revealed,
Indicate a Great First Cause,
From whose sight there's nought concealed,
All efficient are His laws.
Every thought, and word, and action—
All lie open to His view;
None can hide the least transaction—
We are seen in all we do.

Mortals, here, may try to cover,
And conceal their sins awhile;
There's a God who will uncover
And expose the deepest guile.
True as Heaven e'er existed,
Watchmen there their vigils keep;
Every veil shall yet be lifted,
There's an eye that knows no sleep.

Altho' conscience seems to slumber,
And resign its sweet control;
Yet each deed records its number,
Deep engraven on the soul.
And from these, the soul eternal
Takes impressions day by day,
Whether spiritual or carnal,
Good or evil, yea or nay.

Who can hide a guilty conscience?
Fearful state of sin and woe!
Who can grope thro' time, unconscious,
And their standing never show?
Who can smother flames unceasing,
Keep concealed the gnawing worm—
Shame and guilt their load increasing,
Nor with inward horror squirm?

We may seek to veil from mortals,
Deeds which cannot bear the light;
Can we hide from the immortals
That surround us day and night?
Are not thousands now beholding
Every action, word and way?
And our very thoughts, unfolding
In the blaze of endless day?

Have not those, who stand connected
With the source of truth and light,
Many secret sins detected
And exposed to mortal sight?
Are not all our words and actions
Fruits which mortal eyes can view?
'Tis a truth without deception,
We are seen, yea, through and through.

But the honest, pure and holy
Never fear the searching light,
Knowing 't will increase their glory
To appear in open sight.
These shall stand the test triumphant,
Joyful that their state is known,
Glowing like the stars effulgent,
Shining round Jehovah's throne.

Sketches of Shaker Life.—No. 2.

BY R. W. PELHAM.

THE ADMISSION OF NOVITIATES.

The writer is of the opinion that Shakers take for granted that their social relations are much better understood than they really are. As proof of this, inquire of any number you please, What are the necessary steps to be taken, in order to gain admission to membership of the Society? and nine out of ten will tell you, that if heads of families join the Shakers, they must break up their families, give up their property; the husband and the wife must separate, and their children taken under the charge of the Society, etc., etc.; not one word of which is true.

In order to set this matter in a clear light, I cannot do better than to give a history of my own observations of the practical working of our principles, since my first association with the people in 1817—fifty-five years ago. To go a little further back, I will observe that the faith and principles of the Shakers were first opened in the township of Turtle Creek, Warren county, Ohio, by three missionaries, sent by the Shaker Society of New Lebanon, New York, in the spring of 1805; and within ten years after their arrival, the number of converts amounted to several hundred men, women and children, most of whom lived within a radius of fifteen miles, taking Union Village for the center. All these, except the single adults, lived in their separate families and on their own premises, in the common order of Society, and continued so for several years. But most of these desired to progress and enter into the pentecostal order of consecrating their property, to be shared in common with their brethren and sisters. Finally, the way was opened, and all that felt ready made the consecration about 1815.

The oldest members of this body having now had ten years' experience, and having consecrated their money and property, closed their doors against receiving any more members directly into the Church, as this body was then called. But the Church must have a door, and for that purpose they built a new house, and set off a small family of suitable persons to instruct all inquirers, and admit novitiate members. This was called "The Gathering," or "Junior Order," and had been in operation two years, when the writer came and took up his abode in it, in 1817. It was then in a flourishing condition, and active missionary exertions were being made to spread the knowledge of the truth and gather souls into the Gospel fold. There was a continual accession of members, some of which were single adults, and some whole families. Divers of these continued on their own premises and attended to their own temporal concerns, as formerly; while others moved into the bounds of the Society, and either rented or purchased lands adjacent. Some of these kept their families together during their lives, but these were few. There was a sufficient number of these families settled round about the Society to unite in building a school house, and children enough to make up a respectable school, and the writer was the first teacher of that school. In ten years, up to 1825, these and others that came into the Junior Order, within that time, were two hundred strong, not counting the First Family or Church. They had ultimately consecrated their property and formed a second joint interest or Second Family—had purchased adjoining lands, built two commodious and substantial brick dwelling houses which would accommodate from eighty to one hundred persons each.

Now it may be remarked, with regard to the above mentioned families who lived at a distance when they believed, that they might have continued there if they had so chosen. The selling of their premises, and moving into the bounds of the Society, was entirely a matter of their own choice. No rules of the Society required it. They might have remained with their families on their own premises if they had so chosen. There were then Shaker families, so living in Northern Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and other places, who were held in union as novitiate members of the Shaker Society; and there has never been a time since, when there were not such members living in various places throughout the country. When receiving novitiates into spiritual relations, we ask not to know their theological opinions, impose no creed, and only require their conformity to a few plain practical principles. They must tell us honestly what kind of lives they have lived hitherto, and bring all their wicked deeds to light. If they have wronged any one, they must, if in their power, make restitution, and set out henceforth to live an upright life. The relation of husband and wife must cease, and the relation of brother and sister must be assumed instead; and their lives and treatment of one another must henceforth be in conformity with this new relation. They must live pure, continent, or virgin lives, and bring up their children as pure and free from unclean and evil habits as they can. Let them faithfully observe and do these things, and we own them as our dear brethren and sisters, wherever they may be located.

We are often questioned, What guarantee we have that they faithfully conform to these practical rules? We answer, that we take no burden about this matter; we shall not distrust them. As long as they profess to do it, we will take their word for it.

I find the following in the "Brief Exposition," published in 1830: "The first or novitiate class are those who receive our faith and come into a degree of relation, but choose to live in their own family order and manage their own temporal concerns. Any who choose may live in that order and be owned as brethren and sisters in the gospel, so long as they live up to its requirements." p. 9.

This practice has never been rescinded, and is the same to-day as it was forty years ago.

Freedom.

BY WM. H. RUSSELL.

This word suggests to different minds, ideas as varied as the mental development and culture of each. To the depraved mind it means unrestrained desires; license of thought and action, without regard to divine or human law. On the contrary, to the mind elevated above the mere sensual plane of existence, it means a life in accordance with divine law, deviating not a hair's breadth, if that be possible, from straightness itself.

There is social freedom as well as individual freedom, and these are perfectly consistent with each other. It has been said, that in entering into society man gives up a portion of his individual rights for the sake of a greater advantage to be obtained by association. It seems to be taken for granted by those who make this assertion, that, originally, individuals are entirely independent of each other. But this is a mere fanciful assumption, contradicted by the entire history of the human race. Man was created a social being, and his highest enjoyment is to be derived from a perfect society. If the individual is obliged to give up any of his rights to society, no plainer proof is needed that society itself is enslaved to wrong-doing. For, what are the rights of the individual but those which inhere in him by virtue of his existence? These cannot be violated by the person himself, nor by society, without committing a wrong. The individual is entitled to a sound body with a sound mental status, and these may vary, of course, in character and quality, in accordance with various circumstances and conditions, in different ages and in different parts of the earth, yet without any infringement of natural rights. He is entitled also to the opportunities of growth, both physical and mental, and whoever hinders him in the possession and enjoyment of these, just so far obstructs the operation of divine law. The right to these implies his right to use all the means within his reach, to attain them, that do not infringe upon the rights of another; as also his claim upon others for assistance in cases where age or any other circumstances make him dependent upon others. These statements are mere truisms which none will undertake to dispute but those who have been educated in the absurd notion that one part of mankind have rights superior to those of another part, and whose mental vision has therefore been so obscured, that they are unable to perceive the truth, even of axioms.

But it will be said that regard must be paid to mankind in its present condition in estimating the rights of the individual; that a perfect society upon the earth at present is a chimera—a Utopia—and the individual can expect freedom only in proportion as society is virtuous and free. This is partly true and partly false. No doubt, when society at large shall have rid itself of the numerous evils that now infest it; when it shall have put an end to its insensate wars and contentions, and shall employ its energies in building up what it still in a great measure seems bent on destroying, the individual will come into possession of much greater freedom than he can now enjoy. But it is not true, that his rights, which are of divine origin, are dependent upon the condition of society, nor, in fact, is his enjoyment of them wholly dependent upon it. Much has been done in the past by perverted minds, to restrict the rights of the individual, but there has been a gradual though slow growth of the race, in spite of all such efforts. There is in man a power of resistance that has proved itself mightier than armies, and stronger than the accumulated vices of society, though sustained by all the vigor of crowned heads. The simple protest of Jesus was more efficacious than the combined power of Roman and Jew; for, though for a brief season his enemies seemed to triumph, yet he secured forever all that Divine Power has to bestow for human enjoyment. What the Apostle Paul declared of Christians in his day, was true: "They sat together in heavenly places in Christ," and that, notwithstanding the persecuting efforts of their enemies. Thus did God show to all succeeding ages, "the exceeding riches of his grace." Vain were all the efforts of English, secular and ecclesiastical power to make inefficient the simple declaration of George Fox and his followers, that all wars are inconsistent with the precepts and example of Jesus Christ. They could imprison the body, but were powerless to destroy the right, or essentially lessen the enjoyment of the individual, or prevent the spread of opinions that are ultimately to benefit the whole human race.

Adherence to principle will always produce permanent results. Darkness is only a condition; light is as enduring as God himself. "Truth will make free" both the individual and society. Society is the product of individuals, and takes its stamp from their character. The temple of God is holy when the stones composing the structure are "living stones," as was and is the CHIEF CORNER STONE. Let the divine breath flow through every avenue of the soul, and the light of truth penetrate its innermost recess, giving health and vigor to the outward man, and peace and joy to the inner, and there will be a condition of freedom that the possessor of mere political liberty never knew. The union of individuals raised from the death of evil habits to the life of Christ, and constantly progressing in all truth and goodness, will form a society free indeed, whose reflex action upon the individual will be powerful in proportion to the fidelity of each to the life of divine freedom—the life of purity and love. Such a society, raised above the earth of mere sensual enjoyment, will, as Jesus said of himself, ultimately draw all men unto itself.

The Spirit and Wants of the Age.

BY ANNE ERVIN.

The spirit of the age in which we live is emphatically one of progress. It was reserved for the nineteenth century to witness the application of the grand and beneficent principles of the universal diffusion of knowledge among all classes, and the almost startling resurrection of mind which is a natural result. And though it is doubtless true that in coming up from the sepulchre and striving to cast off the ceremonies in which it has so long been bound, the human intellect, so far from being dismayed at these signs of activity, should be stimulated to greater diligence in the work of presenting those great elementary truths which alone are able to make men wise unto salvation. Our course is still onward; nor can we limit, even in imagination, that spirit of progress which, before the dawn of the millennial Sabbath, shall crown with perfection the human mind. We are told, and that truly, that the world is full of wrongs and evils, for which a remedy must be found before man can enjoy his full heritage of blessings; but the speculative reformer, who seeks to tear down the existing fabric before commencing a new one, has not as yet shown us intellectual and moral engines mighty enough to perform the difficult process of renovation. The human mind is ever prone to error. "Better is an old error than a new truth," was the remark of a learned divine; but the state of things is now completely changed. A reaction has taken place, which threatens to destroy all the ancient landmarks and to convulse the whole social system, in the attempt to remove the evils which have gathered strength for ages. If such is the spirit of the age, what then is wanted to meet its exigencies and carry forward the benevolent operations which form a distinctive feature in its character? We want intelligent, educated men and women, who can properly appreciate and defend the light with which they are endowed, and can diffuse correct principles throughout the land. The preponderance of intelligence and virtue constitutes our only safeguard. We want earnest, practical men and women, to meet the exigencies of the age, who would leave the world better than they found it. But more than all, we want devoted, consistent followers of the Lord Jesus, to be co-workers with him in bringing back a revolted world and to prepare the way for the final triumph of love over every form of selfishness and sin. The noblest of all human means must be that which obtains the exertion of divine power. Without this power from on high, every attempt to ameliorate the condition of men will prove a failure. Go ye into the world and preach the gospel to every creature, is the command of the Redeemer. Never before have the wants of the human family been so great as now. Let those, then, who labor and pray take courage. It has always been the fate of truth to be stigmatized and slandered by falsehood. Whenever the spirit of truth has been revealed, the father of lies has never failed to dispense a sufficient portion of the spirit of falsehood to combat it and scandalize all who maintain it. The great Captain of our salvation was subjected to scorn and derision, and endured the reproaches of the emissaries of Satan. He was charged with drunkenness, and reproached with associating with publicans and sinners; and he repeatedly assured his followers that they would suffer the same indignities and reproaches. "For if ye were of the world, the world would love its own, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hatheth you." It is of little consequence what name we assume. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

Little Things.

BY ANNA WHITE.

"Take us the foxes, the little foxes that spoil our vines."

A little spark will create a great conflagration, burning up villages, towns and cities.

A little hole in a ship sinks it.

A small breach in the sea-bank carries all away before it.

A little over-crowding of the stomach will produce sickness.

A little intoxicating drink has been many a man and woman's ruin.

A little stab in the heart will kill a person.

A little harsh word will stir up anger.

A little gift of the Spirit, if slighted, will produce spiritual death.

A little sin, as it is frequently and very improperly called, brings death to the soul.

So in turn, little acts of goodness, little words of kindness, little smiles of approbation, make up the sum of human happiness.

Heaven is Within.

BY ANGELUS SILESIUS, A. D. 1620.

How far from here to heaven?
Not very far, my friend;
A single hearty step
Will all thy journey end.

Hold, there! where runnest thou?
No, heaven is in thee!
Seek'st thou for God elsewhere?
His face thou'lt never see.

Go out—God will go in;
Die thou, and let him live;
Be not, and he will be;
Wait, and he'll all things give.

I don't believe in death;
If hour by hour I die,
'Tis hour by hour I gain
A better life thereby.

Truth, Faith and Reason.

BY R. W. PELHAM.

A truth discovered, a duty imposed on the understanding, by reading the tattered leaf of a cast-off book, is as binding on the conscience, nay, as welcome to the heart of a sincere lover of truth, as if it were delivered fresh from the mouth of a Prophet under all the agonies of inspiration.

All the reverence paid to truth on account of the "pomp and circumstance" of mighty miracles, or the awe-imparting influence of ocular inspiration, is really a derogation from the love of truth as such; and when the impression of the marvelous is past (which will soon be the case), we shall then be able, by observing what remains, to discover how much the truth was regarded for its own sake.

Many sectarians affect to believe mysteries, and require their votaries to believe, not only without understanding, but against their intuitive perceptions of truth, and they pretend to use argument and reason for the propriety of this. But it is a vain thing to appeal to man's reason, to bring in a verdict against itself. Satan will not cast out Satan. A principle cannot oppose itself.

The very act of reasoning against reason, gives the lie to his argument who uses them, and proves more cogently the great excellence and propriety of reason.

The main ground of the many great absurdities which abound in all theological systems will be found to be, the taking for granted certain first principles, which being considered the very basis of the system, are held not only too certain, but too sacred to admit of investigation or doubt.

To reject that which appears to the mind as unreasonable, is to reject that which is opposed to the will of God; for who can suppose that God wills what is unreasonable?

We should never confound the understanding with the imagination, nor give the latter the ascendancy over the former.

My understanding, O God, is thy workmanship, thy greatest and best gift! Grant me to exercise it not to selfish ends, but purely for thy glory.

As a man's eyes may be of great use to him without a telescope, while a telescope can be of no use to him without eyes; so, a man's reason can be of great use to him without revelation; but revelation can be of no use to him without reason.

We never present revelation to idiots or brutes, any more than we present colors to a blind man; for the reason that we know they are destitute of any faculty to judge of its truth, or make the least use of it.

If in any case revelation be presented to a man, and he be asked to receive it as such, without using his reason to discover whether it to be true or false, whether it be revelation or human invention; he is, in that case, asked to be unreasonable—to act without reason.

In all cases reason must be the dernier resort, and, so to speak, God is bound, and his messengers are bound to make all his revelations plain and true to man's reason. If this is not done, no revelation is made.

Paul prayed to be delivered from wicked and unreasonable men. He could not offer such the revelation of truth in the gospel. His only wish was to keep out of their way, and be delivered from them.

The Prophet represents God as desiring to reason with mankind: "Come, saith the Lord, let us reason together;" and Dunlavy says: "What is good reason to man is good reason to God." In all things we must appeal to reason. He that receives revelation without reason, will be quite as apt to reject it without reason.

Gospel truth shall stand. Enmity and lust have dug many a grave for it. Intolerance has persecuted it. Many a Judas has betrayed it with a kiss. Many a Peter has denied it with an oath. Many a Demas has forsaken it for worldly pleasure and pelf. Heaven and earth may pass away, but the word of Truth shall not pass away—it shall stand forever. It will forever console, justify, and make free its friends, while it will as certainly and unceasingly whisper the sentence of condemnation in the consciences of its betrayers.

"The Shaker."

BY MARIA WITHAM, ENFIELD, CONN.

Hail, lovely SHAKER! What with thee can compare
In beauty, and goodness, and truth, ever rare!
No dew drop, that glints in the morning sun's beam,
Can brighten and bless like the truths of thy theme.
How I long for thy coming, thou herald of peace!
Thou fountain of goodness! May'st thou ever increase!
On, on, o'er the earth, and bear on thy page
God tidings of truth, both to youth and old age;
And teach all mankind false opinions to leave,
To use God-given reason, and light to receive.
Thou glorious volume, which in wisdom art made,
May'st thou understandingly, ever be read,
And, as thou advancedst, let my zeal improve,
And glow with the ardor of consummate love.

Correspondence.

THE SHAKERS' POSITION.

The following letter was written sometime since as a reply to a Professor of an Eastern College who, convinced of the "ungodliness of the age," particularly illustrated in the social relations of life, paid us a visit, addressed our family, etc., and upon his return home, sent us a letter entreating us to aid, by material means, the scheme of founding an institution, in connection with ours, that would have for its object the proper reproduction of human beings, "such as would make Shakers!"

OFFICE OF THE SHAKER, }
— 20th, 1872. }

PROFESSOR H.: Your lengthy appeal, addressed to myself, came duly to hand, and in reply would say: You find yourself in water so deep, that you cannot consistently wade, and you must either swim above the water or you must be drowned. Your thorough investigations of our faith and principles I admire, and your objections of making these a finality, are received with all due respect. You termed us "liberal," and thus we mean to be, so that we will not engage in warm debate, even for our side; believing that the spirit of truth will create sufficient commotion in any soul, which, like yours, has spiritual aspirations, yet would not give up the desires of the soul for fleshly, generative lusts.

You esteem marriage, in its upright condition, to be the ne plus ultra of human bliss. Carried out, as you can mentally picture it, we admit would yield an earthly heaven, and very many with you devoutly wish this ever had been, or ever can be realized. It is a Utopia.

Thousands have been just where you are in their convictions—they have seen that "the earth, earthy," was not "the spirit, heavenly," and, writhing in an agony of fear, lest the true presentiment of the cross should cut off all the idols of their carnal imaginations, they pray and plead that the good God will not be so unmerciful as to lead to the abandonment of the husband and wife relations. The lusts of the flesh, even in their most exalted and admired uniform—in legal marriage, and as properly conducted as the very best are capable of—these still, are the grand shoots from the corrupt tree, from which all the minor fibres draw sustenance. We have been studying this subject for nearly an hundred years, and are satisfied that a failure will follow every attempt to sanctify the flesh through the order of marriage, while shines the spiritual light from the Christian heavens.

We are willing you should attempt the scheme of which you speak, though not with our means; and though we should rejoice at an exalted condition of humanity on the animal plane, yet we shall expect to record your scheme "another failure." The flesh, in its most glorified habiliments, is a subject of Christly condemnation; yet, unwilling to part with it entirely, you and many others seem wriggling in a torment that evolves a thousand plans for its salvation. But remember, that not one of a herd of swine will believe the swill hot, regardless of the warning shrieks of the sufferers, until each has burned his snout!

I would refer you to "American Socialism," before you attempt any ideal plan for christianizing marriage, and you would then be better aware of how your proposition would result.

You labor under a misconception, concerning our position, which I thought I had dispelled: It is, that we refrain from marriage, because of its corruptness. Not so. Even though the Utopia you seek could be found, we could not unite in its support; for above the whole order of earthly coalition, do we through a life of Christ aspire; and away from all worldly elements, pure or impure. We have found something so much better than the most perfect connubiality, that as "the sun's meridian blaze forbids the stars to glow," even so, does the order of earthly beings sink into insignificance before the halo of our pure, angel faith and practice.

In this light of the subject, how base it would appear and be in us to aid in sustaining a breeding institution, when we know that all the desires that would then be called to action are, at best, so inferior to the life principles of Christ, as to make the scheme disgusting in its every phase!

Not so, Professor, your convictions, unbiased by fleshly passions, convince you that we can never prostitute our consecrated property from its holy intent, to sustain you, or any of your, or others' selection in the fruitful or "unfruitful works of darkness." You, like many others, have had a call to higher things, and we suggest that you squarely face the music of your conscience; nor think the task given human nature, by our Christly preceptors, is too unpleasant to be engaged in, and like Achan, seek to save some idol from annihilation. Be bold enough to obey your convictions of right, and we will risk the rest.

We would not force you to be a Shaker or Christian; but labor, if you choose, in the field of generation, for its higher elevation. We find that from the material it produces now, only a few good Shakers can be produced, and can only bid you God-speed in its improvement, if your call is to nothing higher. But we would to God, your convictions, being where we think they are, that you would obey them, regardless of all fleshly cravings or faults of the law.

You are only one from many thousands who are appealing, that we "come down from the cross," against all fleshly lusts, "that all men may believe on us!" But we prefer being the unpopular few who, walking the narrow way, have joined ourselves to the cross, "laid down our own lives," and mean, voluntarily, there to remain, even amid the jeers and injustice of the multitude who are walking the broad road—we being in the world, yet not of the world. And when life with you is sped, and indulgence can no more be effectually prosecuted, 'tis then, mark well our words, that you, and thousands like you, will regret that you had not ceased battling for the flesh, and willingly united with us in a life that "walks in the spirit, and fails to fulfill the lusts of the flesh." The love of the world has drawn many bright stars to its plane; but the sincere, the resolute, and violent can alone withstand its charms.

Bidding you adieu, I am yours, etc.,

G. A. LOMAS, Ed. Shaker.

Novitiate Musings.

BELoved SHAKER:—Having come suddenly from the midnight of anti-Christian darkness to the full blaze of millennial light, that light shows me many things which, though quite familiar to the experienced Zion traveler, are new to me. I experience, especially in our meetings, new and beautiful influences, which, from want of a more satisfactory term, I will call ministrations of the Spirit of God. It is needless to describe them further than to say, that they are golden and harmonious; that they penetrate the whole physical frame, elevate the mind and soul from the grosser appetites of earth, and stimulate the spirit to fresh exertion to struggle upward. They vary in their character so much that no two are exactly alike. I am sincerely anxious to know, from the experience of larger hearts and wiser heads than mine:

1st. What is the source of these ministrations?

2d. What are their nature, consistency, properties?

3d. What are the most favorable conditions for obtaining them?

4th. Is it possible to reduce the obtaining of these ministrations to a science?

5th. Is this a proper subject for investigation, or should we accept these ministrations without questioning their source?

6th. Would it be acceptable to furnish carefully-noted experiences of the kind for publication, so as to obtain information from many sources, and thus establish the truth by the experience of many witnesses? This last would involve careful noting of the kind and degree of the ministration, and of the state of the mind, feelings, and bodily system at the time of the reception.

Reply to Queries of Thos. J. Stroud.

BY GILES B. AVERY.

The subject presented by our brother is of vital importance to humanity. He denominates the "new and beautiful influences" to which he is introduced in the Shaker meetings he attends, "Ministrations of the Spirit of God." It is a term well selected to nominate the exercises of the Holy Spirit inspirationally upon the human soul in such a powerful degree, as to cause the mortal tenement sometimes to tremble under the influence of its power, being overawed by a power so much superior to itself; at other times to be so filled with what might be termed a psychological magnetism, as to produce healing of the physical frame, when diseased; yea, even to raise the dead; in other cases to agitate powerfully the human frame, giving it many fold its ordinary strength, and enabling the recipient of this ministration to perform feats, while under its influence, which would be impossible in a normal condition. For instance, to enable the unlearned to read well, and retain the faculty after reduction to a normal state; to cause the blind to see, the deaf to hear, the lame to walk, and multitudes of conditions to be induced incident alone to supernal life.

Our brother inquires:

1st. "What is the source of these ministrations?"

Answer. Their source is the Divine mind, combined with harmonious relations of the human therewith, either in the recipient of the ministrations, or in some other person in close sympathy therewith, as his or her intercessor. In some instances it is simply requisite to be in a state of prayerful passiveness. There are instances where the condition of the recipient seems not to enter into the source at all, but so far as he is concerned, every consideration appears to center in the fact of his needs, and he is made the recipient through the harmonious relations and intercessions of his mediator or Elder, who is in sympathy with him.

Question 2. "What are their nature, consistency, properties?"

Answer. Their nature is supernal; their consistency, purely spiritual, intangible; their properties are: 1st, absorbing to the senses; 2d, overawing to the affections; 3d, dominating to the will, during their exercise, but their effects may be dissipated by the after purposes and conduct of the recipient, or retained and enhanced at pleasure; 4th, inspiring, and influential sympathetically.

Question 3d. "What are the most favorable conditions for obtaining them?"

Answer. 1st. To stand, spiritually, free from any condemnation from the violation of conscientious convictions of duty, or righteousness; in other words, free from sin. 2d. To give the soul to prayer. 3d. To surrender the entire will and desires to God.

Question 4. "Is it possible to reduce the obtaining of these ministrations to a science?"

Answer. Inasmuch as there is a consecutive and consistent application of appropriate means to that end, as suggested in answer to question 3d, it might be said to be scientific. But "ministrations of the Spirit of God" are fruits of the kingdom of heaven; and Jesus said, truly, "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation."

Question 5. "Is this a proper subject for investigation, or should we accept these ministrations without questioning their source?"

Answer. The fruits of the Spirit are proper subjects of investigation, in a spirit of holy reverence and godly carefulness. "Try the spirits," etc. See "Tests of Divine Inspiration," a Shaker publication (pamphlet).

Question 6. "Would it be acceptable to furnish carefully-noted experiences of this kind for publication?" etc.

Answer. VERY carefully-noted experiences might be published with profit; but much, very much wisdom is requisite in selecting and preparing a report of such experiences to present to a mind largely involved in a worldly sense; for there is danger in presenting all spiritual and heavenly gifts to the unenlightened, lest it prove as the Gospel of Christ to the Jews, a "stumbling block," or to the mere worldly philosopher, as Christ's Gospel to the Greeks, "foolishness."

These "ministrations of the Spirit of God" are transmissible from one soul to another, the most favorable conditions necessary being a oneness of spirit between the minister and recipient, and desire of the recipient to receive. But, in certain instances, they may be so powerful, the love of God so great, and the needs of the recipient so ponderous, that they may be forced upon him even against his will. But their most general dissemination is sympathetically. Hence, some speculative worldly philosophers, uninspired by the gift and wisdom of God, would term all such pentecostal baptisms, moral or spiritual "epidemics." But an epidemic is a disease, an abnormal condition, by some irritating cause, inducing unhealthy conditions. Such is not the case with pentecostal baptisms, that are sympathetically communicated from soul to soul by the baptismal influences of the Holy Spirit. Such baptisms are charged with health to both soul and body. Some worldly philosophers have gone so far as to declare that the statements of a person so inspired by a foreign or another spirit as to be elevated above their normal capacity, are not proper subjects for belief.

But, according to this rule, the ancient prophets, Jesus and his apostles, would all stand condemned. The facts are, that almost all the remarkable improvements of human society, either in morals, religion or in the arts, and labor-saving, mechanical inventions, may be justly attributed largely, if not entirely, to inspirations from superior souls and minds, or souls and minds progressed to more elevated conditions than those attained by the recipient, or inventor, so called. There is such a thing as Divine revelation, and those souls who are the happy recipients of it, are elevated thereby above their normal conditions, mentally and spiritually; but are such revelations to be condemned as false, because of their elevating effects upon humanity? If so, there is no hope for our race.

Do Good.

There are many societies established for the improvement and happiness of humanity. We wish in these few words to give a hearty "God bless" to the "Societies for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals." They are doing a noble work, and are worthy the sympathy and active aid of every humane member of society, capable of feeling sympathy and able to lend a helping hand. Our Bro. R. M. Wagan, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y., has some beautifully printed cards, with border, which aim to aid the good work. The cards contain a poem, beginning with, "The man of kindness to his beast is kind." Send for a dozen, fifty cents.

Many thanks for the numerous replies to "Notice to Believers," from Believers and others. While nearly all urge an enlargement, we mean to be content another year, at present size, with "Extras."

Christian Self-Denial.

"Except a man deny himself."—(of what?) Christ.
"Brave Conquerors! for so you are, who battle with your own affections, and the whole army of the world's desires." Shakspeare.

Human nature hates restriction; it can see no propriety in limiting a pleasant indulgence; it worries, frets, scolds and galls under the failure of full satisfaction. We know there is such a thing as satiety; we can eat and drink until food in its very best form becomes loathsome—we can indulge all the senses to the exhaustion of nature—yet nature, in this exhausted condition, pines at its limits, and does not thank God for the boundary. In a country whose laws extend to its subjects the largest liberties—a country, in which "Young America" is trained from the cradle to think that obedience to parental authority is of infantile length only, and then to feel, that to do as he pleases is his inalienable right—'tis here, that self-denial is at a discount, and self-gratification at a premium, more than elsewhere. 'Tis here, that true liberty is misconstrued, and the silver years, if they are reached, are left to teach, that "he alone is free whom the truth makes free," and that the teachings of truth are strongly flavored, with "touch not, taste not, handle not." He is not free who does as he pleases (unless he pleases to do rightly), but the worst of slaves, to the worst of tyrants—the passions. Jesus taught, and practiced self-denial, and for this, was very unpopular with the world. His ideas were accepted and practically carried out by an unpopular few; while he was given the choice of relinquishing his doctrines, or of dangling from a three-cornered edifice until life should ebb away. And we opine, that were the millions of professedly Christian people, compelled to practice what they profess—real Christianity—they would soon renounce all claim to the title! Were there not educated adepts, dealing out explanations of what scriptural self-denial does not mean, in a manner that permits the self-adulation and gratifications of their auditors, there would soon be only as many Christians in name, as in practice; while the present popularity of the name would then become the synonym of contempt! With a large respect for religious sincerity, we cannot hold from saying, that humanity are so prone to indulgence, that they have transformed genuine Christianity into a requirement much better adapted to their desires, and most assuredly without the sanction of its author. The grand truth will one day be discovered, that the terms "Self-denial" and "Self-gratification" are antipodes, and not synonyms.

We are constrained to ask of popular Christians: Where is your self-denial and cross? Wherein is your life, other than carnal men and women choose to have it? Does not popular Christianity suit the masses exactly, and is it not very diverse from the life of Jesus, whose Christianity, though unpopular, was eminently genuine and practical?

We ask for no needless execrations; we plead for none of the exerceiating practices of wild fanatics, who would lacerate the body for the good of the soul, and mistakenly find themselves the same; but we do plead for that Christian self-denial, practiced by Jesus, and taught to his disciples, with the injunction, "Follow me!"

Our investigations and conscience will not permit us to make the terms "Self-denial" and "Self-gratify" identical. We admit, our perverted senses would have had Jesus remarked: "Unless a man gratify himself, in every conceivable manner, he cannot be my disciple;" but to the horror of our sensual appetites, they are to be denied and crucified, or we cannot attain to a fellowship with Christ! Let us be assured, that the "redeeming blood of Christ," will ultimately appear to all as the practical life of Jesus; and that the one will never cleanse us from our iniquities until we adopt the other. As professing Christians, let us be practical ones; if Jesus is our example, let us live as he lived—let his self-denials be ours. Never let us make the charge, that we cannot live as he did, else we make Jesus most unreasonable in saying: "Let him deny himself, take up his cross and follow me."

And let us here admonish the Pastors of the large variety of churches, to preach

Christ, unbiassed by any creed of human invention; preach Christ, as Jesus lived; and forget not to remind your flocks, that the virginal celibacy of Jesus; the "all-things-in-common" principle that he urged; the non-resistant element in which he lived, and keeping himself "unspotted from the world," cost him just as much, and no more self-denial, than is required of us who profess his discipleship, and hopefully expect to share in his heaven the fruits of Self-denial. Let each one practically learn our Saviour's name, taught in the school of Christ—Self-denial. *

Peter, The Christ.

BY E. MYRICK.

"SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES,"

"For in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me; and ye will not come to me, that ye may have life. Full well ye reject the (present) commandments of God, that ye may keep your own traditions."

This exhortation of Jesus, to "search the Scriptures," was to renew their faith in the prophecies which testified of his mission. He did not say go back into a semi-barbaric age, when just revenge was tolerated, making the "new commandment" of universal love—"of none effect by your old traditions;" but to those inspirational truths by which "ye think ye have eternal life;" and I am now declaring them unto you. The first and greatest is supreme love to God, and second, fraternal love to man. On these two hang all the law and the prophets.

Read John 5th, 17th, and remainder of the chapter, wherein is recorded the sublimest idea of his life—the Fatherhood of God. He said, "I am the Son of God." And again, Our Father declaring others to be sons of God as really as himself—claiming also to be the son of man as well as they.

"Whosoever speaketh a word against the son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the holy ghost," or anointing, which constitutes a child of God, "it shall not be forgiven him." Thus admitting equality with other "sons of men," and recognizing the divine relationship, as they become "sons of God."

He asked them (his disciples,) "But whom say ye, that I am?" And Simon Peter answered and said, "thou art the Christ, the son of the living God." Omitting the interlude of blessing and confirmation, we have the direct response of Jesus: "I say also unto thee, that thou art, (i.e. so are you) Peter," and upon this rock—"this primary principle of Fatherhood in Deity, and Sonship of humanity in Christ"—will I build my church; and the gates of hell (the false systems of theology, with their Adamic practices, war, trine God, and vicarious atonements) shall not prevail against it.

By a slight change in punctuation, is not the analogy in the context more complete? and does it not give a better rendering of the meaning Jesus intended to convey?

The common error that Peter, signifying rock, should be the foundation of an everlasting church—who at most could be but an active agent—is fraught with grave consequences, when solemnized by a creed, and draped about with kindred, damaging phraseologies.

Supposing Jesus had said, thou art Thomas, and upon this twig (the scripture name of Thomas) will I build, etc.? Reason fails to support the long accepted belief, that the declaration to Peter bore any relation to him, or the significance of his name. But to the parental and endearing relationship, existing between the infinite and finite souls, this was the rock, the basis and eternal principle on which to build. And it was this revelation to Peter, which Jesus hastened to bless and confirm.

"And I say also unto thee,"
"That thou art," Christ, in good degree,
And "blessed art thou, Simon," Brother—
"Son of the living God," the Father.
O Father make them one with me,
Even as I am one with thee;
We have one master, the Christ spirit,
An heirship such as each shall merit.

This declaration of Jesus, that Peter was "Christ, the son of the living God," which also applies to all who became one with him, by obeying Christ as he did, does not preclude the second distinctive advent of Christ in a representative personage—"like unto the Son of Man"—the Daughter of Man—Ann, "the Christ"—the Daughter of the living God." And this is the second appearing of Christ, in glory, supplanting that which was in part. "Beloved, now are we Sons and Daughters of God." Christs, Saviours, "a great multitude, which no man could number of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, clothed in white robes, and palms of victory in their hands."

"Singing salvation to our (dual) God. Blessings, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might, be unto [and from] our God forever and ever."

"Search the Scriptures," which testify unto us such glorious truths, and we will come unto them "that we may live."

The Impending Evil.

BY F. W. EVANS.

"The wise man (or people) seeth the evil afar off, and hideth himself."

In these United States, there is in process of formation a Church-and-State party. It is already larger than "a man's hand," and combines together the master minds of various sects; being composed of all those who confound religion and theology, and spiritualism and religion—the old country originated denominations, the Catholics, Episcopalians, the dissenting Methodists, Baptists, Lutherans, Calvinists, including the Russian or Greek Church, etc., who are, at the present time, Church-and-State establishments in the Christian War Governments of Europe.

Can any rational person have a doubt that what these theological bodies do in England, France, Sweden, Denmark, Belgium, Russia, Canada, and the South American States, to-day, they will do in the United States as soon as it can be effected? or that the practical rule of a Church-and-State Government will be the same here as there?

"Is thy servant a dog?" asked Hazeel of the Prophet Elisha, when he informed him of what he would do to Israel; and the blindness of Hazeel, respecting his own character, touching religious persecution, appeared to be common to human beings.

Some of the most conscientious and religiously sincere, but theologically erroneous, persons I meet, believe that none but theologically correct men (according to their standard) ought to be legislators. These think the race has progressed beyond religious persecution, and that they will not again "do this thing." To them, the fire and faggot, the rack and pulley, are things of the past, and could not be reproduced.

The believer in war, when possessed of political power, (human nature being unchanged) will always "think that in killing heretics, he is doing God good service."

How often have peace people thought that Christian wars were ended. But Christian war, and Christian religious persecution will only die drowning in the blood of the martyrs, which war Christians have shed, locked in each other's arms.

Theological errors (which are the seeds of religious persecution, such as)

First, That the Douay Bible, King James's Bible, or any one of the Dissenting Bibles, is the "Word of God."

Second, That the priesthood are infallible interpreters of the Bibles.

Third, That some men, as Adam, Noah, Abram, Moses, and seventy of the Elders of Israel, "saw God," the Supreme Being and conversed with him "face to face."

Fourth, That the will of Deity creates and makes a thing right or wrong; so that the invasion, robbery, and spoliation of whole nations, or those of Canaan, by Joshua, attended by the infliction of rape and murder, was doing God great service.

These dogmas, and their practical illustration in the Bible history, have been the basis of similar treatment by Christian demons, like the Crusaders, the Duke of Alva, Cortes, Pizarro, Cromwell, the Duke of Marlborough, and the New England Puritans, when they killed heathen Indians and pious Roger Williams, or when they hung peaceable Quakers, and burnt (as a witch) a spiritual medium on Boston Common.

Nearer home. The above are good enough illustrations of what theologically mistaken, religious souls will do, when they have the civil power in their hands, through a union of Church-and-State. But, when we find a contemporary of Mother Ann Lee—her John Baptist, the Angel-representative of Spiritualism, as she was of religion—the learned and gentle seer of the North, Emanuel Swedenborg, holding the above named dogmas as premises, and carried logically to the same conclusion of "thinking" that the killing of heretics was a Christian duty; and affirming that the most innocent and lamb-like of all the sects which had come up in Babylon—Christendom—and the very people out of whom Shakerism arose, "ought to be put to death," we stand aghast! confounded! and confirmed in the fact, that theological errors produce religious persecution, as an acorn produces an oak tree; and that no theology should ever be permitted into the now simple and pure American Constitution.

I quote from the "Debatable Land," by my old friend and former associate, R. D. Owen, pp. 231,2.

"Premise: Jehovah himself descended, and assumed humanity."

"Speaking of those 'who are called in the world Socinians, and some of them Arians,' he (Swedenborg) says: 'The lot of both is * * * that they are let down into hell among those who deny God. These are meant by those who blaspheme the Holy Ghost, who will not be forgiven either in this world, or in that which is to come.'

"Even worse than this is the cruel spirit, aggravated by the assumption of false premises, in which he speaks of those whom he ought to have commended and hailed as spiritual brethren. We have it under his own hand, as divinely revealed to him, that the Quaker worship is so execrable and abominable, that, if Christians but knew its true character, 'they would expel Quakers from Society, and permit them to live only among beasts.' And this—think of it—from one who deemed himself the penman of God! the recipient and inditer of truth unmixed with error.

"In Swedenborg's Diary, under date Oct. 29, 1748, he says: 'The secret worship of the Quakers, sedulously concealed from the world, was made manifest. It is a worship so wicked, execrable, and abominable, that, were it known to Christians, they would expel Quakers from Society, and permit them to live only among beasts. They have a vile communion of wives, etc.' Again, Oct. 28, 1748: 'They are indomitably obstinate in their aversion to having their thoughts and doings made public. They strove with me and the spirits who desired (but in vain) to know their secrets.'—(See Emanuel Swedenborg, his Life and Writings, by William White, London, 1867, vol. 1. pp. 386, 387).

"The poison of intolerance, in its most malignant type, still works among a bigoted portion of Swedenborg's followers. The (London) Intellectual Repository is the accredited organ of orthodox Swedenborgianism. Its editor (sixteen years since, however), after stating his opinion, that 'spirits, even the highest angels, have nothing to tell us in relation to doctrine and life, but what is revealed in the word,' goes on to say: 'We therefore conclude that it is not only dangerous, but impious, to seek to have communion with spirits, especially in regard to any thing of doctrine and life.' But he does not stop here. He tells us that there is good reason for the command, 'so often repeated to the children of Israel, to put those to death who had familiar spirits, and who were necromancers,' or, as in the Hebrew text, 'asked inquiries of the dead.'"—Intellectual Repository, vol. for 1855, pp. 460, 461. "Anything worse than this, we may search the records of modern theology in vain to find."

Let all theologies be vigorously excluded from the only free government on earth, "and forever confine its functions to secular education, and the internal rights and duties of" its citizens.

Devotion and Love.—No. 1.

BY R. W. PELHAM.

If thou hast wholly given and devoted thy life, thy all, and thyself to God, what is it to thee whether thou be in this part of space or that, here, or there, or two hundred miles hence, if so be thou art in obedience to God? If God be thy only treasure, and to do his will thy meat and drink, surely thou wilt be content wherever thou shalt be placed; the gift of God not being confined to places, persons nor things, but is always found where duty calls.

By how much thou art attached to places and creatures, by so much thou lackest of being wholly devoted to God.

"Let the words of my mouth and the meditations of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord my redeemer," said David. O how watchful and prayerful must I constantly be, to keep this holy, heavenly frame of mind, here expressed by the devout Psalmist.

I must speak no word, indulge no train of thoughts, act from no motives, but such as I believe will be acceptable to the Lord.

How constantly must I watch! How fervently must I pray! O how closely must I scrutinize and sift each thought, word and action, if all I think and do and say shall be done to the acceptance and glory of God.

When thou shalt steadfastly reject thyself and be wholly resigned to do the will of God, thou shalt hear the divine voice within thee saying, "this is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased."

It is written that "obedience is better than sacrifice," but obedience and sacrifice both are better still.

We are often exhorted to labor for the quickening power of God, and it is certain that every soul needs it. But who has a distinct idea what it is? Oh give me a "quickened," tender, sensitive conscience. Let my moral sensibilities be deeply enlivened, that I may sense even the distant approach of an evil thought, and shut up every avenue of my soul against it. This is the quickening power of God which will effectually shield the soul from the least stain of pollution.

We often talk of "traveling" in the gospel; we say we are determined to "go on" to "persevere" and "go ahead;" but we should remember, and never forget, that whosoever travels, is continually leaving something behind.

It is impossible that we should become "new creatures" any further or faster than, putting off the old, we get new ideas, new motives, new objects of affection, and new everything.

Paul's "new and living way," only means "a new way of living;" devoting our lives to God and not to self.

Unless we can perceive in ourselves that we are losing our relish for mere earthly things, and increasing in the love of those which are spiritual, heavenly and eternal, we may be assured that we are not traveling, not ripening for eternity.

If we do not die, and die continually to that which is sensual and earthly, we shall never rise to that which is spiritual and heavenly. "I protest," saith Paul, "I die daily."

No matter how much gift, power and spirit of God others may possess, we shall not be able to apprehend it in them, nor receive it from them, unless we have a measure of the same. "No man can come to me," said Jesus, "except the Father draw him." Grace must answer to grace. We cannot receive the Divine Nature by imputation, but by impartation—not by proxy, but in our own souls.

He is unacquainted with the love of God and true devotion, who feels to boast of his devotedness, and is expecting some outward reward for his secret devotions.

How groveling and selfish would he be thought who professed ardently to love a friend, and often visiting him and holding sweet converse, should be found secretly expecting, or openly demanding, money as a reward of his time and pains!

SAD.—Between the 27th October and 5th November, the home of THE SHAKER was visited by two disastrous fires. One at Second Family—the large barn with all of its contents—loss, at least, $11,000. The other at South Family, in which the loss was even greater.

Three barns, wagon house, with accompanying sheds, with all their contents were swept away. Our dairies are well nigh ruined. We should rather have recorded these fires as accidents—but are constrained to write incendiarism! The object was robbery in the other families—this was attempted at each fire—but proved a failure. We live in hopes of the arrest of the parties—and until then—and afterward—will pray: "God have mercy on their souls!" *

"No Surrender."

BY WATSON ANDREWS.

"The following lines were suggested to me by the noble leader in November number of THE SHAKER."

This war-cry through the nations rings,
And wakes the sleeping spheres;
And Hope, replumes her drooping wings,
And points to coming years.
There's strength within these magic words—
There's vigor in their sound,
As backward roll the opposing hordes,
And clear the doubtful ground.

"On, up and on!" bright legions shout,
Yours is the victory;
And Hope's glad eye beholds the rout,
While echo answers—"Victory."
What though the ebbing tides disclose
The fossils of the deep!
What though it seems in vain, that those Bright saints their vigils keep!

The laws that lead the ebbing tide,
Bring the returning wave;
Growth and decay, here, side by side,
Their proper office have.
The seed cannot be quickened, more,
Except it first decay;
And Cities, Nations, o'er and o'er,
Arise, then pass away.

But principles do not decay;
And virtue never dies;
When all things else have passed away
They reascend the skies.
They reascend, but not alone—
Their votaries go too,
And sing: "Thy will, oh God be done!"
In songs forever new.

Fashion.

We copy below with great pleasure from the Albany Evening Times—our most interesting local—that which should be preserved in letters of gold. It is from the facile pen of "Will Wimble," or F. W. White, whose future we will watch with brilliant anxiety.

"Strange, invisible power! A mythical queen, that has more followers than Christianity, and whose mandates are obeyed more blindly and willingly than those of the most august potentate; whose reign is perpetual, whose tastes are capricious and whose whims are preposterous! Whence she comes or where she abides, no human being can tell, but her will is communicated to mankind by some inscrutable instinct, and with a marvelous submission her subjects follow and yield to her wildest fancies. The rich and poor, high and low, intelligent and dull, saint and sinner, are slaves to her desires; the wealthy and independent are the quickest to fawn upon her, and no matter how tyrannical her reign, they glory the more in their idol, and are her most eager votaries. Should man in his greatness rise to overthrow her mandates, or refuse allegiance to her laws, Queen Fashion's premier, Society, frowns upon him and he is cast into the disgraceful abyss of old fogysm and eccentricity.

"The notion is nearly everywhere prevalent that whatever is fashionable is right; it would have few objections made to it if the reverse were as true, that whatever is right should be fashionable. If such were the case, not so many, as now do, would leave unpaid the tradesman and the state, to worship long and lovingly at the shrine of fashion."

Theological Wrangling

BY WILLIAM H. RUSSELL.

The combative spirit is common to mankind. Whether, as the phrenologists tell us, there is an original faculty in human nature inclining men to fight, which, by an excess of growth, overbalances the other faculties; or there is some other cause for it, the fact is evident that a disposition to contend with each other has ever been prevalent among human beings. Some seem to quarrel from a mere fondness for strife; others, however, seek some pretext to justify themselves for whatever contests they engage in. This is especially true of theological combatants. These are almost universally found in "the sacred orders;" they have been set apart for the defence of the truth, and, of course, they must discharge their sacred functions. They have high authority for their line of conduct;—"Earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints," is the injunction of holy writ, and nothing more is needed to fire their souls with sacred ardor for God's cause. Woe, then, to the unfortunate heretic who ventures to hurl a dart, however feebly, against the truth as they understand it!

The zealot for God's holy cause, allows nothing to stand in the way of his divine rage. He smites his foes on the right hand and on the left. "Athanasius contra mundum" is conspicuous on the banner which he unfurls to the breeze, and he bids defiance to every adversary. But, unfortunately for the peace of society, some Arius is usually found to accept the challenge; and then begins the wordy strife, which ends, if not in blood, as in ancient times, yet in embittered feelings in those who engage in the controversy, and hostility more or less marked between those who take sides with either combatant.

But, thanks to the diffusion of better views respecting human duties and obligations, the rancor once existing among theological disputants is greatly softened. It is true there are parties still that look upon each other with suspicion, fearful lest something terrible may ensue by the prevalence of one or another set of opinions; yet one cannot fail to see that there is in the present age a greater inclination than formerly existed, to discover what good thing there may be in this or that body of religious people. Let this continue, and the best consequences may be expected. For where there is a disposition to praise whatever good may be found, instead of looking after some heretical dogma, each body of people will be emulous of the good, and more ready to abandon their senseless, wordy contests about mere speculative views. And this, in fact, is "the faith once delivered to the saints." It was the faith of Jesus, who proclaimed the reign of Divine Love, and who referred his adversaries to the good he had done as a proof that the doctrines he taught were of divine origin. It was the faith of the Apostles, who labored incessantly to form a church, distinguished by the love its members should bear to each other, and by the blameless life they lived, so as to become an acceptable offering to their Divine Head. It will be found by those who carefully look at the matter, that Paul, theologian as he was, aimed to bring all the converts of Christianity to a unity in the life of Christ, and not to form a mere set of Theological Institutes; though unfortunately, contentious minds have since his day made his writings a mere football on the arena of theological strife.

There have always been those who have insisted that their peculiar dogmas shall be accepted by others, because to themselves these opinions seem of so much importance. And that is the ultimatum of their gospel. They do not seem willing to present with the strongest array of arguments they can command, what seems to them to be truth, and then let it rest to be accepted or rejected by others according to their own judgment. They want others to admit the superiority of their views, and, as a matter of course, of their judgment. Hence, they are ready to attack all opinions opposite to theirs, though these may have been as carefully formed as their own. There certainly can be no objections to efforts for the discovery of every truth in God's universe, and for the promulgation of the same; but why insist that we have the truth if we cannot prove it? And if we can prove what we present, there need be no fear but it will be ultimately accepted by all, though the discoverer's name should be buried in perpetual oblivion.

The life of Christ proves itself divine to all who accept it and walk in it, and there is no controversy respecting it among all such. It is the "shining light that shines more and more unto the perfect day." Love, kindness, gentleness, fidelity to duty, and peaceableness of conduct produce no strife. Those only who are destitute of these, but possess the opposite qualities, are the originators and promoters of the contentions that curse the world.

"The Day Dawns."

EDITOR SHAKER: If you think the enclosed worthy a place in THE SHAKER, as evidence that "the heaven which the woman (Ann) hid" is working, please insert. Such an article could not have found a place in the London Quarterly a very few years since. Let us thank God and take courage—"The day dawns." Yours, JOHN WHITELEY.

THE FEMININE ELEMENT IN THE DEITY.

The London Quarterly, in discussing the feminine element in our conception of God, says: "To Protestants the worship of the Virgin is a superstition, graceful and beautiful in many of its aspects, no doubt, but, like all other superstitions, liable to run into extravagance, and to ally itself with fancies socially injurious and absurd. We are, therefore, discreet and prudent in not allowing this element to creep into our habits of religious worship. Nevertheless, we have something to learn from it; it indicates a want, an instinct which we have too long disregarded—the want of affectionateness, tenderness, and love in our conceptions of the Deity in His relations to us, and our relations to Him. The reason why our services are so cold, so dry, so formal, so fruitless of any sweet and genial results in actual life, is perhaps owing to our inaptitude or slowness to conceive of the feminine element in the character of our Creator, and to a notion that piety ought always to be manly, as we call it, and never womanly. If, however, any Protestant, believing in the superiority of his faith, contemplates the conversion of the Roman Catholics, he may be sure that he will make little or no progress (especially among women), until the defect of his cold system is cured, and his want supplied; until by him and his Church the Supreme comes to be regarded tenderly as well as reverently, with the affections as well as the intellect, familiarly as well as awfully, as a father that pitieth his children, as a shepherd that taketh the lambs in his arms. If from conceptions of dignity and respect, of power, awe, and majesty associated (and fitly associated) with God, a certain order of minds find it hard to supplement any softer or more commonly human element, they will find that whatever the effect may be as regards their personal religion, they will have very small influence indeed over the hearts of their fellow-men; they may teach philosophy, but they will not enkindle piety. They will find that what they cannot add, humanity in general will add, because it instinctively must, and that if men are forbidden by philosophy to incorporate pity and soft tenderness into their ideas of Supreme Deity, they will fall back upon some other deity associated with the Supreme, less wise and powerful, perhaps, but more gentle and kind. Can we love the same being whom we honor, reverence, worship, and obey? We answer, Yes! provided we have presented to us the loving and lovable qualities of his character. Many clever people, however, seem practically to answer, No, because from some cause or other they fail to appreciate the sweetness as well as the light of the divine nature. But poor humanity refuses to be haled in its affections, and hence the worship of Notre Dame, instead of Notre Dieu."

Woman's Visitation.

BY ALONZO G. HOLLISTER.

Poor, oppressed, feeble woman, who has hitherto been considered mostly as an appendage to man, useful or ornamental—a convenient piece of household furniture, having no more rights than a born slave, is at last visited; and in the face of custom, prejudice, man-made laws, and the accumulated wrongs of sixty centuries, is liberated from her degraded vassalage, and enabled to assume her proper station beside the most exalted virtue—a virtue which only one man had before her attained, and which was deemed so far above human capacity, that men ascribed it to Divine Power and ceased striving to reach it.

Does not this event mark an era in human progress more significant and full of promise than any that has preceded it? What more potent cause of human degradation and misery could exist, than for man to be bound by inexorable law to woman, and woman at the same time denied her proper rights, trodden under foot, and evermore despoiled of purity and innocence, which alone give beauty and elasticity, with the sweetest graces to the mind, and wings to those aspirations which lift the soul heavenward?

What, but the enmity of the serpent working in this channel? God said, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed." The serpent's turn was first; and as long as man and woman loved to have it so, and mutually cherished that serpentine nature, depicted in ancient lore thus: "I find more bitter than death, woman, whose heart is as snares and nets, and her hands as bands," no remedy could be applied. In such case, though every unjust statute on the books had been erased, the cause that produced them, operating in the channel of "desire" or lust, would still tyrannize over, and "accuse" those who should be, as brethren and as sisters. The private torture of domestic tyranny, through the operation of disorderly passions, is a far more grievous fountain of bitterness than all the laws of the statute books and public opinion added, as millions of sufferers can testify.

But after having suffered enough from that enmity, and eaten sufficient fruit from that deadly root to desire escape from it at any cost, even to the loss of all things, God mercifully sends down a power to fulfill the pledge given in this promise: "It shall crush thy head"—this was in Christ's first appearing; "and thou shalt lie in wait for her heel,"—at the second appearing. (Douay translation).

Expositors generally concede that Jesus Christ was the woman's seed who was to crush the serpent's head; but having only a glimmer of the true light, under the veil of antichrist, they do not appear to understand how it was accomplished, nor that the same work must be effected in every soul that would participate in its benefit. His testimony, which was the exposition of his practice, we have in these words: "If a man come unto me and hate not his father, mother, wife, children, brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."

Never man spake like this before, and no wonder they were astonished at his doctrine, for even to this day, but a few of mankind have been able to receive, or even to comprehend its true meaning. That is to come. As his was a mission of peace and good will to all men, he could not mean we should hate persons, but those selfish ties of flesh and blood which arise from these relationships, and that worldly self-pleasing life which produces and sustains them. We have no account that Jesus ever taught hatred to anything else, and this shows us where and what the serpent's seed is.

The serpent of perverted generation, as well as natural reproduction, received a deadly wound from the life and testimony of Jesus and his immediate followers, who, by their perfect obedience to the new creating word, received a power which returned the serpent's enmity upon his own head. But after the fall of the Primitive Church, by its connection with the generative order through the unredeemed woman, the artful doctors and creed mongers of antichrist's kingdom, contrived to heal the wound, and preserve the serpent to "lie in wait" for the woman's heel.

What further of the serpent tender is recorded in the Prophet Micah? "Arise and thrash, O daughter of Zion; for I will make thy horn iron, and thy hoofs brass; and thou shalt beat in pieces many people, and I will consecrate their gain unto the Lord, and their substance unto the Lord of the whole earth," by smothering the selfish ties and crucifying the lusts of natural generation—the serpent's seed—and devoting their substance to a sacred and united interest, spiritual and temporal. Here a daughter is represented as co-operating in the same work that was appointed for the son, to whom it was given to "rule all nations with a rod of iron, and to dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." How did they obtain this power? By perfect obedience.

As it is now the woman's day, with the man, to hate the serpent and his seed in all their alluring, deceitful arts, to cut loose from their snares and bands, and root all their ties from her soul; "all the morning stars sing together, and the sons of God shout for joy," while the work progresses. For "now has come to us salvation and strength, the kingdom of our God and the power of his Christ." We have both Father and Mother abiding with us; and spiritual sisters, and brethren, and children are our relation; and these are the "Virgins that rejoice in the dance, both young and old together."

Our Eden is restored, and if our trials are more severe than those of the first Eden, our knowledge is greater, and so is the prize for which we wrestle; and with such faithful parents for exemplars, every honest, upright soul that cleaves to them must surely win.

Christian Spirit.

BY CHAUNCY DIBBLE.

Being in Saratoga, I was accosted by one who thought that the very chaste life the Shakers live, renders them too docile, unspirited, unfit for social life or its enterprises.

We disprove this fact, by enjoying the largest amount of innocent socialism of any class on the earth. We believe it to be a Christian enterprise, to cultivate love, peace, economy and industry, untinted by lust, wars, extravagance or laziness. We are professedly nonresistants—this was a specialty in the character of the author of Christianity, and will be in his humble followers—but is not copied by those popularly called Christians. If the indulgence of the lustful propensities is a necessary stimulus to active life, such cannot be Christian life; and we abjure the enterprises that spring from such a source. Thousands of instances daily occur, that are specimens of the motor of animal, generative life; and while these stain the pages of civilized journalism, we will be content, in being called spiritless by the world, if we can only be brimfull of the living spirit of Christ.

Work and Win.

BY DANIEL ORCUTT.

However difficult the obstacles may appear to the novice in the self-denying way, remember, that if you commence the work with earnestness of purpose, your efforts will be crowned with success. A wavering, doubting mind never did, and never will accomplish anything worth naming. There is nothing like a fixed, firm, steady aim in the gospel cause, that will ensure victory. The true crossbearer, by vigorous, persevering effort, wins crowns of bright glory. It has been truly said, that no excellence is gained without earnest labor. How did our blessed Saviour overcome, and win that bright crown? And how did our ever blessed Mother gain that spotless robe which she wears? By resolute perseverance and patient toil. Oh, how worthy of imitation! Now, what has been done can be done again; and it is only those who work, that win. Therefore in our passage to heaven over life's rough sea, should billows arise to impede our progress, let us remember that constant, earnest labor will conquer all things. Be not discouraged at slow progress. Work on, discarding vices one by one, and "adding to your faith, virtues." Work patiently—Work and Win.

Truth Courts Investigation.

Nothing tends more to the improvement of the principles of light and truth in the mind of man, than a free, candid, and unprejudiced inquiry, and a willingness to examine into the truth of any tenets or practices which are at variance with his natural inclinations and prepossessions. Prejudice operates upon the mind like jaundice upon the eye, which prevents it from seeing objects except through a medium discolored by its own infirmity, and therefore it cannot form any just or correct ideas of what it does actually see.

It is to be lamented that popular excitement is often raised to the highest pitch by selfish, designing persons, who, like puppet-showmen, keep themselves artfully concealed. Public good is generally made the plea to obtain the gratification of private ambition or malice; and whatever may be the ostensible object of the instigators, whether it be of a religious, political, or other nature, the medium of excitement is the same—the passions are developed and prejudice created, the effects of which are in proportion to the estimated importance of the object held up to view.

Of all the objects of popular clamor, none are more calculated to make an impression upon the mind of man, than the subject of religion. This has been used as a cloak for persecution in all ages. The public mind is agitated by designing and interested men against some person, principle or system of religion, which stands in the way of their ambitious plans. Such was the excitement raised by Demetrius and his interested coadjutors against the apostle Paul among the Ephesians, who were persuaded to believe, that through the preaching of Paul, their religion was in danger, and "that the temple of the great goddess Diana would be despised and her magnificence destroyed;" while the real danger apprehended was the loss of the lucrative craft of the prime mover of the tumult.

In all ages, those religious persons and sects, however few or small, who, regardless of popular opinion, have presumed to think and act for themselves, and to advocate and practice virtue according to their own unbiassed judgment, have always been the objects of popular odium. And persecution against such has always been excited in proportion to the contrast of their principles with the popular feelings and opinions, and the self-denial which those principles required against the inbred propensities of human nature; because such principles are viewed as obstacles in the way of the interested designs of aspiring ambition.

The only efficacious remedy against the influence of such contaminating excitements, is calm and candid consideration, a sincere and impartial inquiry after light and truth, and a dispassionate examination of every principle presented to the mind that requires important action. The action will then proceed from deliberate judgment, and not from the impulse of passion. In tracing the history of the human race, we rarely find a heinous crime committed under the influence of calm consideration; but generally, if not always, under the excitement of some pernicious and baneful passion, and from some corrupt principle, which has been designedly instilled into the mind conformable to those passions. All evil speaking, all slanders, all defamation and detraction, proceed from these sources. No wars, no tyranny, nor persecution, could ever be supported by any other principle. If ever the civil and religious liberties of this nation are overthrown, it will be done through the prevalence of these causes.

When strenuous and increasing efforts are made to gain a religious ascendancy, and to obtain the passage of laws in favor of the opinions and views of popular sects who lay claims to orthodoxy, and when such laws are enacted to favor such schemes, and to operate against unpopular sects, then let the lovers of national liberty beware lest the consummation of these designs and exertions shall finally terminate in the baneful and dreaded combination of the civil and ecclesiastical powers to sway the destinies of our country. If this should once be accomplished, then comes an end, a final end to all the liberties and privileges, both civil and religious, which have hitherto been the distinguished portion of this highly favored nation.

The utility of every principle and system must be tested by its nature and effects. We therefore request the reader to examine, candidly and without prejudice, the tenets of our Society, and see if he can discover anything in the principles of its system incompatible with purity, justice, and charity—anything inconsistent with the social and spiritual happiness, or anything which is not compatible with the free agency of man, or with the civil and religious rights bestowed upon us by our beneficent Creator, and secured to us by the free institutions of our country.

All must be aware that obedience to Shaker principles requires great self-denial against the natural propensities of man. But surely, if we believe the testimony of our Saviour, (Luke xiv. 33.) this can be no proof that they are not the principles of genuine Christianity; and whether they are approved or disapproved, or whether they are agreeable or disagreeable to the feelings of human nature, no one can have any reasonable ground of complaint, nor cause of opposition, since all are at their own option to embrace them or not.

The faith and principles of our Society have been tested more than eighty years in this land. Originating from means apparently the most contemptible and inadequate, yet nevertheless, means destined to stem all the opposition of nature's passions, to confront the pride and ambition of the world, and the persecutions of the bigoted votaries of popular religions, they have increased and grown, and been gradually unfolded and extended, and have been received by many, until they have established a people in the united order of harmony, peace, and social happiness, which continues to excite the increasing attention and wonder of mankind. If individuals who have belonged to these Societies have violated their religious faith and principles, and refused to reform, they have been obliged, from the nature and operations of the principles, to depart, according to the declaration of our Saviour. Every branch in me that beareth fruit, my Father purgeth it, that it may bear more fruit; but every branch in me that beareth not fruit, my Father taketh it away. (John, xv. 1, 2.) No violation of virtuous principles being tolerated among us, unfaithful members must of necessity lose their union and relation to the Body, and go out from us, thereby showing they are not of us.

But it must be obvious to all, that persons coming into the Society must necessarily have a time of probation, in order to prove their faith and integrity, before their sincerity can be tested, and their ultimate union as faithful members be established.

Hence, during this probationary trial, it cannot reasonably be expected that every one who may reside in this community, though they may assume the garb and adopt the language common to its members, will be faithful representatives thereof.

It is by the well known and established principles of the Society, that every individual, professed member is to be judged. Therefore, whatever may be their profession, language, or garb, if they violate the sacred principles aforesaid, they are not in true union, nor proper representatives of the Community—and by this rule all men may know them.—Brief Exposition.

Personal Experiences and Testimony of Aaron Wood.

I early embraced the everlasting gospel of Christ's second appearing, which was revealed through our beloved Mother, Ann Lee, and those faithful witnesses of God who came with her from England. As I was intimately acquainted with these beloved witnesses, I feel it a duty I owe to God, to my own soul, and to the cause of truth, to make an honest declaration concerning my connection and acquaintance with them, and my knowledge of their character and ministration. In doing this, I shall relate a little of my own experience before I became acquainted with them.

When I was about twenty years of age, I was convicted of my lost state, and felt great concern for the salvation of my soul. I was sensible that I was daily increasing in sin against God, and I saw no way to escape his righteous judgment. I fled to the holy scriptures; but I found these condemned me. They testified that, "He that committeth sin is of the Devil." I cried to God as well as I was able; but found no relief—my trouble of mind daily increased. I attended the meetings of various denominations of professed Christians; but could find none that I believed really walked with God, according to the precepts and example of Christ. Thus my tribulation and condemnation increased for about the space of five years, until my life became such a burden to me, that I was tempted to put an end to my existence, in order to stop my career of sin. But thanks be to God, that he at length opened a way for my release.

About this time, I heard of a strange people who were persecuted and imprisoned in Albany, for their religion. I went from Sheburn, Massachusetts, where I then lived, to see them, and was soon convinced that they lived and reigned with Christ on earth. They spake the word of God to me, which was indeed "quick and powerful." They taught me to confess all my sins to God before his witnesses, and to take up a daily cross against all sin and all manner of uncleanness, and to live a just, holy and pure life before God and all men. I had so much faith and confidence in them, that I was ready and willing to confess my sins, which I did faithfully, and brought them out, one by one, as I had committed them. And the blessed gift of repentance which I felt, cleansed and healed my wounded soul, and released me from the fear of death and the torments of hell. And I can testify of a truth, that in obedience to the faith which I then received, I am saved from the commission of all sin.

In my first visit, I did not see Mother Ann. She had been previously moved from Albany to Poughkeepsie, and imprisoned in that town. This was in August. In the fall I went to see the Elders again, and staid with them one night in the prison. After Mother and the Elders were released from prison, I went to see them at Watervliet; and from this time I was with them the most of my time. I journeyed with them from place to place; and was with them in nearly all the places where they visited. I have suffered much persecution and affliction with them; and I thank God that I was counted worthy to suffer with them. I have been beaten and wounded by wicked, persecuting mobs, till the ground was besmeared with my blood. At one time

I was knocked down with a club, and was taken up and carried into the house for dead.

But these things were light in comparison with what Mother and the Elders suffered by the hands of lawless ruffians. I am confident that nothing short of the power of God, could have preserved their lives through such severe suffering as I have witnessed. I was with them at the time Mother was so shamefully and cruelly abused by that outrageous and horrid mob, which began at George Darrow's, in New Lebanon, on the morning of the 2d of September, 1783, and which continued until dark; the bare recital of which is enough to make humanity shudder, and bring everlasting disgrace upon the inhuman actors in it. Shortly after this, I went with Mother and the Elders from New Lebanon to Watervliet; I continued to live there with them for more than a year; and was daily conversant with them, dwelt in the same house and eat at the same table. I was there when Elder William Lee deceased, July 21st, 1784, and remained there till after Mother Ann's decease, on the 8th of September following.

Notwithstanding the evil reports that have been circulated abroad against Mother Ann, and the base charges of intemperance and lewdness, I can truly say, that in all my acquaintance with her, from first to last, I never discovered in her the least symptom of intemperance or lewdness, nor any kind of evil whatever. I always considered her to be the most godly person my eyes ever beheld. She truly loved and feared God, and taught the same to others. Her charity to lost souls was boundless; and her severity against sin was like a flaming fire. No wonder the world hated her; for she was not of the world. Hence they hate her, and say all manner of evil against her falsely. In doing this, they bring the greatest possible evidence in her favor.

And now I say unto you that utter false accusations: ye are the children of a persecuting generation. "Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers; that upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel," down to the suffering witnesses of God whom ye have persecuted and abused.

Eulogium.

Sister Lucy McIntosh, who, by natural death! left this, for the second phase of life, at the mature age of ninety-one years, was one of the very few remaining, whose identity with the society dates with its earliest history.

Her steadfast, devoted, and unselfish life, gave potency to her wise precepts; she preached by example. Important positions of care and trust have been honored by her integrity, intelligence and fidelity.

To those who knew her, she needed no other eulogy than her whole life. E. M.

Shaker Communism.

The revision of "Shaker Communism" was completed in London; printed there; has arrived; and we think it, excepting "The Compendium," the best work for the times issued by our Order. We recommend the same, enlarged, improved, and full of the spirit that should imbue the Churches. Amen.

Ho! Second Adventists!

In the Second Advent excitement of 1843, there was a peculiar feature manifested by many of its participants. Miller, with many thousands of disciples, firmly believed in the personal appearing of Jesus at that time; all the figures of Sacred Writ, with barely one exception, were supposed to point to the year of 1843. So sincere and zealous were the believers, that in preparation to meet the Lord, they progressed "from faith unto faith," in an exceeding personal purity. Hundreds, if not thousands, were convicted of the impropriety of the works of the flesh—of their non-fellowship with Christ—and long ere "the tenth day of the seventh month" arrived, these might have been found living as brothers and sisters in households that had previously known them only as husbands and wives. They perceived that neither reproduction nor the relations for the same, belonged to the realms to which they aspired, and cheerfully relinquished the same. Disappointed that Jesus did not appear, many concluded that the Second Advent had already occurred, or that the same would be manifested in a spiritual manner.

They sought a refuge, and many found this in Shaker Societies, whose members were believers in the truth that Christ had appeared "the second time, without sin unto salvation," in one, "like unto the Son of Man"—the daughter of man—and having been led, by the Christ angels, to the practice of such personal purity, like unto the Shakers, they were evidently prepared for the Christ Baptism which they found, and were satisfied with in Shaker homes and life. "Now," said Miller, "if there is a possibility of mistake in these calculations—and I do not see that it is possible—then is there but one possible solution left, and this conclusively points to the year of 1873!"

The near approach of "the end" of all calculations, brings to the minds of Second Adventists the same noticeable peculiarity of sentiment, and we hope, of life, that was such a prominent feature in 1843. None needs to be a very critical observer, to notice in all the literature of these sincere lookers for Jesus, a marked similarity between their sentiments, and Shaker life. Before me are the last two issues of The World's Crisis; and for purity of sentiment, we challenge the heavens.

Where such sentiment abounds, there are hopes that such testimony finds a response in active life. In testimony against all fleshly corruptions of the mind and body, I present an extract from The Advent Christian Times, which will forcibly remind many of testimony in a Shaker meeting:

"Here the body is to be blameless and presented so, unto the coming of Christ. Here is an explanation of the question, 'am I holy?' Is my body blameless? Are there foes within? When temptation comes, is there a response to it in my nature? Am I continually struggling to keep down my passions, lest they gain the victory over my love for Jesus? If so, then those passions are unholy and need something more than conquering. They need eradicating. The flesh needs cleansing in order for the body to be blameless. The spiritual emotions may be all right, but the fleshly emotions are all wrong. In this case the body is not holy, and I think we all believe the body is a very essential part of the man. Now then, am I holy? What shall we say to this inquiry? Is it yes, or no? Let it be candidly considered and answered, even if we find the response to be in the negative.

"A deliverance from this condition, so that a person's carnal desires in the flesh are dead, and the whole impulse of the body is spiritual, is the point under consideration. Can the body be controlled by the Spirit of God so that its emotions are not carnal but spiritual? A man 'finds a law in his members warring against the law of his mind,' and the question is, Can he be delivered from this condition?"

"This is an important question as the one, 'am I holy,' for if a person fully realizes that notwithstanding his love to God and his service, there yet remains the 'sin in the flesh,' it is very important to know whether it must always remain there during mortality, or whether it can be rooted out now."

Such are the proper Christian convictions, and these will bring Second Adventists we hope, into the necessary tribulation, by which they will be led "to wash their robes in the life of the Lamb," by confessing their sins, and repenting of the same, by a thorough leaving off of all fleshly transactions.

Then will they be led to the advanced faith, made manifest in the Crisis.

"Further, for a platform of Christian fellowship, true love will adopt one as broad as that laid down by our Saviour. On a certain occasion, being told that his mother and brethren desired to speak with him, he improved the occasion by stretching forth his hand toward his disciples saying, 'Behold! my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.'

"Brother, sister, how does your life compare with your profession? If you say you are abiding in Christ, to be consistent, you ought 'also to walk even as he walked.'"

We would that Christ make an appearance in 1873, or before that time; and we doubt not, but "those who look for Christ" in their lives, "to them Christ will appear."

We conclude with this assertion and prophecy: Jesus was crucified, his body buried; he ascended into the spiritual world; and no doubt has often visited the earth since. That which now so elevates the anticipations of Second Adventists, is the coming of the Christ Spirit that anointed Jesus, and will anoint many others.

When they are fully assured of their disappointment that Jesus will not appear; that their bodies will never rise; that the resurrection is spiritual, not carnal, we are ready now, as in 1843, to bless them with a refuge, filled with consolation, and present them to Christ, for whom they have looked; towards whom their testimonies have pointed, and for whose reception, we hope, they have endeavored to keep their bodies in all purity. Then will they sing with us:

"Are we fitted, and prepared Tabernacles of the Lord?"

Have we found the hidden pearl—Christ—the true Messiah?

Look not for him at the tomb, For the Living he's among;

There he'll meet you, there he'll come, and sit the Purifier."

We have received "The Equal Distribution of Wealth," being an Address of the Editor of Binghamton Times, N. Y. Its reasoning is good, but it puts so far off the accomplishment of its subject, that all may well despair of the Millennium by the means proposed. So long as mankind have husbands, wives, children, they will never yield the point of private possessions—but cherish these to an extent, equal to the possibility of attainment.

Let there be an "Equal Distribution" made to-day, and one year from to-day it would be far worse than yesterday. Jesus began his work by the denial of those selfish relations that will forever make the kingdom of heaven impossible, while actively engaged in. "Follow Me, is the true rule." *

The Editor's Appeal.

TO OUR PATRONS AND FRIENDS:—With this issue of THE SHAKER, we complete Vol. Second. We have again presented ninety-six pages of information of our life, faith and testimony, for the small sum of FIFTY CENTS! The actual cost has been much more. We have not presented a life and testimony that meet the "popular idea" of what should be the religious theology; but rather, have dealt in truths that were unpalatable to the masses, yet known to be truths, nevertheless.

By this conscientious course—the dissemination of truth—regardless of whether it pleases or displeases—it is almost a miracle, that we have been as successful in meeting our expenses. We do not believe there is a more radically religious monthly in the world—radical, so far as going down to the foundation of human woes and loss, illustrating their cause, effect and remedy, and aiming at the elevation of the whole human race. We have not attempted to attain unto a financial eminence; but rather, have from the first, been humbly content to meet our expenses, while doing the greatest possible good in the least possible space, at the lowest possible price.

While we can feel, that the pulse of so large a part of humanity is with us, sufficiently to aid us with the small pittance asked for THE SHAKER, we mean to live to uphold the standard of CHRISTIAN RELIGION, as lived by JESUS, unbiassed and unmixed with human follies and fleshly lusts. We are very grateful, dear friends, for your kindly recognition of the strife in which we are engaged—to live here, as all expect they must live hereafter; and though our little SHAKER may not completely effect the desired end—the salvation of innumerable souls from a further commission of sin—it will be an educator for the life that is to come. There are thousands who do not feel able nor willing to receive the saying: "Be a Shaker!" but whose admiration is challenged by the knowledge that there are some who can receive the saying "for the kingdom of heaven's sake;" and such pay a tribute to virtue, when they realize that our principles are "the salt of this poor earth." From such, and from all who love virtue, purity and goodness—from all who are interested in our standing uprightly for Christ's sake, and preaching the true gospel in our every-day life—from such we look for aid in sustaining THE SHAKER, by sending to us of your substance, according to your ability, and love

"For the cause, that lacks assistance—
For the wrongs that need resistance—
For the bright hopes in the distance,
And the good that all may do."

Again thanking you for past favors, we beg for the continuance of the same—for the renewal of the large number of subscriptions that expire with this issue. We promise to render in exchange, an increasing amount of true religious literature and song; to enhance the value of our medium by a greater variety of subjects; and generally, to devote our whole soul's effort for the best good of humanity. We should not feel it dishonorable to discontinue for the present; but replies from every part of the Union, from all classes of individuals, give this question an emphatic negative.

We shall, under this encouragement, "run well for another season;" and we hope to receive that tangible sympathy, without which our efforts for humanity, but not our love, must fail. We appeal, then, to all: Subscribe for THE SHAKER. Lend the Lord a half-dollar, and after many days it will return to you, in value, a thousand fold. And may you fare well in our peace, love and blessing, until we meet on Canaan's happy shore; and there, with one Lord, and one life like unto his, "we shall know of the doctrine," and part no more forever. *

Any one desirous of circulating a few copies of THE SHAKER, may obtain a select parcel, on application to this office. *

Bound copies of THE SHAKER, Vols. I and 2 together, will be sent, post paid, for two dollars and fifty cents. Bound separately, each, one dollar and seventy-five cents. *

We purposed an "Extra" with present number, but our dreadful fires have denied us the opportunity of preparing it. Should our DECEMBER issue be late, we beg the patience of our readers. *

TO NEWS DEALERS, BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS.—We want you to act as agents for THE SHAKER. On application, we will make to you the most reasonable terms. Send us your address, and try the sale of THE MOST RADICALLY RELIGIOUS MONTHLY in the world—THE SHAKER! *

SPECIAL NOTICE.

With the beginning of next volume of THE SHAKER the management changes. The present editor retires to the position of Publisher; and the present, able head of the Novitiate Orders of Shakers—Elder F. W. Evans—becomes its Editor, AND TO WHOM ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS SHOULD BE ADDRESSED. This is a consummation long and devoutly wished for. Let the subscriptions be sent to him "fast and numerous." *

SHAKER AND SHAKERESS

MONTHLY.

PUBLISHED BY THE UNITED SOCIETY.

F. W. EVANS,
EDITOR.

Mt. Lebanon, Col. Co. N. Y. January, 1873.

FIFTY CENTS
PER ANNUM.

SALUTATORY.

—o—

As Eighteen hundred and seventy-three (1873) is to be our date for the next twelve months, we desire for you a joyful, Happy New Year.

In accepting the chief editorship of our little paper, the burden is much lightened by the fact that I shall be supported by the experience of my "well done" predecessor, Elder G. ALBERT LOMAS, who has kindly consented to continue his contributions, and, also, to otherwise help in the publication and management of the Shaker and Shakeress.

His partial withdrawal is due to the heavy and afflicting losses by incendiary fires in the beautiful village of Watervliet, where he resides.

We would that those who have so ruthlessly inflicted these losses upon a quiet and peaceable people were possessed of a different spirit, and impelled by better motives. "But the wicked will do wickedly," and "one sinner destroyeth much good."

As one agency in saving and redeeming ourselves and our race from these existing and latent evils, from the antagonisms and animosities, envyings and divisions of interest in the present social system, we issue this, our Monthly.

We can sincerely and understandingly pray for those who seek our destruction, as we also labor and pray for "the peace of the city" and nation where our lot is cast. Our all of character, life, and property is embarked in and devoted to the work of human redemption. We intend, in our whole lives, to return good for evil, and to do nothing but good to poor, suffering humanity.

NEW PLAN.

Agreeable to our fundamental idea of a duality in the Divine government of the universe, and also in our own Society organizations, the Shaker will henceforth contain a department edited by Eldress Antoinette Doolittle, open to contributions from the Sisterhood of our Order; and to her such contributions, and other communications from females, both within and without the Shaker fraternity, may be addressed.

It is confidently expected that this arrangement will meet not only the warm approval of our own people, but also of our friends in the outer world, where woman's rights, duties, and privileges are being so intelligently discussed both in Europe and America.

The very interested attention which Shakerism, as a system of ideas, has hitherto attracted from the friends of co-operation and community, and which it is now attracting from Spiritualists, it is also destined to receive from the advocates of peace, of temperance, of hygiene and physiology, and from the woman's suffragists and land reformers.

Indeed, we invite all progressive minds and classes, all truth-loving, religious persons, from the most scientific rationalist to the revivalist, to take the Shaker and Shakeress, and thereby help us to inaugurate the blessed era of universal virtue, wherein civil governments and all society organizations shall, by their organic laws, do as we would individually be done by.

The Shaker Communities are but as the seeds of the future, or as a handful of grapes on the topmost branches of the "vine of the earth," to show what the full crop will yet be, when the fullness of the Gentiles shall have been gathered in, and humanity be harvested by the great reapers, Time and Truth.

MAN'S DUTY.

By Elder Abraham Perkins.

—o—

Man's duty consists simply in his being true to himself. With all the obligations he may be under to others, with all the cares, interest and regard to any living creature—to any earthly object coming under his observation, with all his indebtedness and responsibility to God and high heaven, if found unfaithful in any respect, then he is untrue to himself. That his cares and affections may become universal and unselfish, not circumscribed and confined to himself, his family, or special friends, his interests should be as broad as the Universe, and should reach the heavens, that he may be able to bless God and His work, and thus find his relation with the Angels. Indeed, his cares and affections should extend down into the lower parts of the earth, to be able to meet his fellow-man in earthly conditions, and express a sympathy and love that would touch his soul. They should penetrate prisons of darkness where the ignorant, the vile and the lowest elements of humanity may be taken hold of; where minds may be enlightened, educated, developed, and so elevated that man can live in God. Thus he would be able to comprehend his requirements, and become qualified to co-operate with Him, thereby becoming a saviour, to aid in the regeneration of the human race.

For, through man's agency, God has always worked to elevate human conditions, introduce reforms, reveal light, and open dispensations. And He has, by his Spirit, always prepared the way, by raising up individuals filled with knowledge, and baptized with power, sufficient to capacitate other souls to be equal to his requirements; to give progress in teaching, leading, protecting, and bringing mankind nearer to Him. Thus deputized, man becomes God's vicegerent upon earth, and opens the way for "Saviours to come up on Mount Zion" to judge the earth. "Know ye not that ye shall judge even angels?"

In all ages, from the days of God's everlasting covenant made with Abraham, to the giving of the Law, through Moses, and the delivering of Israel from captivity, through Deborah, to the preaching of repentance through John the Baptist, who opened the way for a still greater work—that of salvation from sin—through Jesus, who, by his anointing, became "the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, the Christ;" and still further down to the days of Ann Lee, the female Messiah, or Christ, whose testimony is before the world to-day a protecting, saving power unto those who accept and live it.

Ye seekers after a redeeming Gospel, ye who would know its practical operations, examine critically the life and doctrines of the Churches of to-day; and, when you have found the body whose members are "saviours," as was Jesus, mark such Church as the Church of God, and there make your offerings.

And let that Church which is not able to bear this investigation, no more name the name of Christ. And let the individual who is unable to endure this searching light of heaven, no more claim the appellation of Christian.

Truth will prevail, despite the obloquy and revilings of man, and despite the dishonor brought upon the cause of Justice, of true and undefiled religion, by weak and cowardly pretenders of the Christian faith. And though, for a season, truth be crushed, yet "Zion will arise and shine," and souls under its protection will alone triumph in glory.

THE SPIRIT OF PRAYER.

By R. W. Pelham.

—o—

To illustrate the true spirit of prayer and private devotion, we will consider the subject in the following light:

A child that has pure love and affection for its father, runs to him with simple joy and delight at every opportunity; it holds him by the hand as long as the occasion lasts; is always rejoiced to meet him, and sorry when duty requires a temporary separation.

In these joyful interviews, it prattles forth, in simple confidence, all its sorrows and all its joys.

It receives all the caresses and commands of its father with equal delight, and enters cheerfully into all his designs and wishes, having no desire but to please and do the will of its father. This represents the state of a soul, whose devotion is nothing less than his whole life given to God, and who embraces every opportunity of holding holy intercourse with the Father of spirits. In contrast with this, we may suppose a child full of self-love, self-will, and pursuits of its own, which, though it fears, does not love its father.

It is taught that it must go, at stated times every day, and bow and perform certain other acts of reverence to its father, and that if it neglect, the father will punish it with the greatest severity.

The same selfishness which prompts this child to pursue its own sports and mischief, may induce it to be very punctual in attending to these times and forms of reverence, not because it loves its father, but because its selfishness makes it dread the threatened punishment.

Hence, though it has no love for these acts of reverence, nor for its father who requires them, yet it will carefully perform them for its own sake. These acts of reverence form no part of its happiness, but are only performed to escape the misery of chastisement.

For this reason it always feels as if these requirements were a drawback from its happiness—a hindrance of so much of its time from pursuing its own ends.

Consequently it is always cramped, hurried, and confused when in the presence of its father; is sorry when the time of reverence has arrived, and glad when it is over. To set this in still another light, we may suppose a third child, which is not driven to these acts of reverence by threats and dread of punishment, but by promises of reward in apples, cakes and toys; such things as it loves. Now, as the father is not the object of its love, but the objects of reward which he has offered, though the child may be very punctual in attendance, and have the appearance of love and zeal, perhaps equal to the first-mentioned child, yet, as its motives are purely mercenary and selfish, this external show of respect to its father, though specious, is unreal. Self is the idol of the child's heart. As a proof of this, let the father withhold his wonted rewards, and, though he be otherwise kind, you will see a sudden change in the zeal of the child. It is disappointed of its mercenary expectations, and is full of murmuring and discontent. As soon, therefore, as it gives over all expectations of receiving any more rewards, having nothing to hope, and never having been taught to fear, it will throw off all restraint and wholly neglect to reverence its father. Thus will it be with mercenary worshippers of God, who serve him for reward and not from love. While the child which truly loves its father will forget its cakes and toys, and forsaking them will run to his father and be wholly satisfied with his company, hearing his counsel and doing his will.

"Verily, except ye become as this little child, ye can in nowise enter into the Kingdom of God."

THE ANGEL OF LIFE.

By Elder H. L. Eades.

—o—

It is certainly true, that the angel life is one of innocence and freedom from sin. But, as "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God," the possibility of a sinless state, in this life, is questioned, doubted, disbelieved, by the world, professor and profane; they say, "the child must make crooked marks before it can make straight lines;" "the girl must thrum discords, before she can produce harmonies," etc. This is true; but, if the child always makes the straightest lines possible, it is all the time doing right; hence, sinless. The same with the music. But, should the child wilfully make crooked lines, which is not a necessity, this would be sin, but it does not follow therefrom, that straight lines and harmonies are an after impossibility. The first difficulty says Cardaillac is this:

"The first part of our life is fled before we have the capacity of reflection and observation; while the impressions which we receive from earliest infancy, are from material objects. The wants of our animal nature, and the prior development of the external senses, all contribute to concentrate, even from the first breath of life, our attention to the world without.

"The second, passes without our caring to observe ourselves. The outer life is too agreeable to allow the soul to tear itself from its gratifications, and return frequently upon itself. At the period when the material world has at length palled upon the senses (which it invariably does at some period of life), when the taste and desire of reflection gradually become predominant, we find ourselves, in a certain sense, already made up, and it is impossible for us to resume our life from its commencement, and to discover how we have become what we now are." "Hitherto," says Ancillon, "external objects have exclusively riveted our attention (not necessarily so), but let us recoil upon ourselves; the scene changes, the charm is gone, difficulties accumulate, in a word, every thing within repels, every thing without attracts, and thus it is our life runs like water through our fingers—carried along, lost; whelmed in our life, and the reflective Ego which distinguishes self from its transitory modifications is never developed in the majority of mankind at all."

Now it seems that the possibility of obviating the foregoing difficulties to the angel life had not occurred to these philosophers. "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." How much superior was the exalted and inspired wisdom of Mother Ann, who fairly cut this gordian knot by her teaching that all children should be taught to turn their thoughts within, on spiritual things, by the time they were four years old, and thus grow in favor of God as well as men, and retain their angelhood, that when the second stage spoken of should arrive, they would have a balance wheel to steady their action, thus entering into greater harmonies instead of beginning at this late day to thrum discords. All who have neglected her advice have woefully witnessed the truths enunciated by these philosophers, and can fully sympathize with the feelings of a conscientious world's schoolmaster who writes as follows:

"There is considerable enjoyment in teaching these boys. But oh! what a bitter grief it is to watch the gradual course of their corruption. Nothing seems to drive the angel out of them so fast as sexual vulgarity. There are boys here who were really cherubic when I first came among them. With what yearning tenderness I used to lean over them. They also have eaten of the tree of knowledge of good and evil—have become as gods—have discovered their nakedness, and so have begun to adjust the fig leaves."

At this stage we must admit the difficulties to be great, though not absolutely insurmountable. The spiritual neglected; the cerebrum put to bed and sound asleep. The cry comes up "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there?" A skillful one is now in demand, and if the spirit brain cannot be roused into action, the case is, at present, hopeless. We must see the poor victims, one after another, prostrate before the god of this world, and lead for a season a life of sin, until the third stage spoken of arrives and reflection and reason return, when, if they have suffered enough, they may now take the Father's advice, and begin to become as little children, and by confessing, repenting of, and forsaking all sin, may yet be one of that innumerable number which was seen, besides the 144,000 virgins who followed the Lamb, etc. But the danger is, that the mass of them will be swallowed up in some of the popular sects of whom a certain writer says:

"The popular religions north and south are but devilish counterfeits of christianity; they have ceased to be the light of the world. Instead of being a terror to evil doers, they have become their safest hiding places," etc.

Hence, knowing and confessing themselves to be sinners, priests and people, they resort to a vicarious atonement, of which, Gregg, in his "Creed of Christendom," thus pertinently discourseth:

"Sin contains its own retribution and penalty, as surely as the acorn contains the oak. Its consequence is its punishment. It needs no other, and can have no heavier. Its consequence is involved in its commission, and cannot be separated from it. Punishment (let us fix this in our mind) is not the execution of a sentence, but the occurrence of an effect. It is ordained of God to follow guilt. This conviction, once settled in our understandings, will wonderfully clear up our views on the subject of pardon and redemption. Redemption becomes then a regenerating process. We can be redeemed from the punishment of sin only by being redeemed from its commission. Neither can there be any such thing as vicarious atonement, which is a relic of heathen conceptions of an angered Deity, to be propitiated by offerings and sacrifices. Punishment, being the result of sin, cannot be borne by other than the sinner. It is for orthodox dialectics to explain how divine justice can be impugned by pardoning the guilty, and yet vindicated by punishing the innocent. The sin which has absorbed our soul may be repented of—may be turned from; but in the case of a sin of which you have induced another to partake, you may repent of, you may, after agonizing struggles, regain the path of virtue, your spirit may re-achieve its purity through much anguish, and after many stripes; but the weaker one whom you led astray, whom you made sharer in your guilt, but whom you cannot make sharer in your repentance and amendment, whose downward course (the first step of which you taught), which you cannot check, you are compelled to witness. What forgiveness of sin can avail you there? There is your perpetual, your inevitable punishment."

It must be admitted that the sin here commented on, is, above all others, the most heinous, probably the last to be forgiven, but even this must sometime in vast eternity have an end, else the appalling doctrine of endless hell torments would be true, which is revolting when we remember God is good as well as just. Our good parent, Father James Whittaker, took a lively sense of its enormity when he publicly remarked that it was a "great consolation to him to know that no human beings could lift their eyes in hell and point to him as the cause of their misery," and happy are all who can in truth say likewise.

After all, friend Gregg to the contrary notwithstanding, there is such a thing as pardon. If thy brother trespass against thee, if he repent, forgive him, pardon him. So can a merciful God lift the sufferings from a soul that has repented and made all amends in his power. If he could not, then the attribute of mercy were unnecessary. "Whosoever sins you (my successors), remit—pardon—they are remitted unto them." Jno. 20, 23.

DUAL GOVERNMENT.

By Elder W. Leonard.

—o—

"In the beginning God created man, and called their name Adam." Thus the race was started under generative law; and this law they were to bind upon their children. Their order was complete, and God blessed them, and said to them, "Multiply and have dominion over every living thing which moveth on the earth." If they stood upright the government would stand; if they fell, it would be broken. They did fall, and sorrowful have been and are the consequences to the race.

By this fall, and their posterity "sinning after the similitude of their transgression," we were all brought under the curse of broken law. Consequently man seized the power to rule over woman, and she lost her standing by his side, and all rights pertaining thereto. Reasoning from these premises, it is plain that it was not intended that the earth should stand exclusively under male power. The Patriarchal rule, the Law, the first Gospel Age, the Witnesses, in both sexes, all point to a steady struggle to reproduce a dual government in these last days.

The Church, brought in by Jesus, was still under male rule, which rendered it imperfect. Its founders and leaders saw and preached but in part. Jesus, reasoning from the past, upon what was yet to come, predicted a falling away. He foresaw that Christ's second coming would be like unto a marriage; or would produce a Church governed jointly by man and woman, corresponding to the first Adam, the figure.

This government, as was predicted, commenced with the Latter-day Church. Ann Lee, a great revelationist, received from the Christ Spirit the same light and principles that were lived out by Jesus. She established a Church strictly under male and female government, which has existed nearly a century, restoring woman to her place, which she lost by the fall.

Ann Lee, and the best seers in her Order, predicted that dual governments would become universal; and the best evidence of the truth of their revelations are the changes which have come over spiritual and earthly governments during the last half century.

Then, to suffer not a woman to speak in public, especially the churches, was the rule and not the exception. Many leading minds have seen and acknowledged the principles of this Church, but have stumbled at this dual government. They have hesitated, doubted, and stood back; and the Church has sadly felt the effects of such hesitation; but, like an army with banners, onward moves this new governmental idea in the civil and ecclesiastical world of thought.

Half a century since, women could find no place as teachers, as public lecturers, critics on political matters, voters, or preachers, as they now do. All this has a significant meaning, and the question is, what will it grow to and end in?

Who would have thought, in the days when John Endicott hung women in Boston for daring to speak in public after he commanded them not, and found support from men taught in the old school theology, that, in less than two centuries after, halls and pulpits would be opened to them by the hundred; or that scientific and legislative bodies would give them public hearing? Who would then have dreamed that, in the councils of this nation and from every quarter, a host of strong-minded men would speak out and demand for women the right of suffrage? Evidently such a condition of things is upon us; and who, in view of this can say there has not been a steady advance, toward a dual government, since God established it in this Church and Order?

For ages past, a period of universal peace has been predicted, from which innumerable blessings would flow to nations and peoples. Be it remembered that this was to come in the latter days. Appealing to universal history, are we to expect this millennial state to result from the rule of man alone? When political troubles have arisen among disagreeing rulers, men have furnished swordsmen by regiments, and have always been ready to turn out their warriors instead of peace-makers. Men suffer greatly in war by their barbarity; but women have been by far the greatest sufferers. Millions of them have lost fathers, husbands, sons and friends who have been sacrificed upon the battle fields of the various nations of the earth.

Besieging armies have indiscriminately slain untold numbers of mothers and infants. Mothers and daughters have been worse than murdered, and left to starve; they have been carried into captivity and sold as slaves, or left to perish by thousands in barren and desolate places of the earth.

If noble women find their places in national councils, will they not look back on these bloody pages of history and strive to turn the weapons of cruelty into plow-shares? Will they not labor to have the prophecies of the ancient sons of God fulfilled? Is not God pressing on this movement, in order to bring about this universal brotherhood for which the world, through the instrumentality of dual governments, seems stirred up to work and look?

Man first invented the still, and from it he has poured out the liquid fire that has scourged and consumed large portions of the race. It has proved a curse to both sexes, and a moral desolation to all nations, filling prisons, lunatic asylums, and pauper houses, and turning the feet of many into the paths of sin and sorrow.

No pen can paint the sufferings that have been brought upon our world by this terrible evil, and upon women in particular. Accordingly, we see her rising up in society, striving to banish the pest, and lift the curse from herself and children.

Temperance reforms have not proved a perfect success: popularity and pride have required large revenues for support. Statesmen, to collect these, have worked against these reforms. Their laws so encourage distillation and importation remain in full force. Thus, those men who sit at the helm of power by law crush out all temperance experiments, and drunkenness still continues among all classes, statesmen themselves setting the example. Would this be if Woman had the ballot, and a place in the councils of the nation? Judging from their past example in temperance and other reforms, we think not. As long as navies and standing armies exist, and intemperance is thus supported by law-makers, it is impossible to uproot prostitution. From the day that woman receives her political rights, which the age will surely grant, better laws and morals may be hoped for. The reform will pass through both Church and State.

For nearly a century the Shaker Church has stood under this form of dual government, and proved its blessings. Their spiritual and temporal government both stand in this Order, and they have never ceased to pray that, under the law of progress, it may yet find its place in every land and nation upon earth. Whenever this takes place, society will begin to realize the ruling power of this Church, what it is, and where it originated; and, though it may be new to the age, they will find it as old as the heavens; that it began in the morning of creation, and, instead of opposing, the rational, thinking classes will advocate it.

From their own political plane they will cast their eyes upward, and see that, while they enjoy it on earth, the dual order exists in the mansions of the blessed.

BEAUTIFUL EXTRACT.

The following extract from Frederick W. Robertson, expresses the laboring thoughts of my mind better than I could find words to do it with. The Bible and Inspiration are subjects of investigation fully in order at this present time.

"The INSPIRATION of the BIBLE is a large subject. I hold it to be inspired, not dictated. It is the Word of God—the words of man; as the former, perfect; as the latter, imperfect. God the Spirit, as the Sanctifier, does not produce absolute perfection of human character. God the Spirit, as an Inspirer, does not produce absolute perfection of human knowledge; and for the same reason in both cases—the human element which is mixed up with the Divine element—else there could have been no progressive dispensations. Let us take the case, the history of the creation. I hold that a spiritual revelation from God must involve scientific incorrectness: it could not be from God unless it did. Suppose that the cosmogony had been given in terms which would satisfy our present scientific knowledge, or say rather, the terms of absolute scientific truth. It is plain that, in this case, the men of that day would have rejected its authority; they would have said 'Here is a man who tells us the earth goes round the sun, and the sky which we see to be a steroma fixed and not far up, is infinite space, with no firmament at all,' and so on. 'Can we trust one in matters unseen who is manifestly in error in things seen and level to the senses? Can we accept his revelation about God's nature and man's duty, when he is wrong in things like these?' Thus, the faith of this and subsequent ages must have been purchased at the expense of the unbelief of all previous ages. I hold it, therefore, as a proof of the inspiration of the Bible, and divinely wise, to have given a spiritual revelation, i. e. a revelation concerning the truths of the soul, and its relation to God, in popular and incorrect language. Do not mistake that word incorrect; incorrect is one thing; false, another. It is scientifically incorrect to say that the sun rose this morning, but it is not false, because it conveys all that is required, for the nonce, to be known about the fact, time, etc. And if God were giving a revelation in this present day, He would give it in modern phraseology, and the men He inspired would talk of sunrise, sunset, etc.

Men of science smile at the futile attempts to reconcile Moses and geology. I give up the attempt at once, and say, the inspiration of the Bible remains intact for all that—nay, it would not have been inspired, except on this condition of incorrectness.

"Neologianism is a large word, and embraces an almost endless variety of views; but, to be candid, I look upon Bibliolatry with quite as much dislike as Arnold did—as pernicious, dangerous to true views of God and His revelation to the human race, and the cause of much bitter Protestant Popery, or claims to infallibility of interpretation, which nearly every party puts forth. I believe Bibliolatry to be as superstitious, as false, and almost as dangerous as Romanism."

I think quite so; they are mother and daughter.—Ed.

CELIBACY.

By Daniel Frazer.

"What are the effects of abstinence from exercising the generative functions?" Freedom from all diseases of those functions.

"What does your eighty years' experience contribute to physiological science?" It contributes the above important fact.

"What forms of disorder arise from such abstinence?" No specific form of disease is incident to a virgin life—the life we live. We enjoy better health than do those outside our body.

"How does it affect length of days?" Favorably. The writer is seventy years of age; was thirty when he came here, and indorses the above answers in all their details. To philosophers and physiologists we say, form your theories according to the above facts, and we will abide the result. We assume that man is in possession of and manifests a two-fold life. The lower, represented by the baser propensities; the higher, by the attributes of goodness, truth, mercy, and all aspirations God-ward. In view of this assumption, the above questions may be summed up by one inquiry: "Can men and women live, in the exercise of the higher, divine life, to the exclusion of the exercise of the generative functions?" We take the affirmative of this question, and it is for philosophers, medical men and others, to show—give evidence—that the position we have taken is untenable; when they do, we will meet them with an experience of nearly a hundred years. And this experience is barely a drop to the bucket of the experience of past ages.

In Thibet, celibate institutions have flourished for thousands of years. The Brahmans and Ascetics of India can speak of their experience also. To-day, China and Japan have their celibate orders. There, existence in these stereotyped civilizations is an inverted prophecy—that celibacy has existed in these countries for untold ages. The Therapeutæ of Egypt present their experience. The Essenes of Judea had their celibate communities. The order of the Vestal Priestesses in ancient Rome lasted about one thousand years; and the monastic orders of Europe, down to the present day, about two thousand years. And, strange to say, before Columbus touched these shores, Mexico and Peru had each their own civilization, and celibacy was found in them both.

From every quarter of the globe we have concurring evidence that, whenever man has made any progress beyond being a mere animal, the law of the higher life has broken forth from celibate institutions. First in history, and foremost in the field, is Asia; next is Africa. Europe responds for more than two thousands of years in similar manifestations. Ancient America adds her quota of experience to the practicability of a virgin life. And lastly, the Shakers of modern America, in the sunlight of physiological law, and in all the well-understood relationships of social life, add their testimony to that of past ages, that a celibate life is not only practicable, but favorable to health and longevity. And it is a condition necessary to their wants—an essential preliminary to their happiness—the manifestation of the divine element in their spirits. Because of this life was Christ manifested in Jesus, to gather all into one fold, who progress above and beyond the procreative law.

The idea that a virgin life is a contravention of the Creator's plan, seems to me to be one-sided, and certainly is a low estimate of man's ultimate destiny; and is not sustained by man's nature, nor by the analogy of other created things. Human beings are as really subject to be reaped, as is the grain they sow. On this subject Jesus said: "Cannot ye discern the signs of the times? the harvest is the end of the world; the angels are the reapers, and ye are they on whom the ends of the world have come"—the ends of the generative life. In harvesting grain, the reapers gather the elements of their own bodies. So, in the harvest of the world, the angels gather those in whom the elements of angelic life are quickened. These, when gathered, will manifest the Divine civilization, in which are neither war nor want. "Their bread and water shall be blest, and sickness taken from their midst." The Shakers, as a people, are in the full realization of the former, and to the latter, freedom from disease, we are surely and steadily approaching. We take a practical view (as did Jesus), that all are not prepared, as yet, for this life. But we think that humanity needs our example, to which, if they do not attain, they may approximate.

From the wide-spread action of Spiritualism we anticipate greater results; its mission thus far has been to disintegrate old organizations and ideas; all their attempts to organize, heretofore, have made bad worse. When its present phase is accomplished, we trust, as a wave of spiritual light has reached rudimentary humanity, that it may be succeeded by a wave of light and warmth combined, necessarily convicting and organizing in its results. If the Spiritualists organize a higher civilization on the generative plane, and, if the more advanced portion realize a higher ideal than we present, we shall be most happy.

Outside of our Order there is a growing desire for a permanent amelioration of human conditions. Governments, which rule by brute force, as do lions, are not acceptable. The diseases that afflict humanity, especially those referable to the generative functions, are appalling. In the midst of plenty, and in the possession of the most productive agencies the world ever beheld, it is supposed that nearly twenty millions of persons in the British empire alone, have, during the present century, perished from lack of food. The power to possess wealth and to increase APPEAL TO THE SISTERHOOD.

—o—

The Shakers, who, as a people, were but little known or understood by the outside world (except through business transactions), were prompted by a sense of duty and the solicitations of friends to fit up, on the first of January, 1871, a small vessel called "The Shaker," and release it from its moorings where it had been securely anchored in a quiet harbor through the storms of nearly a century, and trim up its tiny sails, and send it forth over the great waters on a mission of love. It contained, as they believed, many treasures, which might be a blessing to others of earth's inhabitants, as they had been to them.

The plain truths which this little craft contained were unpalatable to some, while others hailed with gladness any medium of truth, though small in the beginning, as a harbinger of a good time coming. Truth is potent in removing error and in breaking down idol worship in the form of churchal creeds and lifeless ceremonies. Those who had been famishing on the dry husks of theology, and whose souls were longing for living, spiritual bread, said: "Send, Lord, by whom thou wilt." Such were prepared to read, consider, and understand.

At the end of twelve months, the little voyager came back bearing good tidings. It had made many friends while sailing to distant ports; and, although the waters were whitened with the sails of many large and powerful vessels laden with all kinds of wares, yet there seemed to be room enough for "The Shaker," and all had treated it with kindness and respect. Thousands were heard to say "Send out 'The Shaker' again; it has done us good." Again it went forth, and, at the close of the year 1872, it returns (like Noah's dove) to the ark, bearing an olive leaf. The meed that it brings is not praise merely, but the sound "It has been a blessing to us; we cannot do without it. Long live The Shaker! — 'It must not die.'" And now, in behalf of the Sisterhood of the Shaker fraternity, I would greet all the readers of our little sheet with "A Happy New Year." This is not merely a compliment, a meaningless sound passing the lips, but is heartfelt; and we pray that the light of truth may illumine your pathway, and that holy influences from angel spheres may surround you, and lift your thoughts and affections to things of enduring worth. This would augment the happiness of all.

And, my dear sisters of the Shaker Community, let me ask you all, as one, to unite, with renewed efforts, the coming year, to advance the good cause. Truth and virtue have always been maintained through individual self-sacrifice. Let us be thankful to be counted worthy to suffer, if thereby truth may be promoted. There is work to be done; a cross to be borne, and a crown to be secured; and woman must act her part. Let us be as angels in our own home; strew fadecless flowers — innocence, purity and love — in life's pathway.

This will attract angels from higher spheres, and they will commune with us. We shall, also, feel the blessing of our good brethren, who have resolved to eat the fruit of honest toil. When they go forth to plow the field and sow the seed, they will return to their peaceful home with gladsome hearts, knowing full well that they will meet kind-hearted, God-fearing sisters, who will welcome them, and administer to all their necessities.

How many magnificent dwellings there are at the present time, in our own country, with beauteous surroundings of shrubbery, choice fruits, and flowers of varied hue, and frescoed walls, and floors overlaid with costly tapestry within, that are destitute of all those essentials which make home desirable and pleasant. Luxury is there; but the white-robed angel of peace does not find shelter. Better and more to be desired is the humble cottage, with a scanty morsel, where peace dwells, than a king's palace where envy and strife bear rule.

And O, how many men there are at the present time who, by the unreasonable demands of their wives and daughters, in the eager pursuit of the goddess Fashion, are compelled to resort to unjust measures to procure means for such extravagance!

Ah, woman, how art thou fallen! Instead of being an angel-friend to lift man up in the scale of moral purity, your mediumistic powers are turned to demoralize him. Let this be a lesson for the daughters of Zion to study. By it let us learn to regard the law of use, and not be content to live upon the labors of our brethren, and eat the bread of idleness; but toil with them; aid them in all the duties of life; rejoice with them in prosperity, and suffer with them in adversity.

Do any of our outside friends ask What are the social conditions and spiritual enjoyments among the Shakers? We answer: True friendship; brotherly and sisterly affection; devoid of sensuality in our domestic relations; and, in our religious associations, we, in concert, raise our hearts and voices in prayer and praise; and feel that the heavens bow down while we become lifted up in spirit to meet loving messengers from higher spheres, who feed the spiritual part, (which cannot subsist upon gross, material things,) with immortal food. This, to us, is real joy.

SELF-DISCIPLINE.

By H. Bullard.

—o—

Conversion of heart, to my mind, is the correction of one's life; and this is the result of conviction of one's sins — a conviction deep and heartfelt. Were there more of this conviction in the Churches and in the schools; if, in every family, each individual were enjoined to carry into life, moral principles and religious truths, would not society be more benefited, than in all or any belief in preaching, that alludes to some righteous being, but requires no righteousness in our own lives?

In my Shaker home, in which I have enjoyed peace and plenty for more than thirty years, purity and righteousness are enjoined; while good works are the rule and not the exception required of the members; and these are taught as requisite to a Christian character, in a Christian community.

The early training of the child is quickly apparent in the human character. The physical constitution of the child is the foundation of the physical man or woman. Proper food, cleanliness, and a good, moral training for the correction and direction of the child, creating activity in virtuous ways, greatly add to its future character and happiness.

Discipline should not be outgrown with childhood; but, as the primary branches of education are to the collegiate course, so should be the discipline of the child to the adult in riper years. Self-government should be more severe than was the paternal; the moral and spiritual faculties should rule the animal passions; thus proving that individual improvement is the basis of general reform. "He that ruleth his spirit is greater than he who taketh a city;" and those who are able to bring every thought, word and action into submission to the law of Christ, stand forth noble specimens of humanity, a praise in the earth. From childhood to mature age, life should be a continuous unfolding of better existence, of superior principles, "progressing from faith unto faith;" as one position is gained, we should be prepared for another and advanced movement.

A progress is called for from Christian professors, from the plane of Adam and Moses, up to the life of Christ. The discipline will consist of thoroughly dropping the generative practices of humanity, and adopting the life of the heavens — heaven on earth. Passion subdued, peace ensues; the earthly or natural exercise of the passions abandoned, the spiritual or heavenly element is given the full control. This is a work all must perform for themselves; this is self-discipline for an eternal existence. Said Jesus: "I indeed lay down my life of myself, no man taketh it from me." This was his discipline, self-discipline, and of him, as our exemplar, let us "learn; for he was meek and lowly in heart" — disciplined for the heavenly life.

TRUE ESTIMATION.

—o—

If is often said that knowledge is power, and this is true. Skill or faculty of any kind carries with it superiority. So, to a great extent, wealth is power, and genius has a transcendent gift of mastery over man. But higher, purer, better than all these, more constant in its influence, more lasting in its sway, is the power of character — that power which emanates from a pure and lofty mind. Take any community, who is the man of most influence? To whom do all look up with reverence? Not to the "smartest" man (physically), not to the cleverest politician nor the most brilliant talker, but to him, who in a long course of years, tried by the extremes of prosperity and adversity, has approved himself to the judgment of those around him — of all who have seen his life as worthy to be called wise and good.

MISSION.

By Jane Cowan.

—o—

In perusing the columns of THE SHAKER, as it reaches our midst, on its Gospel mission, I am forcibly reminded that we need such influences as it brings to bear, to awaken in our minds those latent aspirations for spiritual food which appear to slumber in our breasts, without fully considering, as we should, the great necessity of seeking enjoyments, in a spiritual point of view, and rejecting the fitful pleasures of time, which will perish.

Not that the teachings heralded by that paper are wholly or in part different from the faith heretofore taught, and by the faithful lived, in the different Shaker Societies, for a goodly number of years; but I trust the time has now come that light and knowledge will become more widespread, and that, through the columns of this much-cherished paper, many will learn where to look for truth and righteousness, who are walking in darkness without knowing the way of life, or the requirements of God to mankind.

Seeing there is a strong desire on the part of the contributors to our paper, to disseminate true Gospel principles, and not suffer their hands to become slack, or their hearts to wax cold, with regard to spiritual things, so, in this light and in this hope, we rejoice that the way which God has marked out to be a "savior of life unto life, or of death unto death" to all, may be handed down as an immaculate treasure to those who have not been so favored as ourselves, but who might perchance receive the Gospel, believe and be saved; I concluded, though very weak the effort, to throw in my mite to uphold, so far as may be, the cause we are struggling to maintain.

In casting my eyes around to see the necessity of aspiring for and looking beyond earthly and transitory things, I see those who have walked in a humble, Christ-like manner; in short, have lived simple Shaker lives, and denied themselves of all earthly enjoyments, and have lived pure and chaste before God; their shining examples and virtuous deeds irradiate their countenances, until they seem like diamonds of light in our midst, and reassure us that we too may become the worthy recipients of God's favor, being harvested from the earth by our own virtues and godly life.

So, with these views on what does and will bring true happiness to the sojourner here in time, we are much pleased to see the efforts made, on the part of Believers, through THE SHAKER, to enlighten the minds of mankind as to what constitutes a true Christian; and how nearly the requirements of Believers comport with the life and teachings of the Saviour, who are able to say, "We are the way, the truth and the life; follow us as we follow Christ."

God's chosen people have ever been called upon to sacrifice their earthly desires and propensities; consequently, if we reach the goal they reached, less effort by us than they made cannot secure our eternal happiness.

Then, how comforting the thought that the way of life is made plain, and that, in addition to the life and example of Jesus, we have the way also marked out by Mother Ann which consummates the way of life, and confirms our faith in the plan of salvation as taught in this our day. There is a fullness of light and peace, beyond which we have no aspirations; but with it our souls can rest secure, feeling sure that, although the number may be small who will become true heirs of heaven, yet feeling conscious that there will always be a remnant who will retain the testimony, and consequently maintain the principles of the Gospel through all succeeding ages.

Who then, but an ingrate, can reject so high and holy a calling, to work out salvation here in time, and endeavor with their might to be eyes to the blind, and ears to the deaf, and a light to souls dead in trespasses and sin? this is certainly the duty of Zion's children; hence it is plain that all our endeavors should tend to elevate the human race, by ever pressing onward and upward, and in this way be a light to earth's weary pilgrims on their heavenly journey.

I WANT TO BE A SAVIOR.

By Anna Dodgson.

—o—

How often we are cheered by the sweet sound of the little chant, "I want to be an angel, and with the angels stand," as it comes from the lips of bright-eyed, juvenile innocence. And who is so hardened that her soul, upon reflection, does not affirmatively respond to the desired want? But I am thinking that for mature years, where furrowed brow, dimmed eyes, and whitened locks bespeak experience in this world of ours, we might with propriety sing of wanting to be, or becoming, saviors. O, how our world needs practical salvation! And is there not already a call for saviors to arise and stand on Mount Zion?

I want to be a savior and on Mount Zion stand,
With self-denial for my shield, and sword of truth
in hand;

To live a life that's sinless, in Innocence and love,
With wisdom of a seraph, and meekness of a dove.

I want to be a savior: then saved I first must be
From selfishness and envy; from worldly pride be free;
From base, low, groveling passion, I must have wings to rise,
Not seeking worldly glory, but reaching for the prize.

Like Jesus Christ our Pattern, the lowly Nazarene, Performing acts of mercy, each savior must be seen,
And boldly chiding error, with stripes, if needs should be,
Completes a savior's mission, as by the word we see.

We have two holy Patterns—Christ Jesus and Christ Ann,
Who've taught us to be saviors, and form'd and laid "a plan,"
By which each human creature who ceases from all sins
Becomes a Christ or Savior, whose mission here begins.

Then come, O come, ye saviors, and stand on Zion's hill;
There boldly rear your standard, your mission to fulfill,
To save from sin and sorrow all who will hear the call.

Be resurrected, born again, and freely give up all.
A practical salvation, in thought, in word and deed,
Brought forth by self-denial, is what our world
does need;
And many a blessed savior now on Mount Zion stands,
With crowns upon their heads, and harps within their hands.

HENRY VINCENT ON THE SHAKERS.

—o—

* * * "I contented myself with the results I saw before me, and thought them sufficiently remarkable to command the respectful and thoughtful attention of the Church and the world.

"I saw a community of men and women of all ages living a pure celibate life, under the same roof, full of sweetness, love, and gentleness—a happy family of brothers and sisters. I knew that many of them had been married men and women before they were led, by a religious principle and motive, to 'crucify all worldly lusts,' and enter into what they regard as the millennial state. I know that this life had been lived by monks and nuns, who were excluded from each other with a prison-like rigor, under lock and key, and bolts and bars; but here I saw a spiritual family—the once husband and wife entering upon a new life in the daily presence of each other—and that this chaste community had tested this life of purity for seventy years, without any cloud arising to dim the lustre of its chastity.

"Of course we all exclaim, 'How can these things be?' And the profligate and the base raise the yell of laughter; but the Shakers modestly reply, 'Not unto us, but unto God be all the glory.' The world laughs again, and slanders; but the answer is the FACT of this life, which this people lay open to the gaze of all the world. I saw, moreover, a people who will not hold private property—a people who rest securely and in perfect harmony and prosperity, upon a community of goods. The dream of Utopia is here realized. They work hard; they enjoy the fruits of their industry; they live simply and frugally. For ten years they have ceased to eat swine, or to drink alcoholic drinks, except under medical advice.

"I saw that this community of goods sprung from a deeper motive than a social or economical truth. Indeed, in one of their publications I found this paragraph: 'They could not understand how so-called Christians (brethren and sisters) could be members of the same religious body or Church, and be divided into rich and poor in the things of this temporary world, but who are vainly expecting that in the world to come they will all be willing to have eternal things in common.' Thus their communistic idea springs from a religious motive, and such a fact is worthy the contemplation of thoughtful men.

"I inquired into the internal working of the Community, as to how disputes or misunderstandings were settled, if they unfortunately arose. I was told that here again they adopted the Christian plan, speaking to the brother or sister alone, and, if that failed, 'tell it unto the Church;' and that so far all had moved on with harmony, and no serious difficulties had disturbed them. Another thing I have also seen in relation to the Shakers: Every one in America with whom I have spoken speaks highly of their moral character, of their truthfulness, of their honesty in their dealings with their fellow men. All bear this testimony, with the exception of those degraded people who believe there are no such things as virtue and truth on the earth.

"Surely the success of this community must have a cause. What is that cause? I do not pretend to answer the question. But it is a question worthy of an answer. Many similar experiments have totally failed. Why has this succeeded? Within the past forty years, the Owenite experiments in England and America have failed; but Shakerism is a living and triumphant fact. Let me urge upon divines and scholars, in their rambles through America, to visit the Shaker Community at Mount Lebanon, and if they are disposed to inquire, 'How can these things be?' my answer is, 'Come and see.'"

A NOVITIATE.

—o—

DEAR SHAKER.—Ever since I first saw you, I loved you, and ever will. Every time you have appeared to me you have awakened earnest thoughts in my mind, and sweet feelings in my heart. I have looked upon you as an expression of the condition and spirit of our people; the people among whom I am happy to be counted. You go out into the world to tell its children what we are, what we think, how we feel; and I am thankful to you for that. You try to let them see our character as a people; you try to make them understand our ideas about God and our duties to him, about life generally, and more especially about the beautiful relations we are called to hold to one another in our peculiar sphere; you try to have them appreciate our feelings of sympathy for our fellow-men, of pure and true love to one another, of deep reverence for our Divine Parentage, whose will, revealed to us through worthy mediums on earth, is the rule of our lives. Thus, always finding you engaged in this noble work of enlightening the minds of men, in regard to these things, do you wonder that your monthly visits to me have been seasons of great pleasure? And still there is one thing that I have felt, and that I would like to say, through you, to my young companions with whom I love to be united in every good work.

The beautiful life that we are called into, inspires the mind continually with new thoughts and ideas. Not one step can be taken, not one word spoken, not even a feeling can enter the heart of a true Believer, without his faith taking hold of it, and judging whether it be for God or for self. This is a great work. To youthful minds whose powers and energies have not been wasted in a worldly life, and for its selfish relations, it shows every moment higher and better ends to aim at; such youthful minds it accepts as virgin soil to till—grounds that have been but too long neglected. I feel exceedingly interested in these labors to reclaim the realms of nature in the human heart to their Lord, and it gives me great joy and courage to know that there are so many who have turned their attention in this direction; that I have so many young companions fervent in their feelings and earnest in their resolutions to carry on the work of God in their own souls, cost what it may. I have often felt the power of love and sympathy flowing from heart to heart among those who are being redeemed. By being a little more willing to express our thoughts and feelings, we might do one another some more good, stimulate one another to new exertions, to gain gifts that are worth possessing, gifts of heart and mind, the power to feel truly and deeply, to think soundly, and to express ourselves simply and acceptably. Being now near the beginning of a new year, I feel a desire to enter a covenant with my young brethren and sisters, to pay more attention to these things, to devote more time and labor to studying the laws of our Order, which are as important to us as are the laws of the natural order to those who adhere to it. And if ever we should be called upon to communicate the fruits of our labors to one another, we should be as willing to give as we are to receive, and we should find fully as much blessing in the former as we are finding in the latter.

EMIL BRETZNER.

[From the Albany Express.]

THE OUTRAGE AT THE WATERVLIE SHAKERS SETTLEMENT.—The following letter, written by one of the sisters of the Watervliet Society of Shakers, to a sister at New Lebanon, describing the situation of affairs at the former place, will be read with interest:

SHAKERS (Albany County), {
November, 1872. }

Dear Eldress Antoinette:

In a recent letter you sent to me, you thought it would be some time before you wrote again. We feel no claim on your precious time in that direction, yet we do beg your love and sympathy, in these trying times for soul and body. To be aroused from our beds by two extensive fires in one week's time, and then the insecurity which we constantly feel, has so unnerved us, that it is impossible to get a good night's rest, although the brethren keep a constant watch; and again, the burden and wear upon the strength of the brethren, with so much upon them, make our hearts ache. The barns and sheds for our oxen, cows, and young stock, with all that we had to keep them through the winter, gone, together with all the oats, which we had for the horses, was there stored for threshing. The oat crop has been a failure for several years past, and the brethren have had to buy. This season it was good; had enough to have carried through to another harvest.

We can courageously endure privation, and labor hard, but, when night comes, it brings with it such a feeling of horror that we long for an eternal day. If we sleep, we are only frightened that we have been to sleep. When the bell strikes it is the knell of fear; and still feel that all that has been is unaccounted for. We know of no personal enmity, no rivalry in business, or any thing unusual on the part of Believers; but we do know that there is a very low state of morals at the present time; robberies are committed very frequently; men are seen masked; hen-roosts are robbed, and various places pillaged. This has been going on until it has grown into a regular organized band of desperadoes, who, seemingly, have no other object than to rob and secure money. On the morning of the fire at our place, two men were seen and sent away from the Church Family's office; two men were also met running toward the Second Family. On the evening of the fire, two men tried to get into the office at the Second Order, which leads us to think that the object of firing the barns was to draw the brethren away from those places, and leave them unprotected.

We know no other way than to be faithful in duty, and fervent in prayer, looking to the higher powers for protection.

Now, perhaps, your motherly spirit would like to know how we shall make out, as we depend so much upon the dairy for the support and comfort of the family. I will tell you: As we have, late years, kept more milch cows through the winter, we have not laid down our winter supply of butter, as formerly; therefore, under our present affliction, not being able to keep but a few cows, we have agreed to have one-third of our meals without butter, and to lengthen out our shortening for pies, to do with one-third less pie. As we have a good supply of apples and potatoes, we can live comfortably. Even a piece of bread and a cup of cold water would be a sumptuous meal, if we could only banish our fears for the future, and go to our rest in safety.

Do not forget us in your prayers, nor withhold some of those strong spirits which encamp around about you, to come to us, to inspire us with strength and courage. We have no less thankfulness for the Gospel of salvation, and the privilege to be Believers, on account of our recent affliction, but will toil on to the end of life's journey.

Yours, in affliction, HARRIET.

WASTE BASKET.

—o—

Write and educate yourself and others. No well-meant effort in mental discipline is lost; it is even as in spiritual things, "where no labor in the Lord is ever in vain." Words are mediums through which to convey ideas; the knowledge and use of them is often termed education.

But what if a person should know how to speak and write with all the tongues of men and angels, and yet lack ideas, would they not be learnedly ignorant? as when possessing the gift of tongues, of healing, of knowledge, and all spiritual gifts, yet lacking the gift of charity, or love, they are nothing when judged by the standard of true Gospel travel of soul.

Write, therefore, for the Shaker and Shakeress. The contents of the "Waste Basket" will rise up and claim its due share of honor in its support.

At any race of half a dozen men or horses, do each one win the prize? or can only one win at a given time? Write, therefore, and keep the Waste Basket full, and The Shaker well supplied with good matter.

"What is the chaff to the wheat?" saith the Lord. Why, without the chaff there could be no wheat; it is as necessary as a Waste Basket. Therefore write, meditate; and re-write on one side of the sheet only; after preparing as best you can, and it having passed the ordeal of the society's local editor, send it neatly folded, ready for the Waste Basket, for we must have plenty of matter for our Shaker and Shakeress, as we could not make even a world out of nothing.

"WE."

—o—

The usual editorial term of "we" is no longer a subject of doubt. But the world has waited long for the SHAKER and SHAKERESS to illustrate the point by giving it a dual signification.

BEAUTIFUL SHORE.

1. Time's dark billows and tempests may roar, Yet will I sing of that beautiful shore, Where the chill winter of life shall be o'er, Ne'er to return to the soul.
 2. Glad - some the spring of that fair happy land, Blossom and fruitage in glo-ry ex-pand, While the soft breeze from its emerald strand, Scent-laden float to us here.
 3. Pil - grims who tar - ry, your time yet abide, Slowly ro - ced - ing is life's eb-bing tide: O - ver its sur - ges your spir-its shall glide Safe to that beau-ti - ful shore.

Blest summer land, free from sorrow and gloom, In fadeless beauty our spirits shall bloom, While the earth casket in-her - its the tomb, Sea-sons su - per-nal will roll.
 Love builds its mansion all pearly and bright, Rising in grandeur in rose-tinted light: 'Tis for the blessed, whose robes are made white, Heavenly homes have been rear'd.
 Hap - py the tho't! If our hearts are made pure, We an - in - her - it-ance there shall secure. Hope still confides in the prom - ises sure, When here our journey is o'er.

it, without creating any, the antagonism between the accumulative products of labor and the laborer, the condition of the productive class, particularly the agricultural portion, reveal a state of things too awful to contemplate. A war establishment to kill and to destroy, is at the same time associated with extensive missionary efforts to preach a gospel of peace which they do not possess. We must be borne with, when we designate such a civilization a Satanic form of human life, the organic law of which is "the love of self at the expense and neglect of the neighbor." To bring about a distant approximation to our form of human society, we ask for the elevation of humanity to the practice of the law — "the love of self, and the neighbor as self." The organic law of our Order is: "He that is greatest, shall be the servant!" To those who wish to enjoy a Divine form of social life, we say, "Come and see" whether such operates among us or not.

THE LITTLE QUAIL.

By Richard McNemar.

Traveling once along the way,
Thinking of this latter day—
How much progress we can make,
Since our lives are not at stake.
Ancient saints could little gain,
Still by persecutors slain;
Now protected from the foe,
Saints can have full time to grow.

Next I thought, If sinners knew
That we thus our safety view,
Would they not yet try to kill?
Could they not our vitals spill?
Through my mind this thought I cast,
While a log I closely passed,
Where a little quail did sit
Fair and easy to be hit.

Instantly I made a stand,
With a stick I raised my band;
Thrice I struck with all my skill,
But no vitals did I spill.
Once my stick just grazed his tail,
But the well-protected quail,
Sound and nimble took its flight
Through the forest, out of sight.

Instantly the spirit spoke,
"As this quail escaped thy stroke,

So the wicked strike in vain
In the great Messiah's reign."
O, what wonders I did view
As the little creature flew!
Every flutter of its wing
Seemed to cry, "The Lord is King."

Had I then an army seen,
Full of rage and cruel spleen,
I should felt no more surprise
Than amidst a host of flies.
While the cross of Christ I bear,
Under his protecting care,
Every danger I shall shun,
Till my work is fully done.

He who gave this striking sign
Has stretch'd out his meas'ring line:
Persecution's at an end;
Now we may with Christ ascend.
Blessed day bow bright and clear!
O what fruits the saints can bear!
Righteousness through every stage,
Now can grace this GOLDEN AGE.

THE CHURCHES OF OUR LAND.

By Cecelia Devyr.

—o—

Loud ring their bells, and loud their organ tones
Pour the grand anthems that by art were given.
Wealth, learning, eloquence, their proud dominion hold:

But what of God, of Life, of Love, of Heaven?
A seeming fitness blends all outward things—
Concordant sounds and softly mellowed light;
We almost list the rush of angel's wings,
And watch for saints in radiant robes of white.

Can heap'd-up shams the Infinite allure;
Or flatt'ry charm the all-embracing mind?
Can systems that oppress and spurn the poor
Be brought to God, and His acceptance find?
Is He deceived by fashion, pomp, and show?
Can grandeur hide disease, deceit and sin?
May every wickedness the heart can know
Come to these temples and gain entrance in?

If stern, misguided hearts go forth no more,
The Martyr's unrelenting fire to light;
If ruthless persecutions cease to pour
Their venom'd darts with wild inhuman might,
Does there abound that precious gift of God—
Faith in the good that is, and that which yet may be?

Is Christ-like charity their basis broad?
And is the'r focus — Truth — unmarr'd and free?

When youthful manhood, full of noble zeal,
An offering makes of his unfolding life,

Is there an inspiration he can feel,
To meet his ardor and award his strife?
And does the soul of woman bear no fruit,
Nor spread its branches like the olive tree?
Beneath the ban that bade her to be mute
Must her expanding powers forever be?

Alas! alas! the altar's fire is dead;
God's Spirit meets the soul no longer there:
But canting mockery gives stones for bread,
And scorpion answers to the cry for care.
Our prayer ascends, O be it thus no more;
Come, sweet refreshing from the Source Divine,
And spread true Brotherhood "the wide world o'er."

Which poet-prophets saw in "auld lang syne."

Let Truth reveal to science Nature's laws,
Let faith not die 'mid superstitions dim;
For truth and science both shall seek the Cause,
That gave all souls one universal hymn.
Write God, write Goodness, on the nation's heart,
Not with a legal pen by man's decree;
But let iniquity the land depart,
And make the young Republic pure and free.

FIFTY CENTS
PER ANNUM.

LOVE,

THE BOND OF OUR UNION.

CHRISTMAS and New Year, with all their joys and sorrows, have come and gone throughout our happy land, but not so their remembrances. These remain, and, like new-mown hay, send forth, from the storehouse of memory, a fragrance very grateful to the providers, but still more so to the recipients of and participants in their festivities. As these have been religiously rational, so will the pleasures of the past be ever present—always “green,” a “joy forever.”

The people of God, of the latter day— the day of His spiritual “power”—were to be emphatically “a willing people.”

The North Family, whence the “Shaker and Shakeress” issues, is the head of the Novitiate Order (composed of three families), where all the inquirers into Shakerism, who come to Mount Lebanon, do congregate, and where all new converts to it find a home, during their initiatory and probationary period of the new life, into which they may have been ushered.

Anciently, one asked, “How are the dead raised, and with what body do they come forth?” Modernly, many ask, “How can you Shakers and Shakeresses, who are dead to the world, and to its (to you) sinful pleasures, enjoy Christmas and New Year, or any other social holiday season?”

And we make answer, that “Godliness is profitable to all things, to the life that now is and that which is to come”—to all things relating to the soul and body.

Our Christmas and New Year's tables did not “groan under” adulterated, poisonous compounds, and costly viands, either liquids or solids; nor did they groan over the ruined health which the consumption of such things occasion; for, although bountifully supplied, their contents were gustatory and enjoyable to the palate, and agreeable to and easily digested by the stomach. This, though earthly, is no trifling blessing in this day of artificial dressing and feeding, and of superficial, highly-seasoned cookery. Then we had a mental feast of spiritual union and love; hearty, happy greetings from soul to soul, and presents from all the Brethren and Sisters to the Elders, as the Representatives of the Family. These were in the form of little missives, of which the following are specimens, the first two from the more advanced in years and experience, and the last from the youngest convert to our Order:

“North Family, Sabbath Morning,
“Dec. 25, 1872.

“To the Elders: May the blessing of our Heavenly Parents ever rest with their representatives in care—the Elders—and bless them with Heavenly courage, fortitude and Divine Love, and when their labors of love are closed, may an abiding peace be theirs.

“Be so kind as to accept from my spirit, on this occasion, a Christmas blessing.

“D. F.”

ANOTHER.

“Beloved Parents: It is with deep feelings of love and respect that I address you at this time. I am truly thankful for your heavenly ministrations, so fraught with wisdom and love.

“I bless you for your fatherly and motherly tenderness to all your little flock. Justice and mercy are yours to impart; while condemning the evil you cherish the good. The spirit of Jesus, and of our ever blessed Mother Ann, shines brightly in your daily lives, which to me is evidence of the true and holy anointing wherewith ye are anointed. I know that I am blessed in many ways, and have cause of great thankfulness for my privilege in the Gospel. I feel especially thankful that I am permitted to live and associate with those in whom I have the utmost confidence as Leaders and Watchmen in Zion.

“I love and bless you, kind parents, and it shall be my constant labor to strengthen and build up the walls of our Zion, according to my small capacity. In this way I can gain and retain your love and blessing, which I hope ever to possess.

LEVI.”

ANOTHER, FROM THE YOUNGEST IN PRIVILEGE.

“My dear Elders: I am happy that I have this opportunity of expressing my growing love and respect for you, and of acknowledging my appreciation of the influence you are holding over me. My prayer shall ever be, that I may prove myself worthy of your love and confidence, and, at the sacrifice of every thing earthly, I pray that I may be simple, and keep my union with you perfect at all times. Hoping that you may live long to encourage others, as you have encouraged me, is my sincere wish.

“With kind wishes, and the compliments of the season, I am yours sincerely,

“ELMER.”

Thus it is, that from the heaviest and most faithful burden bearers to the babes in Christ, the love of truth and goodness, of God, of each other, and of humanity, is the only real Bond of our Union, that holds us together in a Community of goods, in an arbor of Peace, with the Communion of Saints.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Extract from an English Letter, dated Oct. 20th, 1872.

“I see, by this week's ‘Medium,’ that the Bishop of Chester takes the position that Jesus was the first to enter Heaven; and that even David was not in the (Christ) heavens, although more than ten centuries had passed since his death.”

Turning to the October (25th) No. 1 find the following: “The Intermediate State. A Sermon on the Intermediate State by the Bishop of Chester, just published.”

“The clergy, for many years, have regarded the intermediate state of the soul (between death and the physical resurrection) a sealed subject, until Dr. Bartle, Principal of Frestfield College, Liverpool, brought out his novel work, in 1869, entitled ‘Hades,’ for which he was charged with heresy. Now the Bishop of Chester comes to his support, making his own views on the ‘Intermediate State’ identical with those expressed by Dr. Bartle in his work.”—Ed. of “Medium.”

Dr. Bartle: In Hades, we read (p. 113): “The portion of Scripture from the Acts proves that the soul or spirit of Christ was in Hades; because St. Peter declares that God did not leave it there. It must of necessity have been in that region, otherwise its removal thence would have been an impossibility. (Page 38.) Death is simply the separation of soul and body.”

Page 194. “We find St. Peter stating that the patriarch David, who, he said, was both dead and buried, yet had not at that time ascended into the Heavens, although his death occurred a thousand years before.”

Page 226. “With St. Paul, to die was gain; but the crown of righteousness would not be given him till that day; meaning the day of judgment.”

Chapter VII. “Let it be clearly understood, then that the expression ‘sleeping’ implies ‘waking;’ and, therefore, whenever we find the word ‘sleeping’ used of the deceased, it never means that the soul is in a state of unconsciousness.”

Page 202. “Hades is a Greek word, and literally means the invisible place; and the word ‘hell,’ in its primary meaning, signifies the hidden place; and in this place it is almost identical with ‘Hades.’”

The editor of the “Medium” presumptuously advises these two great Orthodox lights (or balls of darkness) to attend some of the seances, and there learn that the disembodied souls of men and women have no idea of attempting to gather the identical materials of their long-ago discarded bodies. As to the day of judgment, it is when a man (or woman) brings himself (or herself) to judgment by the confession and the discontinuing the commission of sin—missing the mark.—Ed.

Postscript of a letter since received, dated December 8, 1872:

“P. S.—I sent you a London ‘Standard,’ in which you will see our good friend, Mr. Hepworth Dixon, has been figuring in Court. Sir

J. Eastlake, counsel for defendant, is reported elsewhere to have spoken in the highest terms of the Shaker communities, saying that "Dixon's description of them was the redeeming feature of all his books."

I shall not fail to either write, or send you a paper every week, until I come amongst you. — E. J. W.

Editor of "SHAKER AND SHAKERESS:"

It is a source of joy to me, to know that the Shakers are sending forth, into this wilderness world of sin, Christ's doctrines of "peace on earth, good will to man." Since the commencement of the late war, the rising generation have been taught, by the popular clergy, and the religious papers, that war is an essential part of Christianity; that men shot down in battle, while filled with hate and wrath, and striving to kill those who had never injured them, are taken directly to heaven, and crowned as saints and Christian martyrs, and placed on thrones of honor and glory at the right hand of God.

During the war, ministers went to steamboat and railroad stations, to take leave of soldiers leaving home for the scene of slaughter, and there went through the blasphemous ceremony they call prayer; and then presented the soldiers with flags and New Testaments, and exhorted them to go and fight manfully, like Christian heroes. And should any one have been faithful enough to the true testimony of Christ, to declare that Christians never did, and never can, fight, he would have been denounced as a heretic, a traitor, and antichrist, and threatened with flogs, prisons and assassination. There was not a priest, nor a paper, to be heard of, that dared to say that God is true, and that Christ is the Prince of Peace.

Seeing and knowing these things to be so, I wondered whether God would permit the rising generation to grow up under the teachings of this Balaamitish priesthood, with none to tell them that their preaching was antichristian lies. But, in the darkest hour, "The Shaker" appeared, saying emphatically and truthfully, "Christians never did, never can, fight!"

And now I rejoice with joy unspeakable, and have only to add: Go and prove to honest inquirers after truth, that all the Churches that believe in and practise war, are but the "synagogues of Satan," with no shadow of right to name the name of Jesus. This you can readily do, beyond all controversy or cavil, by comparing their practises with the precepts and practise of Jesus, as set forth in the New Testament, in which they all profess to believe.

Your friend,

JEREMIAH HACKER.

We receive requests like the following:

"I should like to see some of the internal workings of your Order published in your very excellent paper, if consistent with your rules, etc. I feel satisfied that your mode of life has a purifying tendency, producing a contentment and love that the world knows not of."

In this number we shall somewhat minister to this demand.

Novitiate experience of T. Stroud, of Enfield, Connecticut.

He thus writes:

"December, 1871. On the 6th inst., thinking to confess what I believed to be the last of my bad sins and thoughts, and feeling that, in my own strength, it was impossible — that, indeed, it was like taking my life — I entered into such a labor of prayer as before I had never been able to bring myself to. I knelt, in strong cries to God, was absorbed in intense abstraction; and there fell upon me a remarkable power, as of a wave of electricity flowing through me. It came and went suddenly, and another succeeded. * * * I went in all earnestness, and confessed in deep humility. At night, a few minutes after retiring to rest, this power returned, filling my muscular system, as though charged from a strong electric battery. I remember that I lay and speculated upon the nature of this spiritual operation. The shocks lasted in full force for two and one-half minutes, and the effects for hours. The charging process commenced in my breast, and proceeded upwards to the top of my head, and downwards to the tips of my fingers and the ends of my toes.

"Knowing that there was no visible agency to create electricity, I was forced to the conclusion that it came from an invisible source. But, whether directed by some intelligent beings or agents, under some general law or otherwise, I am unable to determine. It has been often repeated, but always when my mind and feelings have been earnestly engaged in endeavoring to gain power over some evil passion or propensity of my fallen nature."

THE SHAKERS.

By A. B. Bradford, late Consul to China.

—O—

"A city set upon a hill that cannot be hid."

In the valley and along the sides of a mountain which flanks the Hudson River, in Columbia county, New York, dwell the Mount Lebanon Society of Shakers, one of a number of settlements that compose the Shaker Community of the United States. Besides this one, New York has two other settlements; Massachusetts four; Maine and New Hampshire each two; Connecticut one; Ohio four, and Kentucky two. Each of these has one or more "Families" — offshoots that branch out from the parent stock, and are helped, by common consent, to independent landed estates.

As this remarkable people are almost wholly unknown to us in Pennsylvania, I propose, on this occasion, to give some information as to their origin, their religious views, their community principles, their economy, by which I mean their mode of living, and any thing else that occurs to my mind of interest to you concerning them. Of course, what I have to say does not purport to be a thorough discussion of a most interesting subject, but only a few items of fact and thought — all the result of a visit I made to Mount Lebanon during last summer.

1. THEIR ORIGIN. When we read Josephus's History of the Antiquities of the Jews, we find that there was a class called Essenes, who, although they make no figure at all in the New Testament history, produced great effect in the Christian Church. These were, no doubt, the prototypes of the Shakers. To this class Jesus of Nazareth belonged; from them he got many of the ideas which he inculcated in his public teachings, and by their rules he regulated himself in regard to a celibate life.

If any one will make himself acquainted with the history of the Essenes, he will find it hard to discover in their system any thing to criticise, unless it should be on the subject of marriage. For while they allowed marriage to be a good thing for those who occupied a lower plane of spirituality, for themselves, "they neither married nor gave in marriage, but were as the angels of God in Heaven."

A second class of Essenes, to meet the obvious objection that the race would run out on their principle of celibacy, did practise marriage; but it was the marriage of love, not lust. It was to provide offspring that should be strong to bear the responsibilities of human life.

Truth is the daughter of Time; and Time goes long with child. These embryonic ideas of the Essenes, and some other wise people among the Greeks, two thousand years ago, in regard to the right method of propagating the race of human beings with a view to their improvement, have come to the birth in our day. We have now college professors who have discovered at last the old secret, that the same laws for improving the lower order of animals, if applied rigidly and scientifically to the human species, would, in due time, make it certain that every child born, being sent for, and not coming by chance, would come into the world beautiful in person, intelligent in mind, happy in disposition, and good in character. I live, I shall die, in the hope that, in a century or so, if the world preserves its peace, and gives science and religion a fair chance to solve their problems, that the human race, in the four respects I have named, will not occupy the low plane we now do, but when every mother's son shall enjoy the inheritance he is entitled to by virtue of his human origin.

The Shakers then, whether they intended it or not, are, I think, a reproduction in our age of the severe morality and heroic life of the primitive order of the Essenes, one of whose chief characteristics was celibacy, and to which order Jesus of Nazareth belonged.

2. THEIR RELIGIOUS VIEWS — MOTHER ANN. As science reveals to us the magnitude of the universe, and the comparative nothingness of the planet which forms our dwelling place, the mind is oppressed with the thought that the individual may be overlooked by the Almighty Father in the care He exercises for the whole. Hence it is natural for every child to love its mother best, since the mother, by her watchfulness, knows and cares for the small and multifarious needs of her offspring. So, the human soul, when on the one side it speculates like an angel concerning God; on the other, brings its human wants and weaknesses with it, and longs to find in the Divine character the maternal idea. The Jewish Psalmist expresses the feeling which every properly-developed man evinces, who takes an outlook upon the vastness of the universe, when he exclaims, "As the hart panteth after the water brook, so panteth my soul after Thee, Oh God." Theodore Parker, in those wonderful prayers he offered in the beginning of his religious services in Boston, seemed to regard God as Dual — as possessing the peculiar love of a mother for her child, as well as that of a father; and therefore with great reverence, yet with the deepest filial feeling, and with a marked effect upon his audience, addressed God as a dear Father and Mother.

If this childlike trait of character is developed as men become spiritual, it is not difficult to see that, whereas the Shakers regard Jesus as a Divine Prophet, and believe in his mission, yet, to meet their conception of the dual character of God — to satisfy the longing for a mother's love, which all men feel when they think of their loneliness in the great universe, they should accept Mother Ann Lee as an avatar of the Christian economy, as Buddha was in the Brahminical, and as Mohammed was among his countrymen, and that they should yield her honor and reverence.

According to the old ideas, that ruled the world until astronomy and geology corrected them, man was the center of the universe. For him alone the sun shone by day, and the moon gave her light by night, and the stars of heaven twinkled in the firmament, and the seasons rolled around, giving the beautiful alternation of summer and winter. But now we see that man, glorious as he is in intellect, and more glorious as he is yet to be in the future, is only an incident in the vast creation — that he has come up from a low origin to his present place by the great law of evolution, which is to carry him onward still in his grand career. But we must pay the price of every thing we have, and if we glory in the results of scientific research, and are proud to know what the telescope and the spectroscope have revealed of the magnitude and composition of the universe, we must experience a reaction and feel oppressed and discouraged at the comparative nothingness of the world we inhabit, and the ephemeral duration of the generations of man, as one appears upon the stage to-day, and tomorrow passes away into the oblivion of eternity.

If, then, science, from a material point of observation, represents man as a lonely orphan, calling for his father and mother, from a moral point of view, and on a level which the multitude have not reached, but which has been attained only by the spiritually minded, it may represent the dual nature of God, and meet the desire we all feel for a mother's sympathy and love, as well as a father's care.

For reasons such as these, probably, the Shakers have an uncommon reverence for woman as such. In all their affairs of government and advice she is the equal of man. Her desire and right to lead a celibate life are religiously respected and protected, and although the tongue of slander, as might be expected, has in some cases vilified the Community, there is no person who has made himself acquainted with them that for a moment suspects any thing against their character on this score. The grand idea in their religion, to which all the rest is auxiliary, is, that for them, as true believers, making Jesus their model, a celibate life is the highest Christian attainment. To carry out this idea as an end, they use, as means, simple diet, constant, but not exhaustive labor, natural periods of rest, freedom from worldly associations, the most perfect cleanliness of person, and of all their surroundings; in short every thing that will enable them to maintain purity in heart, speech and behavior. In noticing the complete victory which strong men and beautiful women have achieved over what they call the generative lusts of the flesh, I could not help saying to myself, give me this stern unbending principle, this lofty, organized devotion to an idea, and let me infuse it into an army of a hundred thousand men, and I could conquer the world! Away then with the sneering suspicion that the continence of the Shakers is only an outside show, and that human nature is too strong for such restraints. The religious instinct is a part of human nature, and it can control all the rest. The history of monks and nuns, of anchorites and flagellants, proves that when men and women really feel an act of self-sacrifice to be a duty, they can accomplish it; for the will is controlled by the strongest motive, and it is the prerogative of the human soul to pause in the moment of temptation and call into its presence all the opposing motives, and thus stand strong in its integrity of purpose.

Some of us affect to pity the Shakers, in their retirement from the world and their circumscribed limits of enjoyment, and practise of a celibate life. But they don't thank us for our pity. The principle of compensation comes to their aid, and when they compare the miseries of the world with what the world calls their privations, they are more than thankful for their quiet and happy homes. How little do people dream, when, in our present type of civilization, they see thousands of men and women swirling around in the vortex of temptation, and going down, the victims of vice and of overwork, that there is a sweet home among the Shakers where temptation is comparatively unknown; where vice is a stranger; where contentment and plenty reigns; and where what shall we eat? what shall we drink? where will we sleep? what shall we be clothed?—those three questions that produce the eternal moil and turmoil of the world, and keep up the courts of law, and fill the penitentiaries with victims, never harass a single soul! Some, indeed, sickened with the emptiness and heartlessness of society, strike their sails and heave their anchors when, on the voyage of life, they approach this haven of rest. Others wish to introduce their children there, if they cannot go themselves. One New York lady has three daughters at Mount Lebanon, all endowed with beauty and talent, and their education is conducted by the best of teachers, in one of the best and most thorough schools I ever knew.

3. THE SHAKERS ARE ALL SPIRITUALISTS. Before the Rochester knockings, the fame of which has become world wide, these people claimed to hold communication with departed spirits. In this, except among the followers of Swedenborg, they were alone among the churches. I have often wondered at this fact; for the first article in the creed of all the Protestant churches is the dogma of the plenary inspiration of the whole Bible; and both the Old Testament and the New clearly teach that living men may hold converse with the dead; in other words, that the dead have only departed from our sight by assuming the spiritual body of the resurrection; that they still live, still take cognizance of us, and sympathize with us, and afford us help and comfort. This is as clearly taught as human language can teach it in the Scriptures, and especially in the recorded interview which King Saul had, through the woman of Endor, with the departed Prophet Samuel, in 1 Samuel, 28th chapter. The record states that Samuel actually appeared to the king, and announced to him the issue of the battle which was to be fought next day. Whoever reads the passage attentively will see that clairvoyance was then practised; that mediumship was the connecting link between the two worlds, and that when conditions were favorable, it was possible for those in this world to receive truthful communications from those in the world of spirits. This passage of Scripture history was robbed of its meaning by M. Henry, the commentator, who said it was not Samuel who appeared to Saul, but the devil personating Samuel. We, however, live in a day when the ipse dixit of a clergyman will not overrule both facts and philosophy, and this passage stands as it was written.

With all their reverence for the Bible, the Shakers do not regard it as a final revelation, teaching for good and all what we are to believe concerning God, and what duty God requires of man. They do not believe that God, as a Father, has forsaken His children upon the earth, leaving behind Him only a composite book, made up of sixty-six tracts, which have been exposed for centuries to interpolations and alterations that have given birth to all the jangling creeds of Christendom, and that are known even in their present condition to but only a small portion comparatively of the human race. On the contrary, they believe that Heaven still vouchsafes its revelations of truth and duty to mankind everywhere, as in the olden time, when men went to "inquire of the Lord." They think that God commissions his angels and the glorified spirits of just men to give to mortals who, on the high plane of holy consecration, keep their minds in a state of receptivity, that knowledge of the present and the future, and that sense of duty which all men feel to be so desirable. When, therefore, our age was surprised by what was believed to be communications from the spirit world, it was nothing new to the Shakers, who, in their retired position from the busy world, were familiar with the idea. This explains the sympathy which everywhere prevails among the Shakers and the Spiritualists, and which, on this one subject, forms a bond of union between them. — Beaver (Pa.) Radical.

NON-ORIGINALITY.

By J. S. Prescott.

—O—

"There is a divinity which shapes our ends, Rough-hew them as we may."

Man did not originate himself, and therefore cannot comprehend his own existence. Solomon, who was wiser in his generation than many others, said that there was "nothing new under the sun." An apostle said, "Since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning. The history of the world to-day is "history repeating itself."

Jesus, the author of primitive Christianity, did not claim to be the originator or source of truth, because truth existed before him. He said, "To this end was I born, to bear witness unto the truth." This was his peculiar mission, and in the execution of it, although violently opposed, he proved his fidelity and faithfulness, his steadfastness and integrity, to that degree that he was called "the faithful and true witness."

His memorable sermon on the Mount, containing the "golden rule," which meets with a hearty response in every man's breast, was not original with him, but was one of the maxims of Confucius, a Chinese philosopher, who lived long before him. Then where was the originality? Not with Jesus, nor with Confucius, but with God. For the principle existed in the creation of man, and was worthy of being handed down to the latest posterity.

When Columbus discovered America, it was called a "new world," but such was not the fact. America was as old as any other part of the globe—it was new only to those who discovered it, and on this right of discovery the King of England based his claim to give charters to English emigrants to lands belonging to the Indians, who were then the original inhabitants and proprietors of America. William Penn called in question the justice of the King's claim, and argued the point with him at some length, in which he obtained the victory of "right over might."

The facts are that the English crown was largely in debt to the Penn family, and King Charles proposed to liquidate those "old claims" by ceding vast territories, three thousand miles away, belonging to the North American Indians.

Penn accepted the payment, after first proving to the king that he had no more moral or legal right to the lands thus proposed to be ceded or chartered, than the American Indians had to the island of England. Penn inquired of the king how he would feel and act if some American Indians, cruising about in some of their big canoes, should discover the little island of Great Britain, and straightway should take formal possession of it, and then proceed to apportion it out as hunting and fishing grounds for their several chiefs. "Zounds," said Charles, "I should think it a great piece of impudence, and would fight them with my army and navy—my brave English soldiers and sailors."—Ed.

And when Wm. Penn came over to America, before settling a colony himself, he called the natives around him, under the shade of a large tree, and there made a treaty with them, on the most friendly terms, offering them a reasonable compensation for all the land he wished to purchase of them, by which he gained their entire confidence, and secured their friendship. He looked upon them not as savages, but as the legal owners of the soil—as children of the forest—and treated them kindly as such, and they, in return, ever afterward called him "Father Penn," and do the same to this day.

This was placing originality where it belonged. The influence of this admirable example of Wm. Penn, and his "Peace Policy" toward the aborigines of our country, is still felt in the old Quaker city of Philadelphia in "brotherly love," and no doubt has more or less influence on the policy of President Grant's administration toward the present races of Indians.

If a man writes a history, and records facts, those facts did not originate with the historian—they existed before him—all he had to do was to compile them, and bring them up to the surface in book form, and bear witness to the truth of them. The Bible is held sacred because of the truth it contains; but the truth itself did not originate with the Bible, nor with the compilers of it; it existed before either of them. Then, where was the originality? Not with the Bible, nor with man, nor with the Son of Man, but with God.

So it is with the revelations given in our day. If there is any truth in those revelations, that truth did not originate with man nor with woman, but with God. All that mortals can claim as to originality is their mediumship—being called to bear witness to the truth revealed—and if they fail to do this, they fail to fulfil their high and holy calling. "Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord."

It is now generally admitted that God is dual—Father and Mother—that these divine attributes do exist in the Deity, and have always existed, from time immemorial, yea, "from everlasting;" that the dispensation under which we live is emphatically the Reign of the Eternal Father and Mother principles; hence, mercy is mingled with judgment. Truth is applicable to both sexes, it being both male and female—self-existent—hence it is written, "As for the truth, it endureth and is always strong; it liveth and conquereth forevermore. With her there is no accepting of persons or rewards; but she doeth the things that are just, and refraineth from all unjust and wicked things, and all men do well like of her works."

"Neither in her judgment is any unrighteousness; and she is the strength, kingdom, power and majesty of all ages. Blessed be the God of truth. And with that he held His peace. And all the people then shouted and said, 'Great is truth, and mighty above all things.'"

"True to Thee, my God, forever,
True unto Thy word and way,
I will stand, and no affliction
E'er shall turn my heart astray.
Deep within my soul are anchored
Faith, and hope, and love divine,
And my early vows to serve Thee
Hold me, hold me ever Thine."

CHRIST A COMMUNIST.

By William A. Pratt.

COMMUNISM is denounced by Christians as opposed to the spirit of their religion. That it is opposed to the egotism and self-righteousness that is so marked a trait among those who style themselves Christians, cannot be denied; but it is not opposed to Christ's teachings. The recorded sayings and doings of that religious hero show every where a communistic spirit, and it is reasonable to suppose that what is unrecorded partook in a greater degree of that same spirit, for biographers are prone to conceal the more unpopular qualities of their heroes.

The kingdom of heaven, so often spoken of by him, instead of being construed into a mysterious spirit home for a select few, I believe can be understood better in a common-sense way—to have reference to an ideal earthly home of a communistic nature which he hoped to institute as a home for his followers; a home into which no man could enter unless he was born again, or in other words until he became dead to the customs and conventionalities of society as it now is and became like a little child again with a mind more impressible to natural habits; a home into which he said it was hard for a rich man to enter, doubtless for the same reason that it is hard to get rich men in our day to enter a community on account of their selfishness; a home where, if treasures were deposited, no fears need be entertained of their destruction by moths and rust, for in such a home every thing will be utilized for the good of all, and nothing hoarded up for the gratification of a selfish few, where thieves could not exist, for every thing would be common property, and where there would be no distinctions of age, rank, or sex.

The Golden Rule, enjoined by Christ upon his followers, contains the essence of all his religious teachings, but it is not practicable outside of a community. An individual, adhering to that rule in the present homogeneous state of society, is like a sheep among wolves and must certainly be devoured.

The first Church instituted by Christ's immediate followers, was a community, moulded, doubtless, after the fashion of that which they had so often heard described from the lips of their master.

Let sectarians denounce, then, as they will, our communistic theories; they know not what they do, and therefore should be forgiven. Did they read the Scriptures with their own instead of dead men's eyes, they would see that to be a true follower of Christ is to be a communist.—The Communist.

SPIRIT COMMUNICATION.

AURORA, N. J., Aug. 14, 1872.

To Dr. G. Haskell:

"Spirit Child: Through the Divine assistance of spirits from higher spheres than the material plane of life, I have been permitted to come here and communicate a few thoughts expressive of my views of the Resurrection-life of the Shaker Institution—as we view it, another and higher plane of spiritual existence than the animal, sexual or social plane in the external life. In this you are educated that a life of true sexual moral purity, or womanly virtue, is the only road that leads to true happiness—the happiness that leads through the endless spheres of present and future spiritual existence. As the happiness of the future depends upon the life of the present, you know what your early instructions were. The principles taught by true Quaker Friends do not differ so widely from the Shakers as do those of the world.

"As these were the principles you were taught when a child, and the principles imbibed and practiced till you arrived at mature age, what I would here express is my thanks to the good Father of all life, animate and inanimate, that the Shakers have an existence in the land. I consider it the saving Institution of the age. In it is cultivated true spirituality and strict morality, and all the higher affectional elements of the nature of the individual are cultivated in the highest, grandest and broadest fraternal sense; the Fatherhood of God, the Motherhood of Nature, and the Brotherhood and Sisterhood of all Humanity's children, as they become quickened in spirit, resurrected from a life in the flesh—that more glorious Resurrection-life of the Spirit.

Hoping this will reach you, and thanking the friends for giving me this opportunity of communicating to you, I am yours in spirit,

RUTH BARRY.

TRINITY DUALITY.

A Trinity is an innovation upon the theology of the human race. All mankind—from the most enlightened nations and classes down to the most benighted heathens—believed in the duality of the Deity until the creation of the Trinity by antichrist. However distorted their views of the character of the Supreme Being might be, this one truth, that God was Male and Female, still remained to them.

It is an axiom even with the Chinese philosophers, that the world was created by the male and female principles.

It remained for the smoke from the bottomless pit of antichristian, sin, ignorance and spiritual darkness to becloud and obscure this most beautiful, simple and self-evident of all truths.

Mosheim, in his "Ecclesiastical History," says, that "Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, was the first who ever made use of the word Trinity to express the distinction of what divines call persons in the Godhead." And MacLaine saith: "The Christian Church is very little obliged to him for his invention. The use of this and other unscriptural terms, to which men attach either no ideas at all, or false ones, has wounded charity and peace without promoting truth and knowledge. It has produced heresies of the very worst kind." Mosheim continues: "There were deplorable divisions kindled, throughout the Christian world, on the subject of three persons in the Godhead. So that the Emperor Constantine, seeing the flames of controversy daily spreading through the empire, called the Council of Nice to settle the question. At this council the Emperor—the great 'infallible' head of the Church—took one side, and, five months after, changed to the other; and the Trinity became an orthodox doctrine by vote and by authority."

And thus men have worshipped, and still worship, a triune monster, having no existence, and whose "likeness" or "image" does not exist, and therefore cannot be "clearly seen" in any part of the universe of God, visible or invisible.

All the religious sentiments of the ancients, whether written or oral, attest the principle of male and female in Deity. Not only do the Gentile records universally confirm this fact, but in the Hebrew writings and Scriptures also the same truth is maintained.—Ed.

CELIBACY AND LONGEVITY.

By Elder Richard Bushnell.

Now in his 82d year. A brother whom I esteem as one of the best men now living upon the earth.—Ed.

It has often been stated, by physicians and others, that a married life is more conducive to longevity than an unmarried life. Now, if the term unmarried, is meant to include all such as are not joined in lawful wedlock, no doubt the statement may be true. For, of both sexes there are vast numbers whose lives are incompatible with decent modesty, and much more so with a life of chastity and virgin purity.

But, as it regards a life of entire abstinence from sexual commerce, or carnal indulgence of any name or nature, I think the following will disprove the above statement:

In the society at Mount Lebanon, within about ten years, there have deceased, of male and female members, 36, whose united ages average over 86 years. The great majority of them came into the society in their youth, and lived a virgin life, agreeable to the faith and principles of Believers. And there are now living in the Society four members, who came in their youth (under twenty years of age) one of whom is now in the 102d year of her age; another over 98; and two in their 92d year; also, about ten or twelve more, whose ages are between 80 and 90 years. Most of them united with the society at an early period of their lives.

See also our report (on page 45 of the June No. for 1871) of a family of ten—eight males and two females—all of whom but one, who is now living and in his 95th year, died among Believers. Their respective names and ages, (which average near 62 years) are given as above.—Exchanges, please copy.

A. DOOLITTLE, EDITRESS.

PAUL AND THE BISHOPS.

WHEN the bishops of Rome, in solemn conclave, decided that they were sole arbiters of theological truth (an erudite historian asserts they almost conceived they were Deity itself), and created an imaginary Triune God for man to worship, did they not falsify the declaration of the inspired Apostle Paul, who testified that "the invisible things of Him, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead?"

Monstrosities do not proceed from Deity. Creative forces are orderly, and they form and produce their kind. The creation is a reflex of the Creator. If we pass through the whole realm of the natural, which is a correspondence of the spiritual, where shall we find the likeness of a Triune God—three male beings conjoined in one?

Do we not see the dual principle, positive and negative, male and female, manifest in all of God's creation, from man, the apex, down through all grades of animal life, continuing to the vegetable and mineral kingdoms?

Can we marvel that the imaginary Trinity in the heavens should be reflected upon the earth, and a duplicate be formed here? The ruling power on the earth, at the present time, is a trinity of doctors of divinity, civil law, and physic.

Through the God Trinity, which man has formed for man to worship, the sun "of Divine revelation has been darkened, and the moon (ruling earthly governments) turned to blood;" and through the power and influence of the trinity of doctors, the war spirit has ruled. Doctors of divinity have invoked the blessing of the Holy Trinity upon the deadly weapons of war, and the doctors of law, through the power vested in them, have forced fathers, brothers, and sons, to leave all that was dear to them on earth, and enter the ranks of those who were marching to the gory battle field, there to face the cannon's mouth; while the doctors of physic followed in their wake, ready to amputate shattered limbs, and bear the bleeding and dying to hospitals or to the grave.

But thanks are due from many hearts, that, in the fullness of time, the light of divine revelation has pierced the dark clouds which, through a false theology, have for centuries been gathering over Christendom.

Now the cloud is lifted, and we see a Heavenly Father and Mother, instead of three male Gods in one. We have caught a glimpse of the true dual God, full of wisdom and love, and begin to understand the mission of the Christ Spirit manifest through earthen vessels. The angels who came to Jesus and Ann, and ministered to them, always sang the song of peace and good will. The spirit and element of war can never enter the inner spiritual Christ heavens; nor go beyond the world's trinity of gods.

And O how joyful we feel in believing in a Heavenly Mother! Children in nature love and revere their father, who provides for them; but who can understand and feel their needs, and supply them, like a true mother? Her ears are ever open to their cries; and, when in distress, she gathers them to her bosom.

No longer do we remain in a semi-orphan condition, having a Father in the interior heavens, without a loving Mother. And, as this beautiful truth shall come to be more generally recognized and acknowledged, their dual likeness will manifest itself in the outward governments; and in the various relations of life, woman will occupy her proper sphere, and all will eventually see that the visible creation is an outgrowth from the invisible, and that it is God's purpose that we should all progress from inharmonies into the beautiful, good, and true.

IS WOMAN A SLAVE?

By E. H. Webster.

—o—

John Stuart Mill says, "The law of servitude in marriage is a monstrous contradiction to all the principles of the modern world, and to all the experience through which these principles have been slowly and painfully worked out. Marriage is the only actual bondage known to our law. There remains no legal slaves, except the mistress of every house."

Strong, brave words! but are they true? Paul said, "The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband." If she has not possession of her own body, and is in subjection by the law to the will of her husband, who, though exhorted to be her saviour and deliverer as Christ is of the Church, we fear that the charge must be admitted.

Paul gives, as the occasion of this servitude, that, although "man was first formed, woman was first in transgression; and if it were any more excusable in man to sin in consequence of the seduction of the woman "whom the Lord had given him for a helpmeet," than it was in her to yield to the serpentine nature which allured her, he certainly has the case.

The consequences resulting seem evidence that her part and lot was exceedingly sorrowful. "Thy desire shall be to thy husband and he shall rule over thee."

A condition of freedom was prophesied of in the forty-fifth Psalm, under the figure of one who is called to leave her father's house and all her kindred. "The king's daughter is all glorious within." She, as well as the virgins, her companions, who follow her, accept the heavenly Bridegroom, instead of any earthly marriage, and serve Him with gladness and rejoicing.

Jesus who was most emphatically woman's friend and Saviour, alluded to her sad condition when speaking of the weeping women who followed him: "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children; for behold the days are coming in which they shall say, 'Blessed are the barren,' etc."

"THE TRUTH SHALL MAKE YOU FREE."

His new manner of life broke the spell of slavery for all who would live it, whether Jew or Gentile, male or female, bond or free, and they could henceforth "serve the Lord day and night in his temple." "Ye are the temples of the living God." "The temple of God is holy, which temple ye are." "Ye are bought with a price, be not ye the servants of men."

BE WITHOUT ANXIOUS CARE.

Searching and critical as is their meaning, we find a whole volume of tender and pathetic teaching in those simple words of Jesus to Martha, when troubled, that Mary was not more active with her in temporal care and ministrations, "Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her." "Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things, but one thing is needful." He did not directly say that her burdens were unnecessary; but the inference is fair, that he considered them not more needful than the one which held Mary a learner at his feet.

From his lips such teachings as these are often found among his utterances: "Seek first the kingdom of heaven and its righteousness, and all needful things shall be added," etc. So to the multitude of women to whom life is more a season of anxious care: "What shall we eat, and wherewithal shall we be clothed?" do not the words of Jesus most fittingly apply? "Thou art anxious and careful for many things;" but there is something more of life than these; there is something more necessary, the neglect of which can never be compensated with any earthly gain.

How we belie our profession, and trail it in the mire of earthliness, when we subordinate the higher, the spiritual and eternal to the sordid and earthly; and is it any marvel that with such a maimed and distorted Christianity, earth still groans under the slavery of sin?

In what church or home would the lowly Nazarene be recognized, could he return? "Careful and anxious about many things!" but not of the one thing needful. Careful that the body be well fed, and clothed, and housed! Careful that the latest style be faithfully adopted, and the outward fair and irreproachable; but not equally careful that the soul be growing beautiful in the sight of angels and the pure in heart.

The Martha and Mary type may still be found on the earth. The one too material and engrossed in the carking, consuming cares of life to heed the beatific vision, which still whispers to her in every lull of worldliness; the other too exclusively spiritual.

To our mind nothing shows more plainly the subjection of woman than her voluntary slavery to dress. Whether it be to please a husband, or to secure one, it matters not; the slavery is there, and obliges her to sacrifice health, conscience and gleams of purity and holiness which have flitted by all souls who have had any comprehension of Christly profession and imitation. "Marvel not that I said unto you, Ye must be born again." Strange, yet sublimely rudimental, transforming you from the earthly into the spiritual.

One badge or sign of your freedom, or servitude, is the dress you wear. If it is fitly symbolized by the "white raiment pure and clean," modest and useful apparel, though mocked at by the worldly, it may prove you to be in possession of the principles and integrity which will yield you a solace and joy such as can be found in the banquet halls of none but those who are truly married to the Lamb.

Man is more free; but, while showing most deeply the contamination consequent on having a burden-bearer at hand, instead of a companion, he has suffered far less than woman in many things. He has had the hardihood, after years of tinsel and ruffles, to discard them all for a more suitable, warm, and convenient clothing, while woman, hampered with confining skirts, shriveled and squeezed with pain producing ligatures, is so deformed that one would never imagine her part of that humanity that was "created upright." Submitting to fashion, which she despises, and which the better part of men also despise, but have not the strength to lift her above (for who would be seen with a plain or unfashionably-clad female friend), evidences her weakness and imbecility.

From whence, then, is to come woman's rescuer and freer? Christ did it, when, in the person of Paul, he declared that in Him "there was neither bond nor free, male nor female," etc. Christ did it again in every woman, who, like Mary, dared to learn Christly principles. Christ did it in Ann Lee, who ground the head of the serpentine nature in herself, and taught her followers to do the same. And those only become most truly free who thus gain the victory over themselves, and become redeemed from the earth.

"Stand fast, therefore, in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage."—Harvard, Mass.

WORK OF THE PRESENT.

By Anna White.

Time, with hour-glass in hand, marches on with great rapidity; none can stay its progress. Science has kept pace with time as it passed, and has brought forth many inventions, through which great results are produced. Telegraphic wires now almost belt the earth from pole to pole, and bear hourly tidings of weal or woe from continent to continent. One nation can commune with others beyond the isles of the sea; and friends can greet friends with kindly salutations in an almost incredibly short space of time.

Fleet vessels, impelled across oceans and seas by the power of steam, like so many floating palaces upon old Neptune's broad expanse, all bespeak the growth of ages.

Modern inventions may compete with this honored sire—Time—in swiftness; but are not more constant and steady in their flight than are the "sands of life" as they fall from Time's measured glass. And, as we are borne along on life's journey, eternity opens her pearly gates to our mental vision; and, as immortal beings we peer out into the unknown future, as before us it rises in grandeur and beauty.

We sing of the "better land," where brothers and sisters will "meet to part no more." Very few profess to believe that the partial, selfish relations of the generative order will be recognized there; but all seem to think that, by some metaphysical process, parents and children, husbands and wives, etc., will be changed into angels, and that God will show particular favor to them; and that families from the earth-sphere will be re-united in heaven.

But, may it not be asked: what makes that land, to which we are all hastening, the better land? Is it the place, or the changed condition of individuals, that will augment their happiness? If it depend upon changed conditions, cannot that change, by some means, be effected now? and thus produce the ability to sing and speak of the good time that has already come, in the present?

Is there not too much indulgence in ideal dreams of the future, to the neglect of present duty, or failure to comprehend it? Would it not be better to cast about, and see if there cannot be found an existing order on the earth where the will of God is done, "as it is done in heaven?" and, if not successful in finding it, why not make individual efforts to establish such an order of things? Is the price too great? Would it require too much self-sacrifice? Or, is it more convenient to wait until compelled by what is termed death? God loves the cheerful giver; and he will not fail to reward all who will diligently seek him, and make willing sacrifices to promote his cause.

If this were done, then would our eternal parents be honored; and every such one would be a blessing to humanity; and would be able to render due praise to the past; to revere the good and true, and reject the false; and to sacredly hold to all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, which have come down to us as an inheritance.

Thus should we all live in the present, doing the work of our own time properly and profitably, receiving beautiful inspirations of the Spirit to aid us; and should be fully prepared for the great future, in which we hopefully expect to wear the laurels that we have justly earned.

So we will say: "Let time continue its march, hour-glass in hand." We would not lessen its speed; and there will be no cause of regret, if every duty is well done.—Mt. Lebanon.

TO YOUTH.

By Lucy J. Osborne.

While perusing the November number of THE SHAKER, my attention was particularly drawn to the article headed "Angel Eyes are Upon Us," and to the beautiful poem appended thereto, entitled "We are Seen."

Those sentiments appeal so directly to the conscience, that it seems to me they cannot fail to awaken thoughtful considerations in every reflective mind, and I felt an ardent desire that all youthful readers, whose eyes might trace those impressive lines, should feel the great necessity of "applying their hearts unto wisdom," and of remembering that youth is the time to form a good character, and so lay a foundation for future usefulness and happiness, which can be done only by self-culture. And if youth and children could be impressed with the all-important truth that "God is Light," and that their every action is open to the inspection of angels, and must eventually be brought into judgment, would it not be a powerful inducement to many to speak the truth, and to live more innocently? And would it not lead them to honor their parents and guardians, by obeying their counsels, thus fitting them to become useful and ornamental members of society?

Many temptations beset the youthful mind, and if all could be impressed with the simple truth, that it is far more noble to acknowledge a fault than to dissemble, and seek to hide it, how much trouble of mind and remorse of conscience it would save. I earnestly and affectionately exhort my young friends to lay aside all that vain and foolish pride which would hinder them from confessing their faults. Remember that "God is Love," as well as Light. He is merciful and forgiving, and all souls belong to him. He is not a respecter of persons, but of character; and his love flows to all repentant hearts, whether in savage or civilized nations—in the palace or the humble cottage. Let us trust in Truth; there is strength and beauty in it. Let it be our motto, and it will prove an unfailing friend to both aged and youth, in sickness and health, in life and in death.—Hancock, Mass.

HANNIBAL, Mo., November 16, 1872.

Dear Brother Frederick: Please accept my thanks, and the fifty cents for "The Shaker" another year.

I would not be without it for twice its price. Its sweet influence comes to me like angel whispers from that better land, cheering me along the sad and lonely way of life.

O when may I join those "brave conquerors," for so you are, who battle with your own affections, and the whole army of the world's desires. God bless you for the good you are exerting. My heart is with you all.

SYLVINIA JENKINS.

FORGIVENESS.

By Rhoda Blake.

Forgiveness is a lovely grace. Any one who can, in sincerity, say to an enemy, "Thou art forgiven," feels the peace of Heaven. Such possess the spirit of the dying Jesus, when he said "Father forgive them, they know not what they do." But, were the murderous designs of his persecutors changed by his tender words? Did his forbearance destroy their venom, or appease their cruel rage? Ah, nay; but it was the crown of his own glory, and a lesson for all succeeding generations! With sorrow, not malice, he viewed their unsubdued passions; and, while they reviled, he was tender and compassionate. The cross which He had borne proved effectual in that hour of trial and need, and he triumphed over that measure of death and hell which compassed his enemies. How unlike was the spirit of those persecuting Jews, when compared with the Heavenly Dove spirit which the lovely Jesus possessed, which was genuine forgiving love. This power of forgiving love is gained by self-denial, watchfulness, and prayer, and flows from true principle; it is not emotional, nor circumstantial, and will not flee the grasp when tried in the furnace of affliction. A loving, forgiving spirit is not the companion of pride, hatred, and revenge; between them, there is no concord. The Christian spirit teaches love and forgiveness, not merely in word, but in deed, and possesses a healing power. When Jesus, through the anointing of the Christ Spirit which rested upon him, healed the sick, the halt and the blind, of their physical infirmities, his word to them was, "Go and sin no more." And now, the united voice (or word) of the dual Christ Spirit, which administers a healing power to sin sick souls, as well as to diseased bodies, is "Deny self; take up the cross, and bear it; go, and sin no more." In this, "the two anointed ones"—Jesus and Ann—are our exemplars. Jesus, according to Sacred Writ, rejected the tempter when he promised all the kingdoms of the world to him, if he would serve him and bow down to the principles which constitute the world; but he bade the tempter depart, and bowed his spirit in submission to the will of God.

It would appear that the power of forgiveness, depends upon the co-operation of the forgiven, with the forgiver. Peter said "How often shall I forgive my brother? till seven times?" Jesus answered, until seventy times seven. Again, "If thy brother trespass against thee seven times in a day, if he will repent, forgive him." Sinning against humanity, and our own bodies, often arising from ignorance and force of circumstances, can more easily be forgiven, than sin, or rebellion against spiritual, divine light, given to guide and lift the soul into union and communion with God. This is called sinning against the Holy Ghost, or Holy Spirit. Those who thus sin to a great extent, do not often repent so deeply that forgiving love and power can reach them.—Mt. Lebanon.

PROMPTITUDE.

By Martha J. Anderson.

"Delay shortens life, and abridges industry; while promptitude enlarges both."

This is an essential element of character, and should be incorporated in every person's code of individual laws, to enable them to properly and profitably perform the work assigned them in life's busy sphere of action. Said one anciently: "To every thing there is a season, and a time for every purpose under heaven." But dilatoriness, and disinclination to labor, allows proper seasons to slip by unimproved, while good purposes are too often frustrated for the want of decisive action at the right moment. There is a competency of time for the fulfilment of noble ends and aims, if we rightly improve the present. It is procrastination that breaks the golden threads of life's fair web, and causes us vexation. Like a weird ghost, he haunts the scenes of our daily avocations, and plausibly guarantees a pleasanter time than that which now is for the accomplishment of our allotted duties; but the by-and-by only superadds to accumulated labors; and, when necessity assumes her rule, we are fretted into a state of fevered excitement, and then leave our work but half performed.

It is not fitful strokes of zeal
That add the most to human weal,
But patient labor, hourly wrought,
Has wealth amass'd and increase brought.

But few persons are habitually prompt; a natural disposition to ease, combined with mental inertia, incapacitates the many for necessary activity, which incites to promptness of action. It is well to be punctual; better to be ready beforehand, meeting appointments, fulfilling agreements in an orderly and punctual manner, keeping pace frontward of the marching hours.

Promptness is a point of culture that all may attain unto by self discipline. Those who are dilatory should feel the just censure which persistent tardiness often incurs from those who know the precious worth of time, and are instant in duty. Some individuals are regularly inattentive to regulations, being a little late on every occasion. If the bell rings at the accustomed hour, it is five or ten minutes too soon for their convenience; if a special call is made for concentration of labor on some extra branch of business, their leisurely movements in preparation leave them in the rear of the active, who are prompt in every motion, evincing an interest to sustain and carry forward to its ultimate any project the intent of which is for mutual benefit. Such have, for their motive power, determined will. It is just this push-ahead and promptness that completes the thorough business man and woman, gives character and effect to any enterprise, and makes the machinery of life run smoothly.

The blacksmith draws the red-hot metal from the glowing furnace, but does he form his model after he has taken the iron from the fire? Not so; he is ready to strike while yet the heat is luminous, and the material malleable, that he may fashion it according to his will, and the living sparks that fly tell us that to "strike while the iron is hot" is not a meaningless phrase.

Here is a lesson for the young, who are now moulding their characters on the anvil of life (for good or evil just as they will it). Now is the time to straighten the crooked places, while there is ardency of purpose and pliancy of will. The hammer of truth is effective in shaping aright; do not delay to use it with wakeful vigor, to the end that you may be fitted for useful and substantial members of society, the healthful condition of which is dependent on the qualification of its members, who should each fulfil their office so perfectly and actively that a glow of health and invigorating life may add to the structure, strength and beauty.

Delay has stamped on human acts the blight of misspent time and uncompleted purpose, while magnificent thought-built project towers reel and crumble to the dust for the want of solid foundations, laid in actual labor and experience.

'Tis hands that do and hearts that bear
Which lift the burden, lighten care,
And give to life an aspect fair
In this wide world of ours.

So, let us heed each burden-freighted moment that speaks of the blessed "now" to do and bear, that light-winged they may glide into the sunny side of eternity, to smile on our future existence. "We should cultivate that athletic frame of soul which rejoices in abundant occupation, that we may find the sweetness of that repose which follows finished work, and the zest of that recreation in which no delinquent feeling mingles, and on which no neglected duty frowns."

EVOLUTION.

It was held, by philosophers, that all worlds were originally projected from their respective suns, and were then in a gaseous nebulous state, owing to the intense heat of those luminaries; and that, as they cooled, they became planets, and are now gradually condensing, and will continue so to do, until they fall back into their respective suns, to be again projected in the form of gaseous nebula.

PROPHETS.

By whom were the Prophets inspired?
Or whence came their rhythmical song?
That Avatars have play'd on their lyres,
As they march'd with the ages along?

Was it not by the angelic throng,
Who inhabit Eternity's strand,
The Christs of the innermost spheres,
Who await the Deific command?

The heaven of heavens their home,
Where all primal cells were first form'd:
By these all creation has come,
Have never by evil been storm'd.

From thence were the Prophets inspired,
'Mid the races and nations of earth:
Prophetesses, too, tuned their lyres,
As they sang of the heavenly birth.

Pure glory on glory I see,
For ever and ever advancing,
Rolling on like the billowy sea,
With the grandest of music enchanting.

To the sun, the bright sun, we ascend,
Returning from whence we proceeded;
As planets, when roll'd to the end,
In oceans of fire are bathed.

ANALOGY.

By Marcia M. Bullard.

DEAR EDITRESS—Observing in the January number of the "Shaker and Shakeress," an appeal for the Waste Basket, I contribute my mite for the support of this honorary appendage of an editor.

While contemplating the beauties of God's work with his creatures from the earliest ages to the present time, I see a beautiful analogy of the past in the present. That work which was foreshadowed in Israel finds its anti-type in Zion.

In ancient Israel, animal indulgences were atoned for by animal sacrifices; thus typifying the present work of God, wherein the animal nature of man and woman is slain, and the inspirational influence of Divine Love lifts the soul above the base desires of that nature, up to a higher plane, illumined by the light of his countenance.

When I look abroad upon the face of the earth, and behold the Spirit of God "moving upon the waters," striving to raise souls from the horrible pit of indulgences, by the many reform movements in operation, I ask, is there one spot on this fair earth so far redeemed from the blight of sin, that purity can reign supreme?—a place where woman no longer forms a part of man; but, as pre-figured in the prophetic allegory of creation, is taken from his side, and made an independent entity, united to him only in works of righteousness, pure love, kindly feelings?—where the highest aspirations are to form the Angel character, by a total denial of all wrong appetites, and unchaste desires, thus completely ruling over self?

And an echo rolls across the troubled waters, from the dual-masted "tiny craft," in answer: There is! and we delight to bear the glad tidings of peace, love and joy in the life of Christ to all people.

GONE HOME.

Since last account published in our paper we have the following obituary report:

At Canterbury, Polly Kimball, aged 94, deceased Sept. 5th, 1872. Stephen H. Mead, aged 13 years, drowned Nov. 1872. Catharine Lyon, aged 72, deceased Dec. 9th, 1872. At New Lebanon, Dorcus Sweet, aged 39, died Nov. 18th, 1872. Nov. 20th, 1872, Mercy McLean, aged 83 years. At Watervliet, N. Y., Alexander Youngs, business agent of Second Family, aged 57. His demise is a sad bereavement to this family—deceased Dec. 29th, 1872. At New Lebanon, Elder Daniel J. Hawkins, deceased Jan. 15th, 1873. He was brought up from infancy in the Gospel of Christ's Second Appearing, was a trustee for about 40 years or more; at the age of about 81 or 82, was appointed leading Elder of South Family, which place he occupied until his demise at the age of 92 years.

TRUTH OF INWARD LIFE.

The truth cannot be compressed into a sermon. The reply to Pilate's question, "What is truth," cannot be contained in any verbal form. Think you that if Christ himself could have answered that question in a certain number of sentences, he would have spent thirty years of life in witnessing to it? Some men would compress into the limits of one reply, or one discourse, the truth it took Christ thirty years to reach, and left unfinished for the Spirit to complete. The truth is infinite as the firmament above you. In childhood both seem near and measurable; but with years they grow and grow, and seem further off and further, and grander and deeper, and vaster, as God himself; till you smile to remember how you thought you could touch the sky, and blush to recollect the proud and self-sufficient way in which you used to talk of knowing "the truth." Truth is made up of principles; an inward life, not any formula of words. God's character—spiritual worship—the divine life in the soul. How shall I put that into a sentence, ten or ten thousand? How could Pilate's question be answered except by a life? The truth, then, which Pilate wanted—which you and I want—is not the boundless verities but truth of inward life. Truth for me; truth enough to guide me in this darkling world; enough to teach me how to live, and how to die.—F. W. Robertson.

BLESSINGS FOR THE FAITHFUL.

ENFIELD, N. H.

1. Salth God, Unto those who keep my way pure, I'll open my fountains a-bove; On those who are faithful, my blessings I'll pour, And comfort their souls with my love,
 2. A cloud In the day I'll spread o'er my flock; A pill-lar of fire, by night, Shall lead them, and show them I am their sure Rock, And they my peculiar delight.

I'll be un-to them a kind Parent and Friend, And they shall be children of mine; My wings of protection shall o'er them extend, And make them in glory to shine.
 Then, be not dismay'd nor yet be ye cast down; Fear not, though some trials you meet; But wing your way through to my mansions in heaven: You'll there have a beautiful seat.

LINCOLN AND STANTON.

By Cecilia Devyr.

Strange was their station, call'd to guide a strife

That shook a continent from sea to sea;
 To order death along the ranks of life,
 And wrap in flames the blessings yet to be.
 'Twas their's to speak the word of stern command

That gave the inspiration to the hour,
 As if they knew an earnest spirit-band
 Sustain'd and aided every human power.
 They struck with deadly shafts the monstrous crime

That fiends had fortified with walls of lies;
 They made it feel the weight of judgment time

In crimson earth, and more than crimson skies.
 They made the wrath of man conduce
 To aid the plans of Wisdom and of Love;
 To turn the raging passions into use,
 They sent the Vulture to precede the Dove.
 'Twas their's to make the red-mouth'd cannon speak,

And call the warrior to his gory field;
 And it was their's to screen the low and meek,
 And be, for God, their guardians and their shield.

When storms of fury swept across the land,
 We sought protection only from on high;
 They broke the cloud, to show us Mercy's hand,
 And bade us on the Nation's heart rely.

In faith we prayed that duty might be done;
 That Freedom might her heritage possess;
 That peace and victory, through terrors won,
 Should "come to stay," and banish all distress.

And is not prayer a focalizing power,
 To draw the fires of truth, to burn the dross?
 Ah, well we proved it in that fearful hour
 When human vision saw but human loss.
 'Twas not for party, nor for section proud,
 That Zion's ardent supplications rose;
 But that the land should be with right endow'd,
 And God should his progressive laws disclose

When hung the Proclamation's shining page
 All bright-triumphant for the world to feel,
 Then came the spirit of unconquer'd rage,
 And stamp'd it fiercely with a sable seal;

And it became the death-decree of him
 Who was the instrument of hosts unseen,
 And then a passport through the valley dim,
 And through the gates that weighty forces screen.

But Prophecy, the child of fervent prayer,
 Gave Zion light to view a future grand,
 And bade her faithfully herself prepare
 To aid the work immortal spirits plann'd.
 We saw the tears that mingled near and far
 Wash from that seal the blackness of its face;
 And now it beams a brilliant changeless star,
 The pledge of freedom to an injured race.

How gratefully our hearts recall that time;
 How place we Stanton close by Lincoln's side
 Amid his toils, his sacrifice sublime,
 And 'neath the burdens of whose weight he died.

One balmful thought, to which he oft referr'd,
 And drew its solace round his closing life,
 Was, that his heart compassionately heard
 The claims of Zion to be free from strife.
 Oh, not with hero-worshippers we bend;
 But honor give to whom is honor due:
 Pray God to bless whome'er will truth defend,
 While yet perchance "they know not what they do."

ANCIENT PILGRIMS.

By Julia Johnson.

Lord, make our spirits whiter—
 White as the driven snow;
 Like to the ancient pilgrims,
 Who suffer'd here below.
 Give us a heart that's humble,
 Touch'd with the martyr's zeal;
 Clothe us with truth and wisdom,
 And make pure love our seal.

Fill us with thoughts of heaven,
 Of worthiness, and prayer;
 And with thine arm, O save us
 From ev'ry earthly snare.
 Lead us unto the fountain
 Whence flows the living stream—
 Sweet waters of repentance,
 Which will the soul redeem.
 Where bloom the fairest flowers
 That flourish here below;
 Where walk the brightest beings

That earth can ever know.
 O lead us, Holy Spirit,
 Down in the lowly vale,
 Where fear and mortal bondage
 The soul cannot assail;

Where tears of sinful sorrow
 Flood not the pure in heart;
 Nor sense of earthly yearning,
 Life's piercing pangs impart.
 Lord, make our spirits whiter—
 White as the driven snow;
 Like to the holy ancients
 Who conquer'd death below.

ENGLISH SPIRITUALISM.

"It does move."

—O—

THE contest that is raging in England between Protestant skeptics and Spiritualists in relation to supernatural events, is not generally known by Americans, both parties being firm believers in the principles involved, and in the facts produced by them in the past. The Church of England and its sectarists, are continually and persistently teaching faith in the "miracles" and spiritualistic phenomena of former ages, and in preceding dispensations. Spiritualists, while adhering to that belief, add thereunto faith in the recurrence and occurrence, in our own day and generation, of all the supernatural phenomena of former times; as recorded in authentic writings or scriptures of the Jews and Christians; and not excluding similar reliable records by other races and nations, whether so recorded in or outside of their Bibles.

The spiritualists are waging an aggressive war, and have made repeated onslaughts against the established Church of England and her daughters, the "dissenting" sects, as they lay intrenched behind the scientists, headed by Prof. Faraday, and with somewhat a similar chance of success that Lord Cardigan possessed when he "rode into the jaws of death" with his intrepid "six hundred."

The British press, like the walls of ancient Babylon, surrounding all other institutions, have pursued a system of masterly-inactivity tactics — dogged silence. It has stood immovable in its towering contempt, presenting to Spiritualists a front impregnable and unassailable with any hope of success.

Some two years ago, the "London Dialectical Society" was formed, composed of about thirty-six distinguished, learnedly — scientific men, with the avowed purpose of "laying" all the spirits that had been "conjured up" by the Spiritualists. After attending séances and critically examining the modern supernatural manifestations (a fair and rational mode of procedure, and the very one the Church and its sects should have adopted), the result is, itself, the most wonderful of all hitherto publicly known spiritual phenomena. For these thirty-six scientists, under the lead of H. G. Atkinson Esq., F. G. S., having spent two years attending the séances of thirty-two of the most distinguished Spiritualists, beginning with Emma Hardinge and ending with Home, the aristocratic medium, thus report:

"Your committee, taking into consideration the high character and great intelligence of many of the witnesses to the more extraordinary facts, the extent to which their testimony is supported by the reports of the sub-committees, and the absence of any proof of imposture or delusion as regards a large portion of the phenomena; and, further, having regard to the exceptional character of the phenomena, the large number of persons in every grade of society and over the whole civilized world, who are more or less influenced by a belief in their supernatural origin, and to the fact that no philosophical explanation of them has yet been arrived at, deem it incumbent upon them to state their conviction that the subject is worthy of more serious attention and careful investigation than it has hitherto received."

The statements of witnesses are given at length, embracing an accurate description, amplified by cross-examination, of some of the most remarkable phenomena which have been witnessed. This important evidence may be thus summarized:

1. Thirteen witnesses state that they have seen heavy bodies—in some instances men—rise slowly in the air, and remain there for some time, without visible or tangible support.

2. Fourteen witnesses testify to having seen hands or fingers, not appertaining to any human being, but life-like in appearance and mobility, which they have sometimes touched, or even grasped, and which they are therefore convinced were not the result of imposture or illusion.

3. Five witnesses state that they have been touched by some invisible agency on various parts of the body, and often, when requested, when the hands of all present were visible.

4. Thirteen witnesses declare that they have heard musical pieces well played upon instruments not manipulated by any visible agency.

5. Five witnesses state that they have seen red-hot coal applied to the hands or heads of several persons without producing pain or scorching.

6. Eight witnesses state that they have received precise information through rappings, writings, and in other ways, the accuracy of which was unknown at the time to themselves or to any persons present, and which, on subsequent inquiry, was found to be correct.

7. Three witnesses state that they have been present when drawings, both in pencil and colors, were produced in so short a time, and under such conditions as to render human agency impossible.

8. Six witnesses declare that they have received information of future events, and that in some cases the hour and minute of their occurrence have been accurately foretold days, and even weeks before.

The work also contains communications, letters and statements from many persons."

THE LONDON TIMES.

—O—

As Cyrus, in his siege of Babylon, after finding that he could neither breach the walls nor successfully storm the gates, simply turned the river Euphrates, and, with his whole army marched in on its dry bed; and from the inside, himself opened the gates, so have the spiritualists turned the river of feeling and public opinion in England, respecting Spiritualism, by the report of this dialectical committee. And now the great gates of the city, the London Times, are actually opened.

The hitherto silent "Thunderer" did, last year, report a "Shaker" lecture, that included Spiritualism, delivered in St. George's Hall, while it would not lisp one word of a preceding lecture delivered by Emma Hardinge on Spiritualism itself, in the same hall. To-day, its mouth and columns are thrown wide open, in the cause of modern supernaturalism, and the whole English press are sure to follow in its wake.

The "New Dispensation" opened by the cotemporary and "John Baptist" of Ann Lee — Emanuel Swedenborg — is progressing toward its destined ultimatum, a permanent and reliable means of communication between this earth and the spirit world, that will effect a radical revolution in all existing national and social systems, in Church and State, preparatory to the final unfoldment of two distinct orders. It was spiritualism that presaged the downfall of ancient external Babylon, in which a great assembly of her lords, her priesthood and savans, saw the supernatural hand, writing on the wall, at the time of their midnight revels, "weighed in the balance and found wanting!"

Modern spiritualism is also perpetually prophesying the downfall of our mystical Babylon. Justice is holding the scales, and the disembodied souls of men and women in the spirit world, who, in their earth life, have suffered from, as they have partaken of, the evils and plagues of our modern Babylonish social system, are pronouncing and executing judgment. From the inner heavens the cry is heard, "Come out of her my people that ye be not partakers of her sins and that ye receive not of her plagues."

In ancient Babylonia Cyrus found the then chosen people of God — the Jews — who had incorporated spiritualism as one of the elements of their system. Josephus records how the Jewish priesthood, issued from their temple and city in gorgeous religious procession, to meet the "conquering hero," who was marching upon them, they showed him his own name in their sacred writings, as a prophesy of the very events then transpiring of which himself was the principal — the chief actor. And he, having previously seen the procession in a vision, had been instructed how to treat them, as they had been supernaturally instructed how to receive Cyrus and his army.

SPIRITUALISM AND SCIENCE.

—O—

(Reprinted from the TIMES of December 26, 1872.)

It is now nearly twenty years since the late Professor Faraday made public the result of his investigations into the then fashionable mania of table-turning. With apparent conclusiveness, he proved that the mysterious movements which were at that time the new nine-days' wonder of the world, arose from unconscious muscular action; but, such is the tenacity of a belief once received into the mind, this solution of the pseudo-miracle seems to have satisfied few but those who were prepared to accept it by previous disbelief. Spiritualism and its adherents never heeded it; they went on their way rejoicing, and rose day by day on stepping-stones of their former selves to mysteries wonderful and still more wonderful. Our Australian correspondence of this morning shows that the spiritualist epidemic has reached the Antipodes, and that it has already attained the dignity there of having its own Press, and, still more, its own schismatics and sectarians. That in a generation which boasts itself to be one of exact science and plain matter-of-fact, a belief should have been so long-lived, and should have grown even to such proportions that Mr. William Howitt, one of its chief fanatics, can number its adherents at "twenty millions," and that it should have attained to such an age and vitality without its falsity having been demonstrated to the satisfaction of all but the very ignorant, is strange indeed. It is evident either that the subject is surrounded by unusual difficulties, or that in this matter our scientific men have signally failed to do their duty by the public, which looks to them for its facts. We believe the latter to be the case. It may be said, and is said by some, that spiritualism was long ago investigated and proved to be a mass of imposture and delusion; but, as a matter of fact, this is not so, for there has never been undertaken an inquiry of that impartial, authoritative, and thorough nature which alone can decide a prejudiced controversy. Our savans, too much preferring to give themselves up to such matters as the descent of men from monkeys or the fertilization of the world by means of mossy stones falling through space, have forgotten that, however absurd the phenomena and paraphernalia of spiritualism may be, the sifting and settling of the whole matter, once and for all, would be a practical benefit, for which the age would thank them at least as much as it thanks them for recondite theories and abstract speculations, half of which are only laid up in print for the next generation to ridicule.

Mr. Home himself attended at one of the meetings, and gave evidence as to his "levitations" and "elongations," relating among other marvels, the generally-known story of a seance at the Tuilleries. He tells us of a lady who was in the habit of seeing "heads in her lap at night. They were quite luminous; there was quite a glow about them." The Master of Lindsay, now Lord Lindsay, and well known for his various scientific knowledge and researches, deposes to have seen Mr. Home elongated eleven inches, floating round a room in an arm-chair, "pushing the pictures out of their places as he passed along the walls" of a room at Mr. Milner Gibson's house. Lord Lindsay also testifies to Mr. Home having floated out of a window in Victoria street eighty-five feet from the ground, and in at another on the same story. He has seen Mr. Home in full light standing in the air seventeen inches from the ground.

Mr. G. H. Lewes, in a letter, full of sound maxims, cautioned the committee not to confound "the cause we do not know with an unknown cause;" and Professor Tyndall was willing to "pay due respect to the invitation of such men as Mr. Wallace or Mr. Crookes, and to witness whatever new phenomena they were in a position to show him."

Mr. G. H. Lewes gave golden advice when he said, "Distinguish between facts and inferences from facts." Mr. William Howitt asked whether the Dialectical Society, after having determined the truth of spiritualism which had "now received the assent of about twenty millions of people in all countries," would proceed to investigate the correctness of the theory of the Copernican system, of gravitation, or of the circulation of the blood; for spiritualism, he considered, "stood fairly on the same basis of fact."

These extracts from its pages may serve better than any thing else to give our non-spiritualistic readers some idea of the marvelous proportions to which the faith, which at first was a mere turning of tables, has swollen in these latter days.

Such was the Report on Spiritualism, and our readers will probably agree that, if it proves nothing else, it proves that it is high time competent hands undertook the unraveling of this Gordian knot. It must be fairly and patiently unraveled, and not cut through. The slash of an Alexandrian blade has been tried often enough, and has never sufficed. Scientific men forget that in the matter of Spiritualism they must make themselves fools that they may become wise. They must conform to the conditions imposed; even in conjuring one has to do as much as this. They must meet the "mediums" on their own ground, and, if possible, cut that ground from under their feet. To take an extreme case, Spiritualists assert that certain phenomena are only manifested in a half light, or in the dark; scientific men refuse to meet them under these conditions, and what is the result? Causes are not ascertained, delusions are not exposed, impositions are not detected, and the company of fools are confirmed in their belief. Surely a scientific man is a match for a medium, even in the dark; and surely the one can bring his science to bear wherever the other can bring his "mediumship," whatever that may be! We will suppose that the man of science consents to sit at a dark seance, and that something happens which he cannot explain. What then? He is not compromised or converted, and, without being in the least so, may go again and again, and it will be strange if by dint of precautions and expedients he cannot sift the whole matter in a very few sittings. It is owing to the stiffness of scientific men, and their refusal to meet the Spiritualists on their own ground, that this matter has not been settled long ago."

Thus is the wisdom of the wise confounded and their worldly greatness humbled. Mother Ann said, while in vision, "I see souls in the world of spirits who have lately set out to embrace the gospel, and I see them under the beautiful operations of the power of God. I saw Ezekiel Goodrich flying from one heaven to another." She spake of another soul who had "risen from the dead and come into the first heavens, and was traveling on to the second and third heavens." All of which goes to show that, while there may be chemistry, astronomy and even spiritualism, without Christianity, there can be no Christianity without spiritualism, ancient and modern. "These signs shall follow." They shall lay hands on the sick and heal them, as truly as did Jesus and his apostles, and do many wonderful and good works, under the head of Christian Spiritualism. — Ed.

SOUL PETRIFICATIONS.

By Giles B. Avery.

Petrification and death seem almost synonymous. "The soul that sinneth shall die" is a truth uttered from the mouth of God's prophets and witnessed to by the whole human family. Soul life is the beatific benediction conferred on man by the redeeming Gospel of Christ. "A crown of life" "Eternal life" is the bountiful reward of righteousness.

Not long since we were reading of the petrifying wells of England. According to the statements of our author the waters of these wells are pure, clear and limpid in appearance, and pleasant to the taste; but, so charged with silicate of lime, that, as their spray rests upon an object exposed to the air, where the moisture becomes evaporated, they coat that object with stone; or, if it be porous, they charge the pores with stone, so that, in a few months, its whole substance becomes, as it were, changed to stone. The most delicate vegetables, as tiny mosses and flowers, exposed to the spray of these waters, are turned to stone; even bird's nests, and eggs — the germs of future life — become petrified! As on we read, and drink in the full sense of this narrative, our spiritual senses were quickened. A thrill of inspiring pleasure welled up in our heart, in the contemplation of our opportunities for the attainment of "eternal life," flowing from the heavenly fountains of inspiration and love, and fever its wells of salvation and joyous blessings. The beautiful plants of gospel graces, cherished by these pure and living waters, appeared fresh and green, decked in vernal bloom and gorgeous beauty transporting to the senses of the Gospel Traveler, and filled us with raptures; and our spirit instinctively poured out praises to God that a soul life, capacitated to appreciate and drink up this inspiration, was vouchsafed to the pure in heart.

Succeeding these transports of joy, a sadness indescribable seemed to pall our spirits as peering into the spiritual conditions and haunts of men, we saw myriad millions of our race whose souls were petrified with the stony waters from the wells of sinful worldly pleasure entombed in spiritual death! Many of these waters, like unto those of the petrifying wells of England, are pure to look upon, clear and limpid, pleasant to the taste, and cheering to the senses, but, alas! charged with soluble stone — limpid death — piercing every pore of the being and charging every fibre and sprig, yea, even the flowrets and germs of future spirit life, with death, — stone! Slowly, imperceptibly, but surely, petrifying the very soul itself, converting its lively sensibilities to stolid death.

Changed to this petrification human beings could be, for a time, in the angelic society of the pure and good, who were quaffing inspiration from the overflowing wells of salvation — the fountains of life, and love, and heaven — and yet be utterly insensible to their bliss! And, if this insensibility to heaven be not hell, vainly is the spirit of man gifted with sensation.

To those thus petrified by sinful pleasure, the most gorgeous flowers and luscious fruits of paradise were no better than the bitter apples on the slimy, murky beach of the sea of Sodom; all, all are without delight; for the perceptive faculties are entombed in stone! — stone so dense that repentant waters may not permeate the being. Hence, for such there is no forgiveness, as forgiveness is predicated on repentance. But these can only be relieved from their sarcophagus through sufferings of emptiness, hunger and solitude; hence, though they eventually have a resurrection, it is not of life, but of condemnation; and their revival into spiritual life must be slow and painful, like the evolutions of soil from the granite rock. This condition is the result of sinning against light, and the knowledge of the truth! It is a warning to those that are at ease in Zion! — an admonition to those who sit in heavenly places, and bask in the sunbeams of truth — not to partake of the pleasures of sin, which petrify the powers of sensation.

Soul life, — eternal life, — senses able to regale upon the odors of the flowers of heaven, and taste the sweetness of the fruits of Paradise; to enjoy the melodies of the angel choirs, and drink up with gustation the wine of consolation newly expressed from the clusters of the heavenly vine, are alone the rewards of a virtuous Christian life of virgin purity! — Mount Lebanon.

"INFIDELITY" or skepticism to the warring theology of Babylon, is one mark of a true Christian.

TO THE CHURCHES UNIVERSALLY — LET THOSE ANSWER WHO WILL.

Did Jesus do what he taught? Did he love his enemies, and do good to those who hated him? Did he bless them that cursed him, and pray for them who spitefully used him? And when they smote him on the one cheek, did he turn the other, also? Did he do unto others as he would have others do unto him? Did he loan to every one that asked him, hoping for nothing again? When he taught to judge not! did he judge? Condemn not! did he condemn? Forgive! did he forgive? Did he cast the beam (if he had one) out of his own eye, that he might see clearly to pull the mote out of his brother's eye?

Did he forsake father, mother, brothers, and sisters, and all worldly relations with its goods and possessions? Did he crucify his carnal life?

If so! Who are his followers? — Pleasant Hill, Ky.

TIME.

By Daniel Orcutt.

"Time and tide wait for no man." We are constantly reminded of this truth, as we leave days, weeks, months and years behind. And, are we becoming better, as golden opportunities come and go? We are certainly growing better or worse.

Writer, how stands the verdict regarding yourself? You must know, if you are true to your own conscience. Having lately crossed the line which separates 1872 from 1873, what is your ultimate aim for the present year? Your aims may be good. But good desires, without corresponding efforts, will not benefit you. If you make earthly pleasure your ultimate aim, you will certainly fail of finding real happiness. "For what is earthly pleasure? 'Tis like the snowflake on the river. One moment there, then gone for ever."

The desire to be like the meek and lowly Saviour, unless that desire calls forth daily practical obedience, will not make you like him. If you would live with Jesus in heaven, you must live to Christ on earth. The time allotted you for heavenly discipline, and for holy living, like the current of a mighty river, is swiftly passing. Therefore, give earnest heed to the injunction, "Work while it is day." For "to-day is gold, tomorrow is dust." Resolve to be so pure in heart that you can "see God" in yourself; and act fully up to that purpose; then the work of redemption will have commenced. Will you make that resolve? The prudent mariner, when sailing in windy latitudes, sweeps the horizon with his glass, to ascertain if there are signs of a storm. As night approaches, he shortens sail, sets his watch, and keeps a good look-out. If prudence be necessary when applied to things of time, how much more so when applied to our religious life here, and to the life which is to come? For the soul is of more importance than the body; and time is of less importance than eternity. "A prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself; but the simple pass on, and are punished." — Enfield, Conn.

AMERICAN SLAVERY.

THE WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE QUESTION — THE CASE OF SUSAN B. ANTHONY.

THE case of Susan B. Anthony, who was arrested on charge of illegally voting at Rochester, at the late presidential election, was before the United States District Court, Judge Hall presiding, at the city hall, yesterday. The court room was crowded with spectators, among whom were Miss Lydia Mott, Mrs. Jane Hesse, Miss Phoebe Jones, and other ladies. Judge Henry R. Selden, of the counsel for Miss Anthony, briefly recited the facts that at the late presidential election, held in the 29th congressional district, Miss Anthony appeared before the registration board and was registered, and at the election she appeared and cast her ballot, and it was received and counted the same as the others, and the cause and the sole cause of her arrest is, that she was a woman. If this proceeding is sanctioned, she will be punished simply because she is a woman. He asked her discharge because she had a constitutional right to offer her ballot and express her choice as to whom she desired for her rulers. The right of woman to vote is not an appropriate matter for consideration here. It is not claimed that, under the State constitution, Miss Anthony is entitled to vote; such authority can only be found in the laws of the United States. He cited the first constitution and the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments in support of his position. He held that the 14th amendment, although the fact might have been overlooked by its constructor, gave to all citizens, whether men or women, the right to vote and hold office, and that therefore Miss Anthony, being a citizen under the constitution, in being taxed, etc., possessed all the rights and privileges of a citizen, together with the political right to hold office and vote; and the constitution of the United States did not give to any State the right to restrict the right of suffrage. Mr. Selden's argument was quite lengthy and exhaustive.

Judge Hall said he was of the opinion that Miss Anthony had no right to vote, and decided to discharge the writ of habeas corpus, but denied the application for her discharge from custody, and allowed the case to go before the supreme court of the United States, where he understood, they desired carrying it. — Albany Express.

Susan B. Anthony is, or she is not, a human being. If she is a human being, she may do wrong, and may be punished for that wrong under laws which she had no part in forming, and by executive officials of those laws, whom she had no voice, or choice, or vote, in electing. Is that republicanism, or is it Church and State slavery not yet abolished?

PENALTY vs. TRANSGRESSION.

By Nicholas Briggs.

BELIEVING that God is just, and that strict justice will be impartially awarded to all his creatures, we confidently anticipate reward for faithful obedience to his known behests, and corresponding punishment for transgression.

The law of penalty and the law of recompense are co-existent; a comfort to the virtuous; a terror to the vicious. They are inexorable laws, governing our moral and spiritual as they govern our physical being.

They do not well who ignore retribution for sin, or at least imply as much in their specious arguments; and while we may respect the sincerity of their motives, we must condemn the sophistry and deplore its influence.

Rogues and libertines find eminent satisfaction in the idea that future punishment is a myth — an antiquated notion.

We rejoice that ecclesiastical thunder no more terrifies the masses; that the dogmatism of fanatical religionists, and the arbitrary creeds of pseudo-reformers, no longer fetter the minds of intelligent men and women. We hail, with infinite pleasure, the era of free thought and speech; but every Christian, every true lover of mankind who desires to behold virtue as the acme of all aspiration, would have philosophy and science co-operate with religion in ameliorating the condition of our race.

Inevitably we are social beings. Our destinies are as closely interwoven as the twigs of the climbing vine. Being virtuous ourselves we breathe purity on our brother and sister, who are therefore made better and happier for our existence. We illuminate the little world in which we move with a holy light that pierces the dark places, turning gloom and despair into beautiful hope and trust. Our conversation is elevating and soul-inspiring, and our daily life gives tone and color and health to society.

But when men are low, and gross, and sensual, this influence is deadly poison, infectious and contagious; a moral Upas, near which no good thing can thrive. Bad men draw down society to their own level, and fiendishly exult in defacing the image of God; but this exultation is succeeded by remorse for the suffering and ruin they have caused, and despair at their own degradation. They have condign punishment, a veritable hell, grim and terrible. "The present is hell, and the coming tomorrow adds new torture to the curse of to-day."

In further elucidation of our subject, we will present a little parable.

A poor man receives notification from a distant country that, by appearing in person within a specified time, he may become the possessor of sufficient wealth to render him comfortable for life. He succeeds in obtaining money with which to prosecute his journey, and embarks with bright anticipations for the future.

On the way, through cruel robbery, his little all is lost, and the delay thus occasioned is fatal to his bright hopes, for, by his non-appearance the property passes into other hands.

Formerly he had managed, by dint of industry and economy, to eke out a comfortable subsistence; but now the disastrous disappointment proves too great for him, and he turns to intoxicating drinks to forget his sorrow.

The robber, the author of all this trouble, is at last touched with remorse, and seeking his victim, tenders in full the amount of which he had despoiled him, penitently expressing sorrow and asking forgiveness.

The injured man replies: "Restore me wealth, which through you I lost — honor and position in society, which but for you I might now be enjoying. You are the cause of all my misery; restore me, therefore, to happiness, ere I forgive you."

The application and relevancy of this supposed case are apparent.

If a man deviate from the straight road to Heaven's Kingdom, he may, by carefully retracing every false step, regain the true path; and though he find himself behind his former comrades, and the loser of much valuable time, still the misfortune is confined to himself, and he has done no injury to other souls. But if he mislead a fellow-pilgrim, the case becomes more complex. He finds, after taking observation and ascertaining his position on the chart of life, that he has not only himself to restore to rectitude, but his brother also. His victim may have wandered into many by-paths—may have become entangled in bogs and morasses; he must be sought, extricated, and toiled for until he is again restored to Heaven's road. The penitent may have to work years, aye ages, to effect this; but justice demands that he shall retrieve the results of his own conduct, dire as they may be.

Is not our reasoning logical? Is not our conclusion reasonable? By simply tracing back effect to cause, and contrasting our original error with its logical result, injury, perhaps irreparable, to ourselves and other souls, have we not indeed a full penalty for transgression?—Canterbury.

THE PRESS.

[Evening Register, Hudson.]

"THE SHAKER AND SHAKERESS." This is the title of an exceedingly neat quarto publication, issued monthly by the Shaker Society at Mount Lebanon, and ably edited by Elder Frederick W. Evans. While it must be a powerful auxiliary to the Society in whose interests it is conducted, from the high tone of its general contents and the literary ability it displays, it cannot fail to be popular with a large class outside the Shaker community. We welcome it to our table.

METHODIST SERMON.

"The first requisite with a little child is not to teach it the Lord's Prayer, or ask it, What is God?—What is heaven, or hell? But teach it to take care of its health; teach it physiology; teach it, as it can understand, simple facts in science.

"Just so with men and women who tell me they are ready for heaven, and know exactly God's intentions about the race. Why, they cannot tell you the difference between a cabbage and a goose! They know about God, and don't know one simple law of health! Ready for heaven, and so ignorant of themselves, they bring children into the world with not enough physical stamina to live! And why? Because, by debauchery and sin, they have entailed on their children their own rottenness and weakness.

"We must learn to raise children aright before we talk of religion. Religion, I insist, is last, not first. We must learn all about this world before we study the next world. Better learn to boil potatoes than study theology.

"Why have we so many skeptics in the church? Why do not our young men attend church? because they have been taught authority—authority all their youth up, instead of being taught to rely on their own strength—to stand on their own two feet.

"First, that which is natural, said old Paul. He was right. First, know the laws governing your own bodies—first, know of this world: first, study science, and then build your religious faith on that science.

"You cannot get science from the Bible. The fathers of the church tried to do that, and a flat world, with angels above the molten heavens, to drag the sun out of a pit in the morning, was Bible astronomy. This is all wrong. We have begun at the wrong end. The true law is science first, and then religion."—Bann of Light.

True science is Shaker theology.—Ed.

CARD.

LEBANON SPRINGS, November 10.

In the Banner of October 26th I regret to see the revival of an error which went the rounds of the press some months ago, and which, at the time, I denied by published cards. Please do me the justice to state—

1. As I regard the Shaker order as a testimony against "the pollutions that are in the world through lust," I have never desired their renunciation of celibacy.

2. As I consider the greater part of their discipline as eminently protective of the celibate life, I have never desired the abrogation of any rule that prohibits shaking hands and kissing.

3. As I view their societies as nuclei for some of the purest and most refined of human souls, I deprecate their dissolution, unless that God shall build up for poor humanity some equally as good or better "covert from the tempest."

Yours for truth,

J. ROBE.

THE BLOOD.

—o—

Six thousand years after his era began,
The astonishing fact was discovered by man,
That the blood in his body does not remain still,
But rushes along like the race from a mill.

Certain vessels called arteries, hidden within
The body, conduct from the heart to the skin,
While others called veins throughout every part
Of the system conduct from the skin to the heart.

The heart every instant gets fill'd with new blood,
Prepar'd as you'll see, from the air and the food;
And this new blood is driven throughout the whole frame,
As from a force-pump by the force of the same.

The blood in its passage leaves everywhere
Some of what it has got from the food and the air,
Which is all taken up, ere a moment be gone,
To replenish the tissue, the fat and the bone.

Throughout the whole structure—bone, muscle, or skin—
Where the arteries end the veins begin,
And changing its colour from red blood to black,
The blood enters the veins and is so carried back.

When the old blood arrives by the veins at the heart,
It is mixed and churned up in a chamber apart,
With a thick milky fluid, nutritious and good,
Which the stomach and bowels have drawn from the food.

It is then driven off by a similar force
To the lungs, where the air cells receive it, in course;
Where at every breath it takes up through the skin
The material parts of the air within.

Thus regenerate, vigorous, lusty and red,
And once more forced back on its fountain head,
To the artery chamber it rushes again,
And is ready to start upon service again.

What we get from the air is equal in weight
To what we derive from the food which we eat;
But what we breathe out, I must tell you once more,
Is of poisons the worst, as I told you before.

In a much clearer light you now may perceive
What it's hoped you'll hold fast and devoutly believe,
That for health and enjoyment the very best fare
Is the soundest of food and the purest of air.

Then show that you value your blood and your skin,
Remove every nuisance without or within;
Obey all the laws that are made to that end,
And regard the inspector of health as your friend.

If your house has a taint, employ in good time
Either carbolic acid or chloride of lime;
But of all disinfectants the earth is the best—
Smells covered by earth are for ever at rest.

With all these precautions don't fear any harm,
And yield to no panic or foolish alarm;
When the enemy comes, be brave but prepared—
Survey your defenses and stand on your guard!

"It is not what we eat, but what we digest, that makes us fat; it is not what we read, but what we remember, that makes us learned;
it is not what we earn, but what we save, that makes us rich."

As the wild waves that fiercely contend in mid ocean touch gently the shore, and speak in the low, soft music of broken ripples, so will the heart, once tumultuous with passion, when brought under self-control, breathe holy love as it nears the promised land of rest.

To love the unlovely, to sympathize with the contrary-minded, to give to the uncharitable, to forgive such as never pity, to be just to men who make iniquity a law, to pay their ceaseless hate with never-ceasing love, is one of the noblest attainments of man, and in this he becomes most like God.—THEODORE PARKER.

FAITH is not a light thought that sweeps across the brain to be condensed and fall in tears; it is not a mere emotion like the wind that rises powerfully, then dies into the stillness of the air; neither is it like the light-ning's flash that gathers force to dissipate, and return from whence it came; nor the fragrance of the flower borne away by the passing breeze, but it is a life germ planted in the soul; and by cultivation and growth it gains strength and lifts the heart to high and holy aims, and opens the vision to the beauties of a new angelic life.

OUT WITH IT.

—o—

How many kind thoughts die unborn; how many kind words are stifled unspoken. Hearts hungry for a word of appreciation and praise, would leap for gladness if they knew the kindness that we feel toward them; but while they plod on in doubt and darkness, we stifle kindly aspirations, and the cheering thought and sympathizing word dies within our hearts and makes no sign. Why need we be so reticent concerning things that are good? Most people are outspoken enough when angry and discontented. They find fault boldly, with a relish; but words of praise are with them exceedingly few.

It is true that he that flattereth his neighbor spreadeth a net for his feet. We are to avoid flattery and fulsome praise. But yet, when a glow of honest admiration or approval rises within our hearts, why not out with it, and let it gladden others as it cheers us? How happy families might be if every thought of thankfulness manifested itself in speech and action from day to day. How many a home, now dreary and uncomfortable, might be made joyous with light and sunshine, if we would not only rebuke with fidelity, and reprove in love, but would also show in words and deeds our sense of gratitude and approval when we can honestly do so.—Exchange.

THE WASTE BASKET!

—o—

THAT bug-bear of impecunious writers of newspaper articles, the receptacle of the effusions of many ambitious aspirants for cheap notoriety, to you, poor suffering humanity, is much indebted.
Among newspaper and magazine writers of all descriptions and grades there is a continuous striving to excel in making all of their articles agreeable and readable. It is a positive necessity that their productions shall tickle the public taste.
It is a matter of bread and butter to them. No editor in the world would think for an instant of publishing an ill-written article, no matter how great the truth advanced. Though he may treasure the idea, and, at a future time, produce it in a more acceptable form, still the original is flung ignominiously into the Waste Basket. Disagreeable matters of news, police items, etc., are worked into as pleasant a shape as possible. It is the righteous fear of the Waste Basket, and the consequent diminution of the means of living, that brings matters of fact and fancy to us in a piquant, pithy form. By this same benefactor of mankind are we saved from the infliction of numberless wretched love stories with the inevitable conclusions.

So ought we not to recognize in the Waste
Basket, an institution proper of every sanctum editorial, the wholesome dread of which makes us brush up our memories for the almost forgotten rules of punctuation and rhetoric? Then long live the Waste Basket! and let us unite in keeping this appendage of the "Shaker and Shakeress" full to repletion. We shall find on trial, that the more we write, the better we write. Write an article for every issue, for a year, and let them all be consigned to the Waste Basket; still, be not discouraged; for an idea in some one of them may suggest a train of thought to another mind, the expression of which may be fraught with value to mankind. I close with a promise and a wondering; a promise to do the share of one at least in this direction, and a wondering as to the company amongst which this article will find itself, when consigned to the "Waste Basket." E.

A. DOOLITTLE, EDITRESS.

FREEDOM OF THOUGHT.

IN days of yore we had so much veneration for our sires and grandsires, and such entire confidence in their opinions, that we felt safety in thinking and believing much as they thought and believed. Occasionally an erratic individual would venture to strike out for him or herself an independent course of action; but such were sure, while striving to get the wheels of their car of progress out of the old ruts in which they had been accustomed to run, to feel the strong pressure of conservative public opinion. This was grievous to bear. But times are gradually changing, and conservatism is yielding to the progressive tendencies of the age.

All now claim the right to think and act freely for themselves, independent of the past. Human ideality of to-day is raising a higher standard of truth and right to gather around; for the present generation is reaping the benefit of the ripest experiences of the most coherent thinkers and philosophers of former ages, which is of priceless worth; and may be profitably used as auxiliaries to present superior attainments. The present is so closely allied to the past that, as seen in vision by the prophet Ezekiel, "The wings of the living creature," which rolled forward the wheels of progress in the past, touch the wings of the living spirit which is at work in the same direction to-day. There is no break in the march of progression. "The living creatures" of each dispensation move straight forward; "they turn not as they go."

We live in an analytic age. By the accelerated action of the brain, ideas are increased, minds are expanded and go deeper into cause and effect than at any previous time; and reason, as a God-given power to humanity, asserts her right to the throne, in matters relating to the theological views and religious sentiments, as really and freely as in natural science. The civil polity protects all law-abiding citizens in the exercise of perfect liberty of conscience, and guards the rights of all persons, irrespective of nation or color, in their theology and religion. The American flag, wherever seen, is an ensign of human freedom. As it floats in the breeze, it inspires hope and gives promise to all people of a glorious emancipation from bondage, civil and ecclesiastical.

Under this banner have arisen the Shaker Societies, constituting the most unpopular body of professing Christians of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Their radical testimony against all sinful indulgences, teaches that those who do not deny all sensual pleasures — all the lusts of the flesh and mind — must suffer in their own bodies and souls the penalty of every violated law, irrespective of the meritorious vicarious sufferings of Jesus of Nazareth.

These Shakers, who, from deep religious conviction, subject themselves to stern self-discipline, are now beginning to be heard.

Thousands who do not feel prepared to walk with them in full communion personally, who cannot say, "Not my will, but Thine O God be done," and thus consecrate their all of person and property, do nevertheless rejoice in those who throw themselves into the burning crucible of spiritual and religious truth, that they may thereby become purified and reflect the image of the heavenly Refiner. They, too, will help uplift humanity to a state of moral rectitude on the earth plane. In blessing they will be blest by higher intelligences, and by progressive degrees will eventually be led by the spirit of truth up to the plane of spiritual life, to unite with those who are forming the angelic character.

Many of this class look hopefully on, and anxiously await the coming of our little "Monthly," to learn if it is well with us, and to see if the star of hope is still brightly beaming over our pathway, which leads to the heavenly home, the "city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God."

While in the present, as in the past, we realize that "struggle is the condition of victory," and that only "through conflict can deliverance come," we yet say, God be praised! Our "reward is with us," and we feel that Heaven's blessing rests upon our labors, and that truly "the lines have fallen to us in pleasant places."

REST.

By Florinda Sears.

THERE is a rest for the people of God. In days gone by — those days of which we read in the New Testament when Jesus and the Apostles received the Christ, and by the power of the Father were commissioned to preach salvation — brother Paul, in his epistle to the Hebrews, after wisely philosophizing on the subject, declared, "There remaineth a rest for the people of God."

Learned divines have used this text, calling upon their hearers to believe on the man Jesus, and thus insure to themselves this promised rest. But, notwithstanding the darkness, the true light has dawned upon us and a star of hope is arising. Who, from a distance, or within the precincts of our home, will solve the problem, and divine how this rest which still remaineth for the people of God is to be entered? Brother Paul further says: "He that hath entered into that rest hath also ceased from his own works." Thus it would appear we must become "new creatures, new brothers, new sisters, new fathers, and new mothers," that is, spiritual or heavenly beings, instead of continuing earthly and natural.

Again, our New Testament brother rejoices, inasmuch as "we have not a high priest who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are yet without sin." Why do we flatter ourselves that the promised rest can be obtained in any other than a sinless condition? Then let all enlightened spiritual Christians "come boldly to the throne of grace, that they may obtain mercy and the remission of sin, by confession, as did Jesus and Ann, by the confession of their faults, ere they received the anointing, or the Christ, which constituted them the saviours of the world.

Those who thus enter the promised rest are God's people. To them the fires of hell are quenched, and they fear no torment, no judgment to come; their lives being "hid in Christ" with Jesus and Ann. They are the virgins who follow them whithersoever they go; for they are no longer of the number who are "like the troubled sea, whose waters cannot rest."

We may therefore conclude that the people of God, in the highest sense, are those who really and practically live the nearest to Him, by letting the Adamic life pass away that they may become "new creatures," actuated by the Spirit of Christ, as the life of God in their souls. Such will feel no more sorrow nor sighing — the fruits of sin and wrong-doing.

— Mt. Lebanon.

PURE IN HEART.

By Josephine Deming.

JESUS said "Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God."

See Him where and how? We behold His handiwork in the outward visible creation. The sunbeam, and the tiny flower — the grasses and fruits — the trees with their lofty waving branches — and the murmuring rill, as well as the mighty surging ocean — all bespeak a great producing cause.

We admire the beauties of Nature, and through them adore the Wisdom that formed them, and the hand of Love that gave them as gifts to humanity. But there is a consciousness in our hearts, that a deeper sense of God is needed; that the outward senses, even if properly directed, cannot supply the inward cravings of the soul. We must draw nigh unto Him in spirit, and so thoroughly purify our hearts from all that is sinful and vain, that we can commune with heavenly Messengers, who are sent unto us from spirit spheres to quicken into more life, and produce in us more purity of heart, that we may have still clearer perceptions of God.

This alone can satisfy the unutterable longings in the human soul, for the Heavenly Father's blessing, and the love and tender care of a Heavenly Mother. And when we receive this sweet influence, our hearts go out in love to our brother and sister in Christ, in whom the image of the Divine is found; and thus we see God in man and in woman, the crowning work of his hands, in a higher and more spiritual sense, than in any mere external thing. Purity is the basis of all true and enduring friendship.

What is there in all of God's creation so noble as Man, when he stands uprightly, showing forth the image in which he was created? And what being so lovely as Woman, when really pure in heart? Then why should we not see God in them, and reverence Him there? What can give greater happiness than to be loved and cherished by them, and to dwell in their presence and partake of their heavenly influence? Blessed indeed are the pure in heart! They dispense light, love, and comfort to all around them; and I would gather to such, and learn to be like them — beautiful in spirit — lowly in heart — and free from all contamination of a worldly, selfish life. — Whitewater, Ohio.

RELIGION.

By Alice Grey.

RELIGION is the only true basis of happiness. "Pure and undefiled religion," outflowing from Wisdom and Love, is soul-purifying and exalting. We may be intellectually wise, and may possess great scientific knowledge and be morally correct in our habits of life; but we cannot form perfect characters without religion.

A mere profession, or belief in some theological creed, will prove ineffectual, unless we live out the law of Love; and we shall be left in the cold, barren region of selfishness, toiling for, and feeding the animal part of our natures, instead of the higher spiritual faculties of our souls, which would lead us to condemn error in our own lives, and to look charitably upon the faults of others.

True religion will teach us to be tender and compassionate; to be as ministering angels of love and mercy to the fallen and lowly, and to take them by the hand, and walk with them in the path of virtue.

Thus shall we help to lift them up to better conditions, by practically showing the power of love, and the worth of that kind of religion, which will not allow us to stand with folded hands, and see a brother or sister in need or distress, and coldly say, "Be ye warmed and clothed;" neither in a Pharisaical manner boastingly say—"I thank God that my condition is otherwise;" for "He knoweth the proud afar off." Pride is incompatible with true Christian religion, which fills its subjects with humility and love. — Whitewater, Ohio.

In the October, 1872, number of "THE SHAKER," edited by Elder G. A. Lomas, was given a succinct account of a meeting which he attended in a pine grove in Canaan, at the "Social Gathering," of the three families of the novitiate order at Mt. Lebanon. He made mention of a conversation that took place at the time between six young sisters, which he thought worthy to appear in print. Some of our outside friends have since urged its publication; for they were anxious to see it. Though somewhat lengthy for our small paper, we have concluded to publish it. It was prepared by the sisters expressly for the occasion, and was repeated from memory.

DIALOGUE.

—o—

THE GOSPEL WORK—ITS PRESENT AND FUTURE INCREASE.

MARGARET PATTEN—CHARLOTTE BYRD—
SON. SALL.
ANN OFFORD. MELISSA SOUL and
MARTHA ANDERSON. MARGARET CLEVELAND.

MARTHA.—We hail this year, 1872, as the Twelfth Celebration of our Social Gathering, and as the centenary of the opening of the Gospel. In reviewing the past, from the first stages of the work to the present time, we find much that is interesting and instructive to the thoughtful and observing mind, and encouraging and hopeful to those whose aspirations are spiritually directed.

I propose to trace the onward progress of a system which, though small in its beginning, embodied the germs of scientific, moral and spiritual knowledge, which, by culture and growth, would become widespread—a revelation of truth that was and is destined to shake the foundations of the old heavens and earth, and bring to perfection a plan of true harmonious development for humanity.

We who are in the enjoyment of the good that has been accumulated and conserved by the consecrated lives of those who were pioneers in the cause, with their faithful successors, can testify to the permanency and validity of those principles which constitute a solid basis for a life in which the nobler faculties and God-like attributes of mind and soul can be unfolded, and, through the influences of increasing truth, rise to the altitudes of heavenly perfection which the Creator designed all intelligent progressive beings should occupy.

MARGARET P.—Are you not mistaken in this being the centennial year? I thought it was not until eighteen hundred and seventy-four.

MARTHA.—I referred to the revelation in England, not to the actual occurrence in America. Am I not right in the assertion?

ANN.—You are. Mother Ann (Lec) received a baptism from the Christ sphere in seventeen hundred and seventy, when confined in prison, on account of her advanced religious ideas. During her imprisonment she had a clear conception of the loss of mankind, and of the only means that would resurrect them into a higher life. For the space of two years, and amid great persecution, she openly bore her testimony against a generative life for Christians; then she received a revelation of the work in America; and in seventeen hundred and seventy-four, by the aid of Divine power, she, with her little band of eight souls, was enabled to leave the shores of the eastern continent, and through the guidance of the spirit of truth, was led to this land of freedom where liberty of conscience is enjoyed. "For liberty is the soul's right to breathe, and, where it cannot take a long breath, laws are girdled too tight."

CHAR.—What you have said is in accordance with our record. While listening to Martha's expressed thoughts a desire for the increase and spread of this pure Gospel was stirred anew within my heart. With her I would turn and return the pages of this celestial work, and bring to open reflective view the increased outgrowth of Mother's pure Gospel. We should be immortal teachers to mortals, developing to external and internal glory, that nature whereon is entamped the seal of God.

MEL.—We will note the progress of this Church, and, as we traverse the recesses of truth, strive to let the blinding scales fall from spirit eye-sight, that all who see and hear may be edified and encouraged in the upbuilding and sustaining of a cause, noble in its purpose, refining in its character, and angelic and eternal in its life.

MAR. C.—What need was there of a Second appearing of Christ, when Jesus brought forth and promulgated a system of truth which alone was sufficient for human redemption?

MAR. P.—How could he, without the aid of the Mother Spirit, bring forth a perfect system of truth that would redeem the race?

ANN.—He could not. He did not communicate all the truth that was revealed to him, and which governed His own life; surrounding conditions would not admit of it. He said to even his nearest companions, "I have many things to tell you, but ye are not able to bear them now; when I am gone hence I will send the Comforter," etc., which was undoubtedly the Mother Spirit, the essence of love.

MEL.—Do we understand that the Christ is a direct unction from the Supreme, or from the highest order of spirits, who stand as mediatorial agents for the revelation of those exalted truths which will uplift souls from the generative life into the angelic and divine?

CHAR.—The Christ baptism came from the highest order of spirits, who are as Saviours, lights to other worlds, sons and daughters of the seventh sphere, or Heaven; the only redemptive agents and mediators between supreme goodness and souls in this and in other worlds.

MAR. C.—By other worlds, do you mean planets? It is true that scientific discovery has led to the conclusion that they are composed of material substances similar to this earth, and are inhabited by mortal beings who are adapted to their varied climates. Sir William Herschel said, "It would be no more foolish for a man to build twenty houses and only have one inhabited, than it would have been for the Creator to frame myriads of worlds similar to this (and in many respects excelling it), and then have only this one little dusty ball peopled with rational, intelligent beings?" But, do you suppose they are fallen and need redemption's work, as we all admit the inhabitants of this world do?

CHAR.—By other worlds, I mean the six successive spheres or worlds, preceding the seventh, and also the planets, the inhabitants of which, whether fallen or unfallen, need the influence of the same spiritual agencies to unfold in them (as natural beings), the seed buds of eternal life. As was once remarked with inspired power, "Mankind, whether fallen or unfallen, need the mighty power of God to resurrect them from the natural into the spiritual."

MARTHA.—It is a broad and liberal system of theology that admits such universal dissemination. A grand and lofty thought, the acme of which is the converging of all souls to one harmonious Center—Eternal Wisdom and love, the Creative Source of the universe of mind and matter.

MAR. P.—Christ signifies anointing. It was this Anointing Spirit that inspired the Witnesses of former days when they prophesied of the millennium, and uttered many truths in advance of the knowledge and life of the people. The divine unction has also rested upon the successors of Mother Ann, spiritually qualifying them (in the order of leadership), to administer the Gospel in its power, and increase to other souls.

ANN.—Ancient philosophy taught that there was but "one God, the Father of all;" and its numerous deities were intermediate spirits employed as agents, for God was too pure to be approached by mortals. This ancient religion or theology is identical with ours, and we may consider all religions as merely progressive steps, by which the human understanding has developed itself in every time and place, and will continue to develop itself in the future.

MEL.—May we not conclude that the evident design of the "second appearing" was to reveal the female in Christ? Its intent also was progress, as prophesied by Isaiah: "To the order and beauty of Christ's kingdom, in the latter day, there would be no end."

MAR. C.—Eternal progress! beautiful thought. No popish or protestant creed, or thwarting priestly power could check its course; but pure and simple in its unfoldings, it guided Mother and her little band to this land of freedom, to establish a Church that was too universal in its religious sentiments to find continued existence under the combined Church-and-State government of England.

MARTHA.—Then we believe that the Shaker Order holds a closer union to, and more abiding relations with, the American government, than does any other organized church to its government?

CHAR.—We do. The effect of the American revolution was the institution of a republican form of government, which entitled all to an equal right in political and religious belief. Thus America became the land of free thought and free speech, as J. M. Peebles writes: "A land where the people, conscious of their God-given rights, and cringing before no cowed priests, feel themselves 'sovereigns.'" This prepared the way for the organization of the Shaker Church (in America) where the unadulterated principles of Christianity were recognized and wrought out in the daily lives of its members. Hence the product of this Republican Government was the establishment of a spiritual government, moving in a corresponding line with the regulations of the civil polity, yet exceeding it in purity and holiness, although the interior order will be dependent for its increase of members upon the outward order.

The progressive advance of religious ideas, the rising wave of spiritual thought, and the wide diffusion of the holy teachings, and principles evolved by wisdom in the civil government, are the fruits of this union. And, as far as republican principles are diffused and acknowledged, so far will the abstract principles of true Christianity be extended, until all shall see and own their truth and validity. The growth of freedom and progressive rights which belong to humanity are embodied in both. No sectarian creed, or fearful priestly symbol harass the soul, or make it a subject of terror by arbitrary laws; but true liberty is ensured to all who nobly and uprightly maintain the just principles upon which these two institutions are founded.

Thus we see the civil and religious governments advancing toward a genuine union; and the Christian Church, established upon a true foundation, will be blessed and protected by the civil government, and they will co-operate and work harmoniously together, while the superior law in the spiritual order will be as a guide to the earthly order; and both standing in relation to true principles, will toil in harmony with God's creation, in the cultivation of the soil, and the hills and dales will unite with those who work the work of God.

MAR. P.—You have clearly portrayed the relation that will exist in the future between the civil and religious governments, when woman shall not be excluded from her right to aid in purifying and sustaining the constitution and laws of the natural order (which right is fully awarded her in the spiritual order). As this should precede and be as a light outside, we know the day will yet dawn when woman's voice and influence will be blest by the Republic, even as it is in the Temple of Christ's second appearing.

ANN.—That will be a glorious day, Margaret; but you are rather fast; you are foretelling the joys of the future. Let us go back to the past, and from that rise to the present, then to the future, as was our intention in this conversation.

MAR. C.—Was Mother's testimony a new revelation, or was it a revival of the principles of the Primitive Church, with an increase of spiritual life and power?

MEL.—The principles of truth vary in power and strength, according to the growth of mind, and Mother's testimony, with increased revelation, was a revival of the same principles. Thus, the standard of truth was raised higher, with an increase of self-denial.

MARTHA.—Great and truthful principles have outlived generations, traditions and corruptions, and have descended to us in the transcendent light of their heavenly origin. "All good cometh from God, the source of light and perfection." Important and elevating truths, manifested through chosen mediums and witnesses (and designed for humanity's good) through past periods, have often been misconstrued, and seemingly perverted, by coming in contact with those corrupt influences which result from man's lost condition, and, through his inability to perceive, or unwillingness to accept and apply them practically, they have, for a time, been turned from a free and effective course. "But truth, although crushed to earth shall rise again;" and, however deeply it may be buried in the débris of error, it shall be brought forth by the agency of that Almighty power, which overrules all things, to shine untarnished in the lustre of its divine light.

MAR. P.—We must not overlook the fact, that in the formation and regulation of the Church, much suffering was endured. Souls consecrated to truth freely gave their lives for those who should succeed them in future generations. We who are now in a greater fullness of gospel blessings do not comprehend or realize the depths of sorrow which often overwhelmed their spirits.

MAR. C.—And in this our day, many, not appreciating that fullness of blessing, would conceive the idea of great personal disadvantages and trial. This feeling arises from a lack of consecration and devotion to gospel communistic interests. We possess much greater strength with which to bear life's needful burdens, and carry forward a noble and glorious spiritual work, than when, in Mother's time, only eight souls were with her to sustain and minister the truth.

We are surrounded with gospel relations, and number eighteen established societies (and bright spots they form in this broad free land of America), and, if there were in each society but one individual, true and faithful to gospel principles, would there not be more mediums for imparting the strength of virtue and the worth of goodness, than in Mother's time?

TO THE EDITRESS.

By Emma Jane Neal.

THERE is a line of demarcation between those who live a worldly life, and the practical believer in Christ. One of the apostles said, "If ye be risen with Christ, set your affections on things above, for ye are dead (to the world), and your life is hid with Christ in God."

It seems difficult for persons outside of a Shaker community to see and comprehend the source of our supplies; therefore they cannot believe that within the precincts of our home there is aught but monotony, a dull round of duties; and they do not see how the great and growing desire for change, and what is called pleasure, can be satisfied, especially in those who are full of young life.

We are two-fold beings—have outward senses of hearing, seeing, etc., with which we hear and see external things, which, if not abused, are a blessing to us in our earth life. We also have spiritual organs corresponding to the natural. If we use the external to the exclusion of the internal, then all our enjoyment must be derived from the sensuous; but if the spiritual senses are developed, and we learn to commune with angels, and with them climb the immortal hills of truth, and roam in the ever-verdant fields where we can cull flowers that will not fade, and gather heavenly fruit that is sweet to the taste, then we feel joy of enduring worth, and pleasure that will never die.

If we fill the Christian character, we shall neither joy nor sorrow as do those who live a worldly life; but I am an admirer of the beautiful in nature, from which we may take useful lessons; and I think an occasional change of air and scenery is conducive to physical health; yet we do not find comforts or pleasures abroad that equal those of our own home and its surroundings.

I recently took a trip into a north-western county of New York State, and I send to you a few lines which I penned on that occasion. Do with them as you think proper. Our journey was performed partly by rail and coach, and partly by boat down the winding stream known as the Sacandaga. The scenery was wild, but varied and beautiful.

Our little bark lay tethered to the shore,
Which soon would bear us down the winding stream,

Mid scenes beyond the skill of man to paint.
Earth's verdant carpet now we tread with care
Unto the water's brink.

All things arranged, the signal given, we move.
A thrill of mingled joy and fear pervades
The mind, as o'er the laughing stream we glide
But soon our trusting hearts the nerve relieves
As in our worthy pilot we confide,
And, giving up our minds to nature's gaze,
Sweet inspiration fills the quickened tho't
With themes sublime from her vast book of lore.

O erring man, puff'd up with vain conceit
Of thy superior worth, take lessons
From the wild-wood's beauty; rare, sublime, it
Breathes perpetual praise, an offering free,
A grateful recompense for gifts bestowed,
Outvying all thy feeble skill can give.
The massive heights o'er which the wild deer bounds,

Stand forth as monuments of silent praise,
Save when the huntsman's gun doth echo
there,

Or cry of wild beasts rend the nightly air;
These, these alone thy sacred precincts mar.
O nature fair! enchanted with thy views,
Thy broad expanse where meekly thou dost weave,

In solemn stillness, rarest patterns pure,
Of taste exquisite, wrought by skillful art,
Without a boast of thy achievements great.
The Author of thy gifts my soul adores.

And, like the wild bird in thy temple pure,
On freedom's pinions let my soul take flight,
Far from the haunts of man's ambition vain,
There my small tribute offer at thy shrine—
Unsoiled by vice which often treads the aisles
Of sacred temples rear'd by human art,

And from thy teachings learn henceforth to act
In life's great drama with untiring zeal,
Not for ambition's weak and worthless prize,
But, like Thee, offering simple, pure and free,
God-given powers to bless humanity.

Thus, while we're wafted on thy bosom calm,
Thou placid stream, winding 'mid verdure fair
Through smiling fields and circling lofty mounts,
Let these sweet hours their hallowed impress make

Upon my life when cares and toils surround.
In true reflection may I oft recall,
And drink from memory's spring the same sweet bliss

Which fills my soul with tranquil thoughts of Heaven. — Mt. Lebanon.

GENTLE DEEDS.

MT. LEBANON, N. Y.

THE SPIRIT I COVET.

By Amelia Calver.

—o—

Praying spirit of my Savior,
 In my heart O, find a place;
 Help me, when the night is darkest,
 When upon the desert waste.
 When the day seems drear and cloudy,
 And sweet hope her powers resign,
 Blessed Savior, be thou near me;
 Prayerful spirit, be thou mine.

Peaceful spirit of my Savior,
 Caust thou find a place with me?
 Give me power to calm the tempest,
 While upon Time's billowy sea.
 I would have my words and actions
 Bend subservient to thy will;
 That, should wrath my bosom enter,
 I can whisper "Peace, be still."

Steadfast spirit of my Savior,
 Let me feel thy scepter's sway,
 Then like thee, I'll tread with firmness
 Duty's path, in trial's day.
 Like thee, I will stand unyielding
 To the lurking charms of ease;
 Over self will reign triumphant,
 Seeking God alone to please.

Forgiving spirit of my Savior,
 Take possession of my heart;
 When offenses grieve my spirit,
 Wilt thou then thy balm impart?
 Aid me to recall thy sorrows
 On the crucifixion day,
 When in sweet and tender accents,
 "Forgive them Father," thou did'st pray.

Loving spirit of my Savior,
 Let me in thy fountains bathe,
 Ready to renounce all pleasure
 Which a selfish heart would crave.
 With thy influence for my guardian,
 I can for all others care;
 Joy with them when joy aboundeth,
 Likewise of their sorrows share.

Healing spirit of my Savior,
 O could I possess thy power,
 Gladly every pain I'd banish,
 Frail humanity restore.

Tho' I fail to heal the body,
 May I not the spirit soothe?
 Touch the wounded broken spirit,
 Healing with the tones of love?

Blessed Savior, thy example
 E'er shall be my "Polar star,"
 Guiding, though 'mid trackless waters,
 Pointing on to realms afar.
Prayerful, Peaceful, Steadfast, Healing,
Loving and Forgiving ever,
 Blessed spirit of my Savior,
 O, I pray thee, leave me never.

LINES

ADDRESSED TO ELDER DANIEL HAWKINS, A SHORT TIME BEFORE HIS DEMISE.

—o—

By Hannah R. Agnew.

—o—

Thou worthy disciple, time's journey is ended,
 Repair to thy treasure above;
 Bright angels are waiting in triumph to meet you,
 With songs of rejoicing and love.

With patience and zeal, you toiled in the vineyard
 Of Him, who will justly reward;
 In health and in sickness, in joy and in sorrow,
 Devoted your all to the Lord.

The rising and falling of many in Israel,
 You witnessed, and firmly you stood;
 'Mid rough, beating surge, like a rock in the ocean,

You braved the tempestuous flood.
 In times of affliction, the Lord has been mindful,
 His angels to guard you he sent;
 His hand was not shortened, his ear was not heavy,

When humbly in prayer you have bent.
 Now hear the glad sound of "Well done faithful servant,"

Rejoice with your Savior and Lord;
 His cross you have borne, and His yoke you have taken;

Receive your most glorious reward.
 Go meet the dear friends, who have toiled for the gospel,

And suffered on earth with you here;
 Go rest where the wicked shall never more trouble,
 Nor sorrow's dark shadow appear.

Your crown is prepared, and your mansion is ready,
 Bright angels invite you along;
 Go join in the choir, and sing the sweet chorus
 Rejoice with the purified throng.

O, grant a free blessing to those you are leaving,
 Give love that will banish their tears;
 Exhort all to trust in the Lord, and remember
 The prayer of the righteous He hears.

And now, fare you well, loving father and brother,

With full length of days you are blest;
 Like a well-ripened sheaf that's prepared for the garner,

So you are prepared for your rest.

Mt. Lebanon.

SUSAN B. ANTHONY BEFORE THE CON-STITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

—o—

By permission of the Constitutional Convention, Susan B. Anthony appeared before that body, and delivered a forcible and earnest plea in behalf of female suffrage, in which she requested the Convention, in making their report, to suggest that the objectionable word male be stricken out of the State laws, so that women may enjoy that liberty which is their right, for, said Susan Anthony, it is just as certain that ultimately the franchise will be accorded women as that it has been granted to the negro; and by your honorable body assisting us now you will be simply performing a duty that, in the event of your failing, will be granted by your successors, and to them will be given the honor.

WHAT YOU CAN NEVER CATCH. — Boys and girls, what is it that you can never catch, though you chase after it on the wings of the wind?

You can never catch the word that has once gone out of your lips. Once spoken it is out of your reach; do your best, you can never recall it.

Therefore take care of what you say. Never speak an unkind word, an impure word, a lying word, a profane word.

MEDIATORS.

—o—

Does the central man, or woman, create Revolutions in the Natural Order? and Dispensations and Epochs in the Spiritual?—Or, do the Revolutions bring forth their own heroes, and the Dispensations (under law) evolve their own Saviors?

At those momentous periods of the world's history, when there occurs a new Epoch, the earth becomes vitalized and impregnated by an influx from the Parental Fountain, descending through Mediatorial Spheres, and directed by a Spiritual Intelligence, who is God to earth during that time. A corresponding human being is in the new movement, and has to bear the judgment of the decreasing darkness, and of the increasing light.

In humanity, there is an inherent tendency to deify both the ruling Intelligence and the governing man or woman. Even in this our day, there are many thousands—yea millions—who thus deify the Spirit who, with such mighty power and wonderful manifestations, brought up Israel out of Egypt. And, to them, the "God of the Hebrews" is the God of all Gods. And skeptics, like Hume or Paine, deride, if they do not blaspheme, through this theological error.

Again. If the central man (or woman)—the anointed Lead in the new Era—himself created the whole movement of human and spiritual forces, their failure, as free agents, to obey the Spirit, who "rides the whirlwind and directs the storm," would neutralize and deaden the progressive forces, so that nothing would be accomplished. Then the Divine design would be frustrated, and thousands who would have been blessed by the new Deific Influx—yea, all the inhabitants of earth—would have suffered irreparable loss, through the instrumentality of one insignificant individual. "In Adam's fall, we sinned all," expresses the idea, and, were it true, it would have been better if he had not sinned at all. As Esdras exclaimed, "O Adam, what hast thou done? Thou hast not fallen alone, but all we which be come of thee!"

In the case of Noah, Abram, Moses, Jesus, Ann, each one of whom could have been, and was tempted, and consequently might have fallen—yielded. For a "man (or woman) is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lusts, and enticed" to indulge therein. Had either one or all of these succumbed to the drawings of their inferior passions, would there, in such case, have been no Shepherd, or Shepherdess—no Leader—would all have been lost? By no means!

Like some of the lower animals, humanity in a Revolution, or in a Dispensation, can reproduce a lost member, and even restore a missing head.

When, with any portion of earth's inhabitants, it is harvest time—when the fruit and seed are ripe—there is not one only, but a crop, so to speak—a class of souls who are identified with the principles, and baptized by and into the very spirit of the "times and seasons." God is in them individually of a truth. And, under a law, which never fails, the real object and design of the Ruling Spirit—the God of the Epoch—is invariably accomplished. How be it, as with Noah and his ship-mates, it may be in only eight souls. But those eight men and women were as fully competent to the task of repeopling the earth as were the first two, or as would have been eight millions.

Out of an "army of the Lord," who had been to John confessing their sins, and renewing their covenant with God and each other, to thenceforth obey the physiological laws of Moses, Jesus and his Apostles were but thirteen in number, chosen from the midst of "their fellows," and were "men to be wondered at" by the sense-indulging, disorderly Gentiles around them, who ate any or every thing, and came together as no "brute beasts" ever do.

Now, had either of these been disobedient to his "heavenly vision," the holy Ruling Spirit would have elected another to "take his bishopric." As it is always thus, "the Lord alone should be exalted," and not the person of the "Anointed" deified. No man, or woman, should be worshiped; it "fills the land with idolatry" and adolators. Those who "worship the creature"—Jesus—more than the Creator," and instead of Him, do as "greatly err" as would the Shakers were they to worship Ann Lee.

"I saw an Angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach to them that dwell upon the earth; and he cried, with a loud voice, saying, 'Fear God, and give glory unto Him; for the hour of his judgment'—the day of judgment—"has come." This Angel succeeded the Angel of Spiritualism, who "came down from heaven, having great power, and the earth,"—all who dwell upon the earth—"was enlightened with his glory."

As individuals gather, one by one, "from the East, and from the West, and from the North, and from the South," each one will bring in with him and her a portion of the One Spirit of Good—of Religion—which pervades the race; and also more or less of the particular system of theology into which they may have been indoctrinated: as the Jew, or Mohammedan, the Hindoo, or Christian (so called), or any one from either of the various sects of these great divisions, which constitute "the old heavens," which must be supplanted by the "new heavens."

There being in all a tendency to idolatry, tender, conscientious souls, under this infirmity possessing more religious zeal than theological knowledge, must be gently led by the hand, drawn by the cords of love, and by the influence of true religion, out of false theology. A true and good life will ultimately create a true theology.

Theoretically, all believe in the progression of themselves, and of their system; but practically, when it comes, they will be nearly unanimous in a determined opposition thereto.

As the past history of our race has its ancient records; so its future history has been recorded by men and women "who wrote as they were moved by the Holy Christ Spirits" (who, themselves, are existing in a perfect social state), who inspired them to portray and describe scenes in which they would be the chief though invisible actors.

It is thus that the "testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." That is, the spirit of the Prophets is incarnated—externalized upon our earth—in human beings who, individually and collectively, are living out the principles of the coming Millennium.

"Of the increase and going forth" of this testimony "there will be no end," or cessation, until "the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our God, and of his Christ," and all things upon this earth shall have become the reflex of the inner heavens, or spheres. "See that thou make all things according to the Pattern showed thee in the Mount."

God is in the beginning, and man in the ending, of all "the times and seasons" of the progression of the race towards its final destiny—a perfect Natural Order, and a pure Spiritual Order, distinct, yet co-existent—the true relation of Church and State.

The elements in this work of judgment evolved a Woman as its centre of influence, and Leader. And around her has gathered a body of men and women who constitute the Church of Christ's Second Appearing, whose foundational or basic principles are: Faith in a Dual God, as the Source of all Divine revelation, through Prophets and Prophetesses in all times, and amongst all peoples; a Recogution of Spiritualism, as the "waters of the great deep, in which can float the Ark of Organization. Its main timbers are, Celibacy, Community, Peace—the Gentile Pentecostal Christian Church.

This Church has been, is, and will continue to be the Medium of transmission, to the Natural Order, of the inherent and inalienable right of every human being to all the elements of existence, defined and administered in the fear of God, by Rulers of both sexes—like Moses and Miriam (or Deborah)—as simple representatives and obedient servants of the whole population, male and female.

Use, not pleasure, is the unchangeable law. Each to live for all, and all for each. Fox and Swedenborg were fore-runners—"Witnesses": Fox in the Religious element; Swedenborg in the Spiritual.

CHRISTMAS MUSINGS.

—O— (E. Myrick.)

WHAT do we commemorate, the birth, the life or the death of Him who came to do the will of Him that sent Him? His birth was but a preamble, and his death but a supplement—the fly-leaves to the record of a divine, unselfish and heroic character.

Let the service of the day be a renewed dedication and aspiration to a more faultless fidelity to purity, truth and humanity—that we may "grow in favor with God and man," and that every conviction of right may find a response in duty done.

His gifts were patent to all the world. "Forbid them not to cast out devils in my name." To him it was better than the applause of men. "And inasmuch as you have done a kind act to the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me." He planted the good seed in the heart, the seat of life, where, by cultivation, it would absorb the whole being. He trained the philosophical and emotional to attain higher human happiness than either alone could ever reach. He recognized an immortal relationship as superior to the Adamic, selfish blood relation, which is severed by death. Through his mediumship, Jesus poured light into the world. And to-day we rejoice, not so much in the birth of a good man, nor in the attainment of salvation alone; but in that invaluable (though not infallible) light of progress, elevation, and spiritual refinement, that shines in a life of Christian, virgin purity.

In his life we have a pattern of dignified meekness, sublime courage and blameless integrity; reverencing all times and all places, as they are hallowed by holy work.

"He liveth long who liveth well,
All else is time but flung away;
He liveth longest, who can tell
Most true things, truly done each day."

If we would claim a true relation to our Elder Brother, "the first born," we must become as "lambs slain," (the animal life extinct); and yet, while we live on the earth, we may also reign over the earthly, generative, selfish nature; banish alike poverty and riches; testify against disease, murders, and all forms of our perverted natural powers.

"Ye are the salt of the earth," who would not "destroy life, but save it."

Moses enjoined the strict observance of the law of nature for the generative "children of this world," which would insure healthy offspring, that, preserving physical soundness, they might live, and be, and do good, and not kill one another.

To balance this despicable, though popular check on over-replenishing the earth, Jesus introduced a rational and philosophical check, the out-growth of the generative, by the virgin regenerative life; an innate and natural sequence of the physical, moral, and intellectual, so beautifully characterized by the four living creatures (Rev. 4th, 6th, 7th,) which were "in the midst of and round about the throne, full of eyes before and behind."

"The fourth was like a flying eagle," moving in the highest ethereal element—could bear the direct rays of the sun, and revolted at decaying bodies, a most fitting symbol of man's spiritual nature.

If we would respect this Christian record, we must remember the character and attitude of the "FLYING eagle."

GOOD RESOLUTIONS.

—O— (Daniel Offord.)

MAKE good resolutions, and carry them out. They help the growth of virtue in the soul, and are as gentle breezes, or rays of sunshine, or as showers that often fall upon tender plants.

Some persons make good resolutions, but who, not attaining to perfection at once, become discouraged, and think it is of no use to keep making resolutions which are likely to be broken, and that it is only telling falsehoods, and does no good. This is all a delusion. Shall we, because one gentle breeze, or one ray of sunshine, or one single shower, does not produce a crop, say, It does no good? No one would be so foolish. So, because one resolution fails to bring us into the possession of any particular virtue, shall we therefore cease to strive? May! "God looks at the heart" and the intent of the soul, therefore let us make good resolutions, and keep them; and then renew, and keep renewing, till we attain to that to which we aspire.—Mt. Lebanon.

CITY SET ON A HILL.

PART II.

—O— (A. B. Bradford.)

4. THEIR COMMUNITY IDEAS. The Shakers are one of the few Societies that have successfully adopted the Essenean and Apostolic plan of a community of goods. The Mount Lebanon Society own seven thousand acres of land, on which has been bestowed a vast amount of labor, and on which are immense buildings of the most expensive and permanent kind, and all in the most perfect state of repair. Miles upon miles of stone fence have been built, and, as the Shakers do every thing honestly and religiously, these landmarks, like the old cathedrals of Europe, will be as good as new when hundreds of generations shall have passed away. They have immense wealth in manufactories, and the preparation of herbs and garden seeds for sale; and their productions of all kinds command the market, because implicit confidence can be put in the goodness of the articles they offer.

Yet no man among Believers calls aught of all this wealth his own, but they have all things in common. By a division of labor and by the principle of co-operation, a small amount of daily toil by each person secures a vast aggregate of wealth. Yet they are not a money-making community. That is to say, the accumulation of wealth and an extensive business is neither the primary nor the secondary object of their Society. Believing that a competency is all we can enjoy, they are content with an income of thousands, where it might be, if they pleased, scores of thousands.

Elder Frederick, who, by common consent, is a leading man among them, and verifies Carlisle's definition of Koenig—king—able man, maintains that the only basis of success for a community is the principle of a celibate life. Marriage, it is alleged, creates selfishness, and produces a diversity of interests, alienations and schisms. This, it must be confessed, has been the case in the history of co-operative associations generally when based upon the community idea; but whether it inheres as a vice in the system, growing out of the necessity of the case, demands a doubt. But to run no risk, the Shaker, having no wife, jealous and exacting for her children, there is no motive to build up separate interests and create factions. The good of the whole remains the grand object of each one. If any brother or sister tires of this mode of life, and wishes to set up a family dynasty for themselves, they are dismissed with regret, but are not sent away empty.

The Shaker Societies do not much increase their numbers. But, if the world only knew of their existence—if those who are disgusted with the hollowness of fashionable society, and are bowed down under the disappointments of life, only knew there was a haven of rest to the wearied soul, where peace, plenty and contentment reign, and where the cup of happiness is filled to the brim, the roads leading to their gates would be filled with travelers who, like Bunyan's Pilgrim in the city of Destruction, would flee for their lives and happiness to these quiet abodes. For adults of both sexes the inducements are: moderate employment, the most virtuous society, plenty in all its varieties, and freedom from all care as to the future. For parents who bring their children, the best of schools, and a thorough training in all the economical virtues which make life beautiful and reasonable. Gossip and neighborhood scandal, which poison the air of nearly every village in the land, are entirely unknown. Each member of the family has his, or her, place, and function; and order and neatness, with all their correlative virtues, prevail. For a person among the world's people who is weak; that is to say, who cannot withstand temptation in all its forms, and say to the Devil, "Get thee behind me, Satan," the Shaker family is the place for him or her. For here, one who desires to repent and forsake sin, and lead a life of purity, finds every person, and thing, and arrangement, calculated to sustain and strengthen. There are no temptations to evil; there are no suggestions of a mis-spent past to torture the soul by reflection; but forgetting the things that are behind, each person fixes his eye upon the goal in the future, and girds up the loins of his mind to reach it; and I have no doubt that if a Mary Magdalene wished to turn her back upon the past, and set her face Zion-ward, and asked the white-cloud sisterhood to help her in her endeavors to lay hold on eternal life, she would be treated with the same consideration as the other Marys who bless the place with their benign presence. Still, the Community is no orphan asylum, nor widows' asylum, but only a home for all those who feel called and able to lead the beautiful and quiet life they live—a life of industry, and of harmony, and of innocency.

5. THEIR NEATNESS AND TIDINESS. In the cranium of every Shaker, male and female, there is a fine development of the organ of order, and all its cognates. Indeed, it is a prerequisite, and sine qua non, in every applicant for brotherhood and sisterhood, that he or she be perfectly clean, not only in soul, but body, and that they keep every thing around them so. It is beautiful to see, as one walks through all the departments of a family, how heaven's first law—order—reigns, and how perfect cleanliness prevails. Neither in house, nor barn, nor field, nor shed, can be found any thing that would offend the eye or nostril of the most delicate and fastidious visitor. This perfect cleanliness has much to do with the moral purity of their lives. Degradation and filthiness of the flesh go together; and so do personal and moral purity. There is a gospel in soap and soft water, for which the world is suffering, and it is the first consideration in all reformatory institutions, whether for the body or the soul. A dirty Shaker is as rare an anomaly as a white raven, and I have never heard that any one of the Community became either crazy or criminal.

The agricultural interests of this country are suffering because farmers' sons, as soon as they see a little of the world, become disgusted with farming and go to "professions" or swarm to the cities. It is the drudgery, the slovenliness and the want of plan and taste that disgust. Rural occupations are the most independent and pleasing of any on earth. Tradesmen and professional men in Europe, and especially in England, live in cities and make money, only that after a while they may retire to the country and live natural and happy lives. Labor is cheap and they can execute plans. But, in our country, labor is dear and farming is both a drudgery and wasteful. The recklessness and waste on many a farm, in its expensiveness, cuts deep into the year's productions. A young man, who contemplates farming as an occupation, would save money, in the long run, by paying the Shakers to take him for a couple of years and allow him to work with them, and to see and learn the thrifty way they do things. There are large, commodious sheds to accommodate farming implements of all kinds. You see no tool thrown down where it is last used, and lost; no wagons standing out in the weather, week after week, and going into uselessness. There is a place for every thing, and every thing in its place. There is a regular system of farming which includes five years with its rotations of crops. No building is erected on a cheap plan, for all cheap things are dear, and well the Shakers understand the paradox. Their fences are all in order, their houses and barns are all painted. And in all their interior arrangements an eye is had to convenience and economy of labor. A young man trained to their habits, would not only make money in farming, but would take delight in his occupation. A plan which looks ahead five years, and brings money into a man's purse annually, which he feels he has a right to because he has earned it, does away with the idea of expensive drudgery, and makes him proud of his occupation; and party politics which, for its chances to indulge in gabbling, is so attractive to so many young men in this country, has no attractions for him.

With such industry and economy as the Shakers use, and with their large facilities for making money, they yet decline doing so. Their grand object is not to amass wealth, but to live the right kind of life. That their simple diet, their moderate labor, their perfect equanimity of feeling, and entire harmony of views and interests, tend to promote health and long life, is clear from their bills of mortality.

6. THEIR WORSHIP. To a person who is a total stranger to their religious opinions, the Shaker mode of worship would appear novel. But so would a Roman Catholic mass in the cathedral service appear to a Scotch Cameronian, who, for the first time, witnessed the formality. And so would a Church of England man regard "fencing the tables" on an old Covenanter communion occasion; or a Quaker meeting. There is a great advantage in being something of a cosmopolite, and seeing other people's modes of worship, and hearing their opinions. Steamships and railroads have brought nations into close proximity with each other; or, to use the late canny phrase of the Archbishop of Canterbury, they "rub shoulders with one another." Bigotry is a religious vice, which lives and thrives in its own poor half bushel. It has no idea that there exists any more world than there is in its narrow quarters, or if there be, that it is of any manner of account. Hence it condemns all opinions and modes of worship, except its own. But bigotry is under sentence of death by the spirit of the age. The facilities of travel bring Brahmins, Buddhists, Mohammedans, and Christians of all sects, together; and being gentlemen, instead of boors and gahoos, they, with mutual respect, compare notes, and soon find out that there is, underlying all their special religions, and forming the substratum on which they all are built, the grand, yet simple religion of Nature, the oldest and purest of all religions, the equivalent of Christianity, which Jesus and Paul authorize Saint Augustine to say, was always, and everywhere, in the world. Thinking and candid men who are freed from the trammels of superstition, are fast beginning to regard the religion of Nature as the one true, universal religion; and that all the special religions are merely sects, based on it, only less pure, and consistent. Amidst these ameliorating influences, produced by travel and international communication, Shakerism, with its peculiar opinions, and its novel worship, cannot be dismissed with a supercilious toss of the head, which the bigoted ecclesiastic knows so well how to show, but advances its claim to the respectful study of all who feel interested in the different religious opinions and practices of the human family. Men of note and ability, like Archbishop Hughes visit their establishments, where they are treated with marked hospitality, and study their system, and always leave them, as they must, with feelings of admiration for their quiet but heroic lives.

I was present, with hundreds of others, most of whom were visitors from Lebanon Springs, and witnessed their form of worship on the Sabbath. At the proper time, the ranks opened gracefully after much singing of hymns; and one after another, Elder Frederick, and Antoinette Doolittle, addressed the assembly, and gave them such wholesome instructions in the practical duties of life, as they never got in their churches at home. Both the persons named are highly gifted as speakers; and, while they devote their talents in this line to the interests of the community primarily, they render on suitable occasions, important service to the world outside.

7. It would be a great mistake to suppose that on account of their celibate lives the Shakers are nothing but monks and nuns under another name. Monks live by themselves, and so do nuns. But the Shakers are a Family, living under the same roof as brothers and sisters. Some people who still live like owls, in the twilight of the Middle Ages, imagine that the constant intermingling of the sexes under the same roof must produce licentiousness. Upon this libel against God, and his children, our monastic colleges and female seminaries are built. But the Shakers, believing that the Almighty understands his own plans when he sends boys and girls into the same family, have found out by induction what all might know by deduction, that the daily life of the sexes in the presence of each other, promotes and secures the moral purity and refinement of both, and thus vindicates the ways of God to man.

Some sensual mortals, who are themselves unfortunately the children of lust, instead of love, and who cannot understand that a man's pure and ardent affection for a woman would protect her against himself, may entertain a suspicion that, after all, there may be improper intercourse among the Shakers. I believe this has never been charged against them, even by those who have left the Community, and gone back to the world. Shaker celibacy is an effect, and the causes that combine to produce it are many, and various, and powerful. I scorn the suspicion that men and women who esteem celibacy to be a virtue, and for them a religious duty, cannot, with all the motives drawn from heaven and earth, make that attainment. And I regard this fraternity of Christians as accomplishing their end in the great plan of the universe by showing to the world what a degree of perfection human beings can reach, not only in the matter of a celibate life, but in labor, in diet, in giving to woman her proper place as an equal, in contentment, in honesty of dealing and in serene contempt for the empty fashions and pursuits of the world.

Having said so much in just praise of the Shaker Community, I must now offer a word of just criticism.

NO EVIL.

—O—

(H. L. Eades.)

THE quasi-philosophical doctrine of No Evil is almost as darkening and pernicious in its tendency as that which teaches that "one man brought all sin into the world, and another one must take it all out. Or another one that, ignorantly literalizing the scripture allegory of the creation of the man, woman and snake, affirms that the snake was the immediate, and God himself the remote cause of sin. He having created this trio, with a foreknowledge of the result, acknowledges his part in the transaction, by condescending to be born of a woman, and then permitting himself to be killed, in order to exculpate man, satisfy his own justice, and appease his own wrath. Or still another doctrine, which affirms that it was God's Son, and not Himself, that died, the Father having caused the Son to take on Himself the sins of the whole world, which he "bore in his body on the tree," and this to relieve His own murderers from the crime they were committing while destroying Him! Rejoice, O sinner, and sin away! Thus exclaims the zealot, "Bless the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world!"—all that have been committed, or ever will be. "Glory to God! Not by works, lest any man should boast. You are not going to get me to mourn over my sins. But I know very well, if Christ has not taken them away, I am certainly lost, for their name is legion." But another class will not admit that Christ died for the sins of the whole world, but only for those who have faith in their creed; the rest to be consigned to endless torment. Thus: A & B in actual life, are precisely alike. A believes whilst B doubts, and, as "he that doubts is damned alrcady," B's case is hopeless; so, for the same deeds, A goes to eternal bliss, and B to endless torment, and this passes for Divine justice. Byron seemed to be a doubter; he says: "A natural resurrection seems strange, and even absurd, except for the purposes of punishment; and all punishment which is for revenge, rather than to correct, is morally wrong; and when the world is at an end, what moral religious purpose can eternal tortures answer?"

Having lately seen an article written with some ability, defending the affirmative of the proposition, "WHATEVER IS, IS RIGHT," in defense of the No Evil theory, has induced me to offer some criticism on the productions from a negative view of the subject. There is a canon of logic which denies us the privilege of reasoning from a proposition that admits of two constructions, without showing which is intended. "It is necessary," says Locke, "in order to be understood, that the hearer should join the same meaning to the words used that the speaker does," else they will be likely to convey darkness instead of light. It seems to me that nothing has been more misunderstood and misapplied, than the following lines of Pope:

"All discord, harmony not understood —
All partial evil universal good;
And spite of pride, in erring reason's spite,
One truth is clear, WHATEVER IS, IS RIGHT."

Those who so flippantly quote this great author in defense of the No Evil theory, forget to state that the argument, which closes with the above lines, is headed thus: "Of nature and the state of man with respect to the universe," and not with respect to God, himself, or society. He had no idea that his words could be wrested in defense of that Optimism, which declares that all things, moral, spiritual, and material, are ordered for the best.

The existence of moral discord and moral evil is too palpable to be disputed by any sane man. A son murders his father; there is a "discord" in that particular family; but it only needs to be "understood" to make harmony of it. A "partial evil" it certainly is; but 'tis only necessary to include the universe with it to make it "right"! So on runs the sophistry. Hurricanes are partial evils, when some person's property suffers by them, but they purify the atmosphere, and so, a little blood-letting by wars, purifies society(?) Thus people strive to ease their consciences and harden themselves in crime.

The article opens in this wise: 1st. "The material universe is the expression of the Divine character, and any thing which takes place therein, does so in obedience to law; and all effects are the expressions of Divine Power, consequently right." 2nd. "God is as immanently present in the flower as in the regeneration of the soul!" etc. The flower has violated no law; but it is a strange concession to speak of the regeneration of the soul, when it is in the universe,—a thing that "is," consequently, according to his text, is right, and therefore needs no regeneration. But such inconsistencies are the natural sequence of wrong positions. 3d. "There is no inharmony except in respect to the finite and individual; and that inharmony does not extend beyond the finite." Here inharmony is fairly confessed; but, to assert that it does not extend beyond the finite—leaves us still in harmony with the Infinite—is freely admitted; for no finite act can change the unchangeable Infinite; but having been created in harmony with God, if we break that harmony by disobedience, the only possible chance of restoration is by returning to obedience. Renan says: "If we cannot see God (in his entirety) we can powerfully feel Him"—who, through the conscience causes us to know his will, which, if obeyed, insures a harmonious relation of the finite with the Infinite; all denial to the contrary notwithstanding. 4th. "The Omnipresent Divinity is everywhere seen, preparing the finite to become united with the Infinite; capable of becoming, and destined to become, a living, conscious universe, begotten in the exact image of the Divine Father in esse and in existence."

If we are to be in the "exact image of God, both in being and in existence, and become conscious universes," then we are gods, sure enough! Than this, what more is God? Wherein shall we differ from Him? And if we are to equal Him in being and existence, why not excel Him? And so—

"Nobly take the high priori road,
And reason downward till we doubt of God;
Make nature still encroach upon his plan,
And shove him off as far as e'er we can;
Or at one bound o'erleaping all his laws,
Make God man's image, man the final cause."— or otherwise close with the pantheistic doctrine, wherein "evil ceases to have an objective reality," and that unintelligent nature is the cause of intelligent man, and he only a Darwinian effect.

In defending the No Evil theory, this writer seems to have taken his cue from the ethics of Aristotle, who, notwithstanding he could "reprove the Greeks for allowing their children to grow up as wild beasts," and, as Plato says, "to be torn in pieces by their lusts as by so many wild horses," yet he also affirms that "the first and absolute Good has nothing that is his own opposite." Thus, it may be seen, that in the defense of "No Evil," this great philosopher has fallen into the same palpable inconsistencies of all the lesser lights; wherein, if he is content, I now propose to leave him. "Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give to every one, according as his work shall be."—Rev. xii. 22.

LINCOLN.

—O—

A WRITER in the New York Times, after a careful reading of Lamon's Life of Lincoln, makes the following deduction:

"Mr. Lincoln was an infidel—positive, absolute, thorough. He was entirely without religion; and not only without religion, but without any faith upon which religion of any kind could be founded. He believed in none of the doctrines, or even the facts, upon which the Christian religion rests. The man who was always the champion of the poor and the oppressed, who was ever ready for personal self-sacrifice, whose famous Gettysburg oration breathed the very essential spirit of the enthusiasm of humanity, had no faith at all in any divine revelation, none whatever in the Divinity of Jesus Christ, none, consequently, in the authority of his teachings."

If some of Mr. Lincoln's devout friends had known all this five years ago, they would have looked upon his tragic end in the light of a dispensation. After all, it seems that all the Christian virtues may be linked with unbelief and paganism, for undoubtedly, Lincoln was a kind-hearted, generous, benevolent man.

ASSIMILATION.

—O—

(Wm. Russell.)

THERE is an inter-relation existing between all things in the universe, more or less intimate, according to the peculiar character of each. This results from the oneness of Deity. Forms may be infinitely varied, yet, such is the nature of substances themselves, they all attest the oneness of their origin; hence their relation to each other. Because of this relation they all have a transforming power over each other, varying according to conditions and circumstances. The central body in each planetary system not only attracts and moulds every one of its revolving spheres, but is itself attracted and modified by them. Each system also affects and is affected by every other system in the universe, while performing its sublime part in the never-ending dance.

The earth, with its multitudinous inhabitants, is powerfully influenced by the atmosphere which surrounds it, and this in turn acknowledges the power exercised upon it by oceans, mountains, fields and forests. Whether Darwin's theory of the origin of the human species be true or false, man is obliged to own his relation to all inferior existences, and even to feel, oft-times, that they have a controlling influence upon him. Often the face that was to be ever looking heavenward is downcast, and the entire person loves to exhibit its relationship to the groveling broods of earth. The human system, by its excessive absorption of life forces from both the animal and vegetable kingdoms, takes its rank even with the lowest orders. Its activity, which should surpass that of any inferior beings, is often so feeble that it becomes the slave rather than the master of all beneath. This is because of its failure to observe the Divine order of drawing the highest elements of life from sources above the human. The physical system of the brutes, when they are left free to act in accordance with their instincts, is maintained in its natural vigor and order. That of man will be toned to the highest health and strength when the physical, the intellectual and the moral faculties are maintained in their proper order by the use of nourishment best adapted to each. When the corporeal system is unduly cherished to the neglect of the mental and moral, then the man necessarily exhibits his close affinity to the animal. He assimilates himself to the lower life, and by reason of the absorbing and transforming action thus induced, he invariably displays more than brutal passions. He has sunk below the proper plane of his own existence. Examples of such abound in all history, so that it is unnecessary to particularize.

The physical frame, when preserved in due order by a suitable degree of food and exercise, instead of being a hindrance to the growth of the higher faculties, may be rendered a constant aid to them just so long as its natural vigor lasts. Being a product of the earth, it returns to it at last, and is completely assimilated to it; but if it has performed its part well, it has been an honored co-adjutor in the Divine Economy of rearing beings for the immortal realms. When both the physical and intellectual natures are cherished at the expense of the spiritual faculties, something superior to the mere animal is certainly exhibited, but still, man in his true dignity does not appear. What keenness of intellect was displayed by Napoleon! What rapidity of thought and action, as well as accuracy of judgment, on the battle-field and in the affairs of State! Yet his wonderfully keen intellect but served to give a sharper edge to the sword he wielded. He was unquestionably adapted to make a powerful impression upon warlike nations. He changed and molded Europe, but left it, nevertheless, warlike still. Not till the superior faculties of man have that attention paid to them that their nature demands, will mankind cease to be a warring race.

For the purpose of maintaining sound physical health, one needs the food that the system can readily assimilate to itself, so as to preserve harmonious action between all the parts. Any one who is in the habit of observing the effect produced upon himself by the different qualities and quantities of food taken into his system cannot fail to see that his mental and moral faculties, as well as the corporeal, are affected by them. As a general rule, he finds that when the outward is in good condition, the mental and moral forces are in more harmonious play than when the reverse is the case; and when the central manufactory of physical health is disturbed, there is more or less disturbance throughout the whole man. The plain inference is, then, that the food which is taken into the stomach is assimilated, not only to the corporeal blood but also to the more internal or magnetic forces of the system. This fact gives greater force to the expression found in the writings of the Jewish lawgiver. "The life of the flesh is in the blood." The term used for life in the Septuagint translation is psyche, commonly translated soul; meaning that principle in the human economy that is the stimulator of its every faculty. In the Greek New Testament we have the same word as an equivalent expression to that which Jesus used: "What shall a man give in exchange for his psyche—his life or soul?" Deprived of this he is poor indeed! The wealth of the entire world will not compensate him for its loss.

The same care that is to be observed with respect to the food for the body should also be observed in regard to that for the mind. Some things offered as such must be absolutely rejected; others sparingly used, while others still may be accepted as daily nourishment. As a general rule, that which cherishes envy, jealousy, hatred, revenge, strife, and contentions of every kind is to be discarded, though presented by the hands of the greatest masters of expression, and under the most attractive exterior. Though the cup be of the purest gold and set with numerous brilliants, it can never change the nature of the poison it may contain. Even the historian's pages, which too often are but the mirror of human vices, are deleterious, if exhibited so as to make those vices attractive rather than repulsive. What should be a lesson of warning and remonstrance may be so presented as to produce effects the very reverse. Wars are but the exhibition of the baser passions of mankind; but painted too often in colors that belong to their opposites, they serve to cherish these passions rather than to eradicate them from the human breast. Mental food, as well as that for the body, should be such as to produce harmony throughout the entire system. No other should be allowed to assimilate itself, and thus form a constituent part of our intellectual life. Otherwise mental disease will be the inevitable consequence, and restoration to health may not be effected without long-suffering and disagreeable remedies.

Life is of various degrees, to the very highest of which man is entitled as his inheritance. It is enjoyed, however, in its greatest degree, only by those who are in the possession of sound physical, mental and moral health. The Divine Spirit breathes everywhere, but, like the atmosphere, does not produce equal effects upon all. It may dwell in the innermost of man, but cannot be consciously enjoyed in its fullness, nor manifested in its proper effects, where there are the obstructions of physical, mental, or moral disease. Let every string of the human harp be rightly tuned, and celestial music will be produced. When the highest inspirations flow unobstructed into the inner life, they make an essential part of that life. They fashion it in accordance with that possessed in the highest heaven, where harmony perpetually reigns among its blessed inhabitants. — M. Morris.

LAWS OF PROGRESS.

WHAT is Time when measured with the eternal ages which roll in continuity through boundless space? When we look at the imperfect condition of men and things as they now exist, we often feel an intense desire for great and sudden changes, especially in theology and religion; and that the prediction of the spirit through John the Revelator, "Behold, I make all things new," should take effect immediately.

An inspired prophet of olden time said (pointing to times and seasons which God hath reserved in his own keeping), "By measure hath He measured the times, and by number hath he numbered them, and he doth not stir nor move them until the said measure be fulfilled." We cannot change the laws of progression which underlie all growth in material and spiritual things; but we may change our relations to them, and be instrumental in helping others to do the same.

If we sow a field of grain, we must expect to give the seed time to germinate and grow. We cannot by any means get the stalk, the blade and the ear in one day. And when we plant a tree, if we understand the science of arboriculture, so that we feed and water it, and stir the soil around it at the proper time to produce healthy action, we may accelerate its growth, but we cannot bring forth a full grown tree, however much we may desire to do so. The same laws which govern in the visible, are also operative in the (to us) invisible world of causation. In the spiritual, as in the material, we must bide the time. The All Father and Mother of souls, who watch so strictly over their children that "Not one sparrow falls to the ground without their notice, cannot look upon the condition of suffering humanity with less interest and compassion than do mortals. Mercy and truth meet (in counsel) together, and fain would they gather souls under the blessed influence of righteousness and peace, and bind them with the cords of love.

But "justice and judgment are the habitation of God's throne," and his laws do not conflict. Justice must precede mercy. Spiritual death is the effect of violated law; and if souls sin unto death, they must find repentance unto life; justice demands it. Then, mercy stands ready to bind up the broken-hearted and contrite in spirit, and give the sweet balm of consolation.

As we cannot change, or force the laws of progress, how can we the most effectually co-operate with them to hasten our own spiritual growth, and ameliorate the condition of the race to which we belong? God sends angels to sow and to reap; but men and women are the mediums through which they work. The angels could accomplish but little without the agency of man and woman. The higher and purer our conditions are, the more effective will our labors be in helping others. It is not wise for us to neglect any known duty to-day, because there is an endless future before us; for each day has its appropriate work. If, step by step, we ascend the hill of progression in scientific knowledge and spiritual truth, the higher we rise the purer and clearer will be the atmosphere, and the stronger will our influence be in drawing others from the low plane of sensualism, and from their wanderings in the cold, barren region of naturalism into the realm of spiritual light and divine ideas, where they can commune with higher intelligences from the unseen world.

"THE CUP."

(Address Joanna Kaime.)

JESUS said, "Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?"

Often times, when a child under the parental roof, have we read, with tearful eyes and bated breath, the glowing account of the crucifixion of Jesus, as recorded by the Evangelists; and, in our childish indignation, demanded of our parents to know why the great and good God suffered those cruel and wicked Jews to so ill-treat his beloved Son. Receiving an answer which served to confound more than to enlighten us, we accepted the traditional faith, that some how, or in some way, though never clear to our understanding, we were to be saved by the shedding of His blood on Mount Calvary.

But our thanks are due to an overruling Providence, that, in the second manifestation of the Christ Spirit, through the instrumentality of his followers, we have received knowledge of the true way of life and salvation; if we would be harvested from, and rise above, the earthly plane, we must shape our lives according to the Pattern, and walk as Jesus walked, drink of the same cup of which He drank, bear the same cross and living testimony which is like consuming fire to the nature of sin; then we partake of the same baptism.

And, as maturer years and broader views were ours, we found still deeper, if not more painful, emotions steal across the brain, and sink into the heart, as imagination depicted the sufferings of Jesus in the lonely garden, on the eve of his "passion." What mingling of pathos and sublimity! the human and Divine alternately controlling. The former, shrinking from the impending crisis, while, in the heaviness of his grief, he said, "My soul is exceedingly sorrowful, even unto death!" yet apparently denying himself of all the sympathy which that expression of sorrow might elicit from his disciples, he said unto them, "Tarry, here, and watch." Then he went forward to intercede with his Father, that, if consistent with his righteous will, the coming trial might be averted. Then, falling upon his face in agony of spirit, he prayed, "Oh, my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me!" Then there seemed to be a heavenly ministration, borne on angel wings, overshadowing him as he softly whispered, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt." Listen to the mild and gentle rebuke given to his neglectful watchers, on his return from his fervent intercessions, "What! could ye not watch with me one hour? Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." Then, as if touched with pity for their weakness, and in seeming extenuation of the same, he added, "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak."

His disciples were not able to appreciate the grand and exalted character of their Lord and Master—their Elder Brother—until they were imbued with his spirit, and were baptized with the same baptism, which also constituted them "sons of God," for none before him had so fathomed the depths of man's loss from God, or felt the bitterness into which his whole being was plunged. He (seemingly) felt the dissolution of every tie when forsaken by his disciples, and, in the moment of his supreme anguish, he cried, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me!" What a world of agony was contained in that soul-thrilling cry, "Eli Eli lama sabachthani!"

And did not Mother Ann Lee, who was called to prepare herself as a chosen vessel for the reception of Christ Spirit in his second advent, drink of the same bitter cup, even to its dregs? and by her crucifixion to the world with all its affections and lusts, become imbued with that Divine Unction from on High which prepared her to co-operate with Christ Jesus in resurrecting souls from the earthly order, or generative plane, and bring them forth into the New Creation, or regenerative life?

Verily, there are sons, and daughters too among us who have risen above all carnal ties, earthly affections, and sordid lusts, and can claim a true knowledge of, and relation to, this heavenly parentage. And, who can feel more grateful, or better appreciate, the advent and mission of the Mother Spirit, than her daughters, who are so abundantly receiving benefits therefrom? Then, let us not be content to remain inactive and unfruitful; but be quickened to the angel life, by tasting the powers of the world to come; that we, by travel of soul and tribulation of spirit, may become "fruitful vines, mothers in Israel," which our Heavenly Father and Mother (God) can bless. For, if faithful to the high and holy trust committed to our keeping, we can with confidence, lift our souls in prayer, asking Heaven's protection, and claiming the promise that, "Whatsoever ye ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." Although more than eighteen hundred years have elapsed since that precious promise was given, it is still full of inspiring hope. And who, but those who have wrestled with the strong worldly elements inherent in every human heart knows the intrinsic value of those living words, still fragrant with his tender love to erring man, "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." Oft-times in spirit, do we catch the echo of that wise injunction, which comes floating on the breeze like the whisperings of some winged messenger of peace from the garden of Gethsemane, "Take heed, Watch! What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch!"

Brief yet comprehensive is the exhortation. It furnishes an instructive theme from which profitable sermons might be evolved. — Canterbury, N. H.

SOUTH HINGHAM, MASS. Jan. 12, 1873.

Dear Friend: In the afternoon of this beautiful day, I find myself alone, or with no visible companion at least, and am thinking how many things I have to be thankful for.

Your little paper for January in its new dress is before me. I have read and re-read, and am very thankful that it still lives and goes forth to the world to teach and help truth-seekers. It is a welcome visitor here, and I am happy in its perusal, and always receive strength and inspiration as I read. I write in haste and inclose fifty cents for the paper. Long may it continue.

Yours for truth,

M. D. B.

HE is truly a man who is in full enterprise; who is perpetually planning new works; who is constantly acquiring new thoughts; who is all the time opening new chambers; who is every day furnishing the rooms of his mind with new pictures and new furniture; who is incessantly spreading for himself a new table with noble aspirations and endeavors, as the sign of soul life. Every man who really lives is living by a generous use of the future. — Beecher.

DIALOGUE.

—o—

THE GOSPEL WORK—ITS PRESENT AND FUTURE INCREASE.

BY

Margaret Pattison Charlotte Byrdsall
Ann Offord Melissa Soule
Martha Anderson Margaret Cleveland.

MAR. P.—Certainly. Can we not see from this, that the branches of the tree of life "whose leaves shall be for the healing of the nations," have spread, and that beneath it many souls have found a pleasant and safe retreat; thus fulfilling ancient prophecy?

ANN.—As was remarked, the testimony of Christ's Second Appearing, through the female, was a revival of primitive Christianity, with increased revelation; for that in itself was not complete. There was room left for a great increase of faith and works relating to the physical, moral, and spiritual condition of mankind. Nor did those who laid the foundation of the Second Christian Church complete the structure. It was not given to Mother Ann to gather the people into Gospel order; during her ministry, they were scattered abroad in valleys and on the hill-tops.

MARTHA.—Great wisdom and care were requisite on the part of those commissioned to gather the people into an organized body, to establish laws and regulations which would countenance a progressive, physical, mental and spiritual growth, and yet be for the protection of the Society.

MEL.—Our ideas of progress would not lead us to discard true foundational principles, but to build upon and expand them. This may be the criterion by which we can judge the worth of any progressive movement, if it does not deteriorate the pure spiritual life of the community. Many, in haste for onward advancement, would introduce reformatory ideas and changes, without regard to the time or state of preparation for receiving them, and by thus doing, would retard the progress of the work.

MAR. C.—This is but the dawn of the Millennium. The spiritual faith of this life leads to a consecration in all things. Self-denial opens the door of revelation. What an amount of inspirational strength actuated those who lived in their little families, to give up all for the future glory of Gospel communistic life. Self-sacrificing devotion was their inducement.

CHAR.—The past is sacred on account of the holy life and strength of Gospel parents. The beautiful and true have attended the Gospel work in its varied stages of progress. Our unprogressed conditions open wide fields of labor wherein we may toil, and, like our predecessors, gain treasures of worth to impart to others. In former times, comparatively little attention was given to physiology; but now the light of the present reveals many physiological errors previously adhered to, which we hope to have sufficient honesty of purpose, and firmness of mind to leave for something better.

MAR. P.—Greater attention is now given to air; for we acknowledge the fact, that we live by breathing; and the pure atmosphere is essential for this purpose. It is a satisfaction to glance at our well-ventilated dwelling, where we see space in the base-boards, and apertures over all the doors for the admission of air; while the self-acting Archimedian ventilators on the roof, create a strong draft and dispose of any vitiated air that might otherwise remain in our dwelling. Even with closed doors and windows, the atmosphere is still good and wholesome.

ANN.—In addition, we can range the verdant fields for pleasure, or otherwise enjoy the sunshine and genial summer air, with no fear or thought of persecution; but with a calm and holy feeling of inspiring life, we behold with joy and a spirit of blessing, the consecrated labors of our good and worthy brethren.

MARTHA.—It is pleasant to gather the fruits of earth. They supply the place of animal food in a great measure; for very little of it is now required for our table. Swine's flesh has long been abolished, with other things, in the preparation of food, such as soda, salaratus, etc. Brown bread almost supplies the place of white, while our well-cultivated gardens, golden grain fields, and thrifty fruit orchards yield an abundant supply for physical health and comfort.

ANN.—It has been asserted that "a vegetable diet has a happy influence on the mind, and tends to preserve a delicacy of feeling, liveliness of imagination, and acuteness of judgment, seldom enjoyed by those who live too much on animal food." Franklin said that "a vegetable diet promoted clearness of ideas, quickness of thought, and stability of action." He spoke from experience; for his superior reason early led him to adopt a simple style of living.

MEL.—Tobacco was formerly used to quite an extent among us, but was considered useless and injurious. Some who had formed a habit of smoking, and had not strength, of themselves, to change, were assisted by spirits from the unseen world. Their love to the truth was strong, and their desire to increase with the work of God enabled them to make the sacrifice, which proved a blessing to them individually, and to the whole body. A spirit of self sacrifice, in regard to perverted ways and habits, is what the present generation need to possess. It should ever be our effort to simplify our needs, and curb our appetites, and thus bring ourselves to the condition of the philosopher, whose habitual prayer was, "O ye gods! grant me to have few things, and to stand in need of none."

MAR. P.—I should be pleased to know who he was.

MARTHA.—Apollonius. He was born four years before Jesus of Nazareth, belonged to a wealthy Grecian family, and, though reared in the lap of affluence and ease, he early discarded all forms of luxury, donned the garb and habits of a Pythagorean philosopher, lived on fruit and vegetables, drank water only, and chose a celibate life as being best adapted to philosophic and ethical pursuits. He was endowed with remarkable mental powers and spiritual gifts, which, combined with a well-developed and perfect physique, gave him a marked character. He was successful as a teacher of a rational system of morality and virtue.

MAR. C.—"The moral and intellectual status of man is grounded in the material;" hence those things which pertain to the health and perfection of the physical body, are of great importance to humanity. There can be no high spiritual life sustained here on earth, except in connection with habits of wise bodily discipline—a truth yet to be recognized by many.

CHAR.—While we view the increase of truth in the past in those particular points of which you have been speaking, we also behold the present growth in virtue and goodness. Truly those who plead for a broader platform, and complain of but little progression, are more than spiritually blind. Such evince their unfaithfulness to present light, a non-conformity to united spiritual and physical increase.

MAR. P.—There is ever a beauty and glory manifest in the Gospel work, to those who abide in its spirit of heavenly life and love. Shakers, or Believers, are becoming better known in the outside world; the purity of their lives is not questioned by those who are rightly informed; while their character for integrity and truth is well established, especially with the more intellectual and spiritually-minded.

ANN.—The witnesses of God in the past fell from their rectitude, and lost their spiritual power through the friendship of the world. Through this medium, worldly attractions became strong. We are in danger from this source. It is an easy thing to turn light into darkness; and there is greater danger of being allured and drawn away from true faith by the friendships of the world, than by its persecutions. But, if members fail, virtue's strongholds are still reliable; seceders take no strength from the body; God's work remains the same, and will endure through eternal ages.

MARTHA.—Human nature is everywhere the same. In all ages it has had the same wants and aspirations, and has been subject to the same infirmities. As you remarked, a declension of members is not a declension of truth; but all, if they would advance with the body, must be united and keep pace with increasing revelation. Order and harmony are sure guides.

MEL.—There is greater strength and beauty in the Temple when the weak and unreliable pass away. The cause of righteousness and self-denial never presented loftier themes for thought and practice than at present.

MAR. C.—This is a day of individual trial. The foundations of our faith are being tried. The everlasting Spirit of Goodness searches the heart, and tries the actions, to prove what principles we are actuated by.

MEL.—The world may question our integrity; and many inquire, Why cannot you live as purely, with your faith, outside of your community? But the Holy Spirit's call is, "Come up higher, above, away from earth." The work of to-day is to aggregate souls into a heavenly union, to form a body for honest souls to gather to; a true type of angelhood in the heavenly spheres.

ANN.—There must be an Order above and in advance of the world, to govern and regulate, or set in order those who forsake it. The spiritual is for that purpose. The present condition of society is no cause of discouragement. The future cannot be determined by the present. Like life, society grows from a principle divinely implanted; it is progressing, bringing the world and its attractions to an ultimate. It is true there is not much increase of members to our Church at present. That is because of the lack of the religious element without; yet many (by degrees) are ripening up to the Gospel work, which is the harvest; and, ere long, a revival of religious and practical truth will occur; then, "where the body of Christ is, thither will the eagles be gathered together."

MAR. P. — Our Father and Mother have prepared a home, and are now calling their children to partake of the spiritual feast of goodness and love. For there are noble minds, to-day, endowed with power, and an understanding of truth, who are disseminating the seed of Christianity, educating souls for the Gospel. For, "what education is for one man or woman, revelation is for the whole human race."

ANN. — Margaret, I listened almost breathless to your last sentence, knowing that the original writer did not include the woman, and you are aware that it is a day of woman's rights, a subject upon which I am greatly interested; for we know she is of more worth than to be a mere instrument of worldly pleasure. We see in our Zion-home women of strength and virtue, whose consecrated powers adorn and beautify the Temple of God.

MEL. — The acknowledgment of the Mother Spirit in Deity is one grand step towards this ultimate. All who have progressed away from old contracted theological views, can see and appreciate the true worth of woman.

MAR. C. — How beautiful is the social relation formed between the male and female among Believers, where the inferior passions are kept in subordination to higher law! How true the manifestation of love in the sphere of daily duties, where the claims of both brethren and sisters are regarded with equal respect; and, as co-workers in a noble cause, each unselfishly toils for the good of the whole.

CHAR. — This social and religious harmony is not only beneficial to us, but to mankind in general. It is seed sown that will bear fruit in the good time coming, but is sustained only through individual personal "sacrifice of selfishness, and an expansion in the elements of universal love and true philanthropy." While listening to your comments upon woman, I thought how beautifully Eldress Antionette was inspired (in "Past, Present and Future") to speak of the elevation of woman from physical, moral and spiritual servitude. I know such truths will rest with weight upon minds who are exercised in this direction.

ANN. — I read and re-read the article with pleasure. Such truthful expressions are like sunny rays of hope illuminating the future. The love and union formed by kindred souls, who have commenced the work of regeneration, by being baptised into purity of heart and life, is the strongest of all bonds with which to hold soul to soul. It is unchanging through all conditions, and incites to constancy and truthfulness one with another. We intuitively repose confidence in a relation thus formed, as when we pray we instinctively direct our intercessions to God; there our confidence is placed. On the same principle we rely upon our faithful brethren and sisters, and trust their fidelity.

MAR. P. — This is the advantage which is only to be derived from a spiritual communistic life. We see verified, in our association, the saying of Jesus, "Think not of the morrow, what ye shall eat, drink, or wear," because, in our associated capacity, there are many who are interested in bearing the burdens of life; and the orderly arrangement of spiritual and temporal leaders is a great blessing; it relieves us of much anxious care and thought respecting food, clothing and other things necessary for physical comfort and support. And, by first seeking the spiritual part (the righteousness of Christ's kingdom), all other needful things are added.

MARTHA. — Henry Vincent remarked that "Christianity levels all distinctions, save goodness; it is the grand elevator of the human race!" And, we might add, where its true spirit is maintained, it dignifies toil, and transforms what is commonly deemed the drudgery of life into pleasant occupation, where right — not might — is the rule; because labor is equalized according to qualification of membership, and ability to perform it.

MAR. C. — Persons who visit our communities, not comprehending the true principles upon which the Institution is based, often inquire as to the number of hours we labor; but we are not, for sordid interest, toiling with restriction. Duty is pleasant to us, we are in our own home; when more is to be done, then gladly we give more effort; when not so much, then less is required. We are not under task-masters, but are influenced by love and mutual friendship to one another, devoting our strength for the good of a noble and glorious cause.

MEL. — One, speaking of consecrated toil, said, "Prefer duty to diversion. He who is false to present duty, breaks a thread in the loom, and will find the flaws when he has forgotten the cause."

CHAR. — Order and discipline are the guardians of our home. If irksome to some, it is because they are not in the life and spirit that pervade it. Some are baptised into a gospel of ideas, but not into the Gospel of Love, which will produce practical works; they receive faith intellectually, while their souls are untouched by the living inspiration and consecration which permeate the body of Christ.

ANN. — The more practical religion is, the better I like it. It is effectual for good, when it is carried into all the essential duties of life, instigating the spirit of industry, in making good roads, constructing fences, cultivating the soil properly, preparing of food, clothing, etc., such as Christians can use and not abuse, marking all our labor with neatness, thoroughness and order. Here is a large field for useful thought. In this we find the most effective poetry, — "a poem from the fingers ends," and beautiful pictures to look upon; and "a picture is a poem without words."

MAR. P. — When I came among Believers I admired the order and practical utility of external things. This I perceived was the result of an interior spiritual life; and, in the ardor of my soul, I thanked God that I had found a people who were not stereotyped in their religious belief; but who, in the progress of spirituality could change their theological views.

MAR. C. — Then, a distinction is made between theology and religion?

MEL. — Certainly. Theology is but the science of religion, while religion is the germ of eternal life, which may be found in every human heart. Henry Ward Beecher says, "The way to begin a Christian life is not to study theology. Piety before theology. Right living will produce right thinking."

MAR. C. — The cultivation of this germ has produced the increase of the past and present. And, in the liberal exercise of our faith, we are unbiased by worldly conservatism, believing that this Church will eventually be the receptacle of every good, whether it be from Judaism, Catholicism, Protestantism, or Mahomedanism, for we claim that all sects contain some truth.

ANN. — It will also be the conservatory of science; for all truth centers in God.

MEL. — Our minds should be open to the acceptance of scientific truth; although it should come in contact with preconceived ideas, grounded in the mind, and forming a stronghold of individual experience. Our theology should correspond with science, or it is liable to be overthrown. It is a day of reason and investigation; the foundation of all systems is being tested.

MARTHA. — I rejoice that the time is approaching when the voice of woman will be heard in governmental affairs; when she shall help to enact laws that will bind Justice and Love in one inseparable band; uplifting her sex from the thralldom of sensual and sexual sinfulness, into the untrammelled freedom of personal rights and privileges, such as man enjoys. Then shall a purer and more refining influence pervade the council-halls of the nation, and a new epoch in civil history will hold a corresponding relation to the spiritual order under which we exist.

MAR. C. — The Spirit of Divine Wisdom which regulated this infant church, stands as a balance between reformation and conservatism; and from the growth of the past we may judge of a greater increase in the future. "As souls advance their ideas expand. Progress is an eternal law. The ideal beckoning the real to come up higher, there will ever be loftier, diviner attitudes to ascend."

CHAR. — The angelic voice of Truth has rolled in majesty through all periods. The laws of improvement bear each tone higher and still higher up the scale of holiness. The music of the sinless Angel of Love shall echo over hill and dale, over sea and land, until, in its glorious chorus, all nations shall blend, and the home of Virtue and Truth, that is increasing, shall begin its life in all, while the altar of holy resurrection shall be lighted in grandeur with hallowed and varied offerings of souls from every clime. No longer will one toil in pain while another revels in luxury, for the soil and fruitage of earth shall be free, while over the homes of all will hover the heavenly dove of Peace.

MAR. P. — True LOVE principles, gleaming in their divinity far and wide, will vitalize and draw many souls to Zion, where they will be planted as trees by the sides of living waters, growing in strength and beauty until they become as cedars of Lebanon. Then will they joyfully sing the "Song of the Lamb" with those who stand upon Mount Zion.

MARTHA —

Joy we feel in thus reviewing
What the march of Truth has wrought,
And, while present light pursuing,
Claim the strength through increase brought.
Hopes for future bright are glowing,
Love with wisdom interblends,
Seed celestial they are sowing
Of a life that never ends.
Faith, endowed with gift immortal,
Lifts the veil from spirit sight,
Ope's the gates to love's bright portal,
Leads the soul in wisdom's light;
Pierces through the mists of morning,
And discloses to our view
Grace and Truth the home adorning,
Where all things are form'd anew.

MUSIC SUNG IN CONNECTION WITH THE DIALOGUE.

1. Praise, rejoicing and thanks-giv-ing, Is the glo-ry of our song! While the an-gels from a-bove us, Waft the bles-sed strain a-long;
2. May the joy our feel-lings cherish, Thrill a chord in ev-ry heart! While the secret streams out-flow-ing, Shall an an-swer true im-part;

'Tis for promised joys unmeasur'd, For delights that ne'er will wane, For the rapture pure be-fore us, And the hope for ho-ly gain,
And we call on all to join us In our joy-ous fes-tive song! While the waves of life dance mer-ry, And the heart is glad and strong!

Chorus. con spirito.

We will swell the glad some chorus, Till bright hosts around us throng, And with harps of sweetest mu-sic, Join our u-ni-ver-sal song.
Yea we'll swell the glad some chorus, Full, un-broken, rich and strong; Till it floats and floats a-round us, This our u-ni-ver-sal song.

"SCRIPTURE OF TRUTH."

—O— (O. C. Hampton.)

While wandering alone o'er the bleak hills of sorrow,

And sadly exploring the regions of earth,
The present all gloom, with a darker to-morrow,

An alien to comfort, a stranger to mirth,
Before me arose a magnificent Temple,
Whose windows were brilliant with rainbows of light,

Whose beautiful mansions were airy and ample,

With glory supernal enravish'd my sight.
This Temple was built at the foot of a mountain

(The mountain of Arrogance, such it was called)

Where long I had wander'd in search of a fountain,
O'er crags of despair round its summit so bald.

The Fountain Eternal of all consolation —
The Well of Salvation — I journey'd to find,
Whose river so clear thro' the calm habitation

Of Holiness, ever continued to wind,
At length a grand Temple, that stood in the valley,

Attracted my eye with its beautiful sheen:
I thought, if the vale with its beauty would tally,

Nor painter nor poet could pencil the scene.
In haste I repair'd to this exquisite Temple,

More costly by far than the Temple of old;
Its plan of construction, tho' sacredly simple,

In aspect sublime was romantic and bold,
And in that low valley meander'd a river,

With calm flowing waters and music serene,
Which still keeps in majesty rolling for ever,

The sweet-smelling woods in perennial green.
And here was the Fountain of blessing fraternal

Whose Lethæan waters all sorrows remove,
And, tho' cycles are gone, yet the flowers are vernal,

That bloom on its banks in the garden of Love.

And in this vast Temple the poets and sages,
The Prophets and Saviors for all the lost world,

Whose wisdom and virtue (in bright glowing pages,
As rivers of life, through the nations have pur'd)

And soul aspirations, in love are recorded:
They have written their lives in the books of the Palm,

Have finished their race, have been amply re-warded,

And left us their story in song and in psalm.
Their heavenly oracles — rapt inspirations —

In unfading splendor, are there to be found;
Their joys and their sorrows, and final salvation,

In "Scriptures of Truth" in profusion abound.

How oft have I open'd the doors of this Temple,
To search out its oracles hidden therein,
That, in sore affliction, would show some example

Of sweet resignation in dark sunless scenes.
As those who had travel'd in sorrow before me,

And left me their holy Evangel to trace,
In patience to wait when the shadows are o'er me,

And how to rejoice when abounding in grace.
When doubts and uncertainty thicken around me

And darken my path with the shade of their wings,
I enter this Temple: What light is around me!

What promises holy! What heavenly things!
When gloomy forebodings, or malice, or anger,

Are brewing afar in my horizon dark,
I haste my escape from this region of danger,

I hide in this Temple, I rest in this Ark.
In many sore trials and weary temptations,

This Temple enchanted has furnished relief,
And thro' the long past it has lighted the nations,

In their bright day of joy, and their dark day of grief.

Long, long live this Temple! the structure of Ages,

Long let me recline in its shadow serene;
Long let me converse with the saints and the sages

Who've lived out their day, and have passed from earth scene.

The Good of all times, in their travail and trial,

In unison striving the same race to run,
Abounding in patience and stern self-denial,

To press for the glories they fought for and won.

O, thanks unto God, who in mercy provided
This beautiful Temple such records to hold,

Where pencils of sweet inspiration have glided
And faithfully painted "the doings of old."

Then, long live the Archives of Saints and their sorrow,

Their triumphs in grief and assurance in doubt
Until the Great Day, which will know no to-morrow;

Let the light of the "Watch-towers" never go out.

DAN. x; 20, 21: "Knowest thou wherefore I come unto thee? and now will I return to fight with the prince of Persia: and when I am gone forth, lo, the prince of Grecia shall come." "I will show thee that which is noted in the scripture of truth; and there is none that holdeth with me in these things but Michael your prince."

From which it appears that the "Scripture of Truth" existed, and was studied in the Spirit World, long before the modern Bibles — Jewish, Catholic, Greek or Protestant — were made up. Indeed, they are not yet completed, as in England a commission is now revising the "Holy Scriptures" — the Protestant Bible.

As Rabbi Wise says, "the happiness of man depends on no Creed and no Book; it depends on the dominion of truth, which is the Redeemer and Saviour, the Messiah, and the King of Glory."

The belief in a creative God is inferred from design in creation, and though there are difficulties the other way, reason triumphs in the proofs, and faith overcomes the difficulties.

THE SNOW STORM.

—O— (Mary Whitcher.)

What kindness of our Father,
To spread a mantle o'er
All dark and ugly features,
Which face of nature bore!
All draped in lily whiteness,
The rocks and mountains' side;
Alike the vales and hill-tops: —
Thus would our Maker hide
Our darkest wrongs with whiteness,
Our weakness and our sin,
If we beneath the covering
Of Mercy would come in.
This is the Lord's pavilion;
It covers all below;
As doth the rain and sunshine,
So doth the mantling snow.
O when shall we consider
What God for us hath done;
And in that loving kindness
Deal kindly with each one?

PART II.

—O—

THAT system, institution, or individual, who possesses the most light and truth and the purest inspiration, is the best prepared for, and the nearest to, the "kingdom of heaven." To such were the oracles and promises and prophecies committed.

The children of Abraham, by natural generation, had many important advantages over those whose parents disregarded the natural sciences that were practically operative in the Mosaic economy — godly agriculture and physiological knowledge relative to nutrition and reproduction — that has no parallel in history.

"The land is mine, saith the Lord" — the Hebrew God. And the priesthood divided the land to each tribe, family, and person; while the historian of the future, — the Prophet, — caused the "meek to inherit the earth," and allotted to each one a "vine and a fig-tree" growing thereupon.

The Jew gloried in his superior physical organization; but his eyes were inverted, turned back, while staying himself upon the spiritual gifts of his ancestors, — the saints, Prophets and Prophetesses, Noah, Abram, Moses, Elias or John the Baptist, — and upon their wonderful works, great faith, and their sufferings and self-denial, yet he exalted their personalities just as the same spirit to-day exalts Jesus and Ann. "Whom makest thou thyself? Art thou greater than our great ones?"

The Jew was blind, and "knew not" of the saints and saviours then in Jerusalem. These had to be their own witnesses, by their works, to which they appealed.

Who worship the persons of the dead past will persecute the persons of the living present. Idolaters "hate him who reproveth in the gate" of the new city that is coming down from God, through Christ, out of the inner heavens. It was their own doings when the people of Israel, through faith in Moses and in the God of Israel, — the spiritual Being who inspired him and constituted him God of Egypt, and of Pharaoh, its king — allowed themselves to be led into a wilderness where there was none of the food to which they had been accustomed, and they had the consequences to endure.

The righteous were self-denying with occasional murmurings and some backslidings. But they frequently rejoiced and triumphed in the prowess of their great national guardian spirit, "their" God; while the rebellious, during the "ten temptations" that befell them, often, in their hearts, turned back into Egypt. They all died in the wilderness.

Their progressed children, raised upon a vegetable diet and under strict observance of the propagative law (common to all the inferior animal creation), went into the land of Canaan under the guidance of the only two of the righteous who remained, out of the million who came up out of Egypt. Could they have done any more under the guidance and lead of the original million? Was not the end of their faith attained?

Each individual did now "possess the land," they had their portion. They had also a perfected order of generation. No money, no monopoly; neither speculation nor commerce; riches nor poverty; merchant princes nor railroad kings. No rings nor Credit Mobiliers; no police, nor magistrates, nor courts of justice, except the temple and its Levites. "Of doctors" — quack or regular — Adam Clarke says "they had none;" for "the Lord their God had taken from them all sickness," by keeping them from the causes that induce it. It was "Church and State," with the Church left out.

This Mosaic civil government bears the same relation to the present worldly civil governments, that the Jewish Pentecostal primitive Church bears to the present churches of Christendom. With the help of the "spirit of prophecy," these two governments are straight edges, to show the crooked ways of Church and State in Babylon.

Worldly, selfish communism seeks to level wealth and poverty; to disband the twenty million soldiers of civilization, by arbitration; and to legislate the social evil and drunkenness out of existence; when it is only the Christ Spirit that can accomplish these good deeds, and give to mankind the Millennium. For the poor would gladly be rich, and the slave would be pleased to become the slaveholder.

From many babel pulpits the cry ascends, Alas! alas! ye are taking away our gods and our priests, and what shall we have left? Even the "Word of God — our holy Bible" — is undergoing revision!

Is not this the point when the "holy Inquisition" should again come in, to exterminate heretics? Can we not get our Jewish fighting God, and our marriage-attending Saviour, "the chief Ruler of all national conduct; and the holy Bible, as the supreme Ruler of all national conduct," into the Constitution of these United States, to save us?

"A tree is known by the fruit it bears;" and, when any system of theology stimulates the evil passions of its advocates, making them "hateful, and hate one another," (as they do all through the six hundred sects of Christendom, and that too on mere points of belief), where both parties are wrong, is it not evident to every honest, thinking mind, that these are believing the theology, and practising "the doctrines of devils"?

They (each of them being a "natural enemy" to all the rest) never agree, except (like Pilate and Herod) when it is to plot some mischief against the only civil government on earth that does not interfere with liberty of conscience; and upon whose soil the professors of all the thousand theologies of earth can meet as human beings, in perfect equality. And, seeing that the Government of these United States is not any more a Christian than it is a Mahometan, Hindoo, Jewish, or Chinese government, any one of the thousand sects in the nation has the same right to put its God, and Avator, and Bible, into the Constitution, as has any and every other one.

How much better it would be, if they would "put away all sectarian bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil-speaking" against unbelievers, who do not "put bread into their mouths," and learn to be "kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another," as the best way to promote "pure and undefiled religion."

Jesus and Ann said they were "the way, the truth, and the life;" and, when persecuted for it, they proved it, by praying for and doing good to their persecutors.

Those persons of to-day who are anointed with the Christ Spirit, and who bear the sins of the people, and minister the power of protection and forgiveness, are as really Jesuses and Anns — Saviours — as were any persons in the past. And we should feel as free to respect, honor and love them, as we think we should have respected, honored, and loved those of former times, had we lived when they were upon earth. "If ye had believed in Moses, ye would, also, have believed in me," for I obey Moses.

The spirit of antichrist leads to the worship of the man — the person of Jesus; but denies that, in our own time, the Christ has, or can "come in the flesh" of other persons, as Mediators.

TREASURE.

"Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." — MATTHEW, 6:21.

IN whatever we take an interest, wherever our affections are placed, to whatever object or enterprise our feelings are attracted, and there we give our solicitude and care, there is our heart and soul, there are our riches — treasures corresponding with the amount of affection and labor bestowed. Such objects are liable to become idols, permanent idols of the heart, gods of worship. Unto such, we infer philosophically, we give our strength and support, not only while the soul is tabernacled in earth, but they being treasures of the soul, we cling to them when mortality is put off.

Is not man the mind? Hence man is the soul, which changes only as it becomes degraded and lowered, or as it finds progress. It is therefore ignorance, or a weakness of the human heart, to suppose that physical death converts the soul, and that then man becomes another, or a "new creature." "In the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be;" and Job tells us, there is hope in it. The mortal is dropped and cast off; the immortal eternally lives, and, wherever it exists, is capable of the reception of increasing light, and consequently progress. Otherwise, why the mission of Jesus to the souls of the departed, that "were disobedient in the days of Noah?" 1st Pet. 3: 19.

That service implies progress; his mission was to preach salvation in those prisons to the ignorant and wicked; to enlighten them, elevate them, evincing that they were capable of receiving his testimony, and also of being saved by it. Otherwise, the mission of Jesus must have been not only fruitless, but foolish. Those antediluvians, realizing their lost condition from disregard to the preaching of Noah, found justice incorporated in the character of the Almighty, as He did not leave them in their ignorance, without providing a means of rescue from wrath and judgments eternal, by and through the saving Gospel of Jesus. Here they became interested in light, which attracted their minds; and they sought relief in giving their hearts to his testimony, which began to furnish their souls with treasure. In this we see not only the wisdom, but the infinity of God, leaving not even the prisons of darkness beyond the grave so closed as to prevent the visitation of mercy, and thereby deprive the ignorant of light and means of protection.

God, our Heavenly Father and Mother, is a rational Being, just and merciful, abounding in every consistent means to meet the rightful wants of his creatures; so equitable in the distribution of justice, that He will bestow nothing unearned, as a permanent blessing. His laws are immutable: obeyed, they yield a just recompense, affording freedom of spirit, and protection, and justification of soul; disobeyed, man reaps the fruit of condemnation, his soul is brought into slavery, on every side his way becomes hedged, his path is strewn with perplexing and troublesome obstacles, and his life is sold to bondage and suffering. Thus, of all earthly means of rescue or relief he becomes stripped, he loseth the control of that which he seemeth to have, and it becometh not his own; therefore even that which he hath not is taken from him. Matthew 4: 24. Thus, left to himself to pay the utmost farthing for transgression, he finds little, within or without, but weakness; and, being robbed of strength, the power of attraction acting upon goodness is measurably lost, and those energies calculated for the exaltation of the soul, are still weaker for action.

Man's only alternative in this condition, however powerless and weak, is humiliation, and cries to the God of Heaven for help. Realizing, when brought to destitution, that salvation is not found in an arm of flesh, he discovers that his only reliable strength is in God; his only refuge, in heaven. His interest being awakened in that direction, he seeks a treasure there; and, deriving an evidence of unfolding truths, his soul becomes convicted. Learning therefrom, that Gospel riches are obtained only by sacrifice, only by closing the senses against the admission of ungodly influences, giving no place in the heart to selfishness, allowing no indulgence of appetite or passion that would stain his moral or religious purity — that would animalize his soul or lower his condition or character in the sight of angels; and learning also that he is not his own, he resolves, whatever the circumstances, and however great the sacrifice, to become a Christian, that his life and all pertaining thereunto must be and shall be consecrated wholly and forever unto God and the maintenance of truth. This is the "narrow way, and few there be who find it."

Elder A. Perkins, Enfield, N. H.

THEOLOGY vs. RELIGION.

MODERN ideas and conceptions of Religion and Theology are so inextricably mixed and confounded together, by education and custom, that the terms seem identical, or synonymous, so much so, that Theology has become surrounded with a halo of holiness, and is credited with the generous and noble promptings of our better feelings, to the sanctification of the most absurd and meaningless forms, formularies, and ceremonies in the worship of God.

Theology is of the intellect; while Religion has its root in the affections. "God is Love." Hence, "pure and undefiled Religion," expresses itself in good works; Theology, in words and believings. Religion is constantly seeking for more light, evolving new truths from all sources, wherewith to benefit humanity, without any regard to creedal Theology. For her love is universal — God expressing Itself through creation.

Theology has installed herself as dress-maker in chief to Religion. But Religion gives her a great deal of trouble, as she is constantly outgrowing her raiment; nor will she be clothed by rule, or wear the costly garments cut out for her, except for a short season. That which Religion plants, she soon plucks up; and that which she builds, in her next mode of change, she pulls down. While Theology is stationary — stereotyped — always looking back, and going backward for perfection.

Theology insists that religion shall take the best of human souls to heaven, to praise the Lord in glory, and sing psalms to all eternity. While Religion persists in remaining upon earth, being intent upon redeeming its inhabitants; is anxious about our moral characters, and spiritual welfare; would fain look after our poor mortal bodies, and save them from the doctors; is deeply interested in the laws and rights of property, and in a proper and equal disposal of land. She would gladly exterminate all the vices so prevalent among mankind, and which produce armies and navies, that, in their turn, breed slavery, poverty, and destitution of the elements of existence.

When, by the inspiration of the Almighty, Religion succeeds in elevating some one individual as a Reformer, Leader — a doer of good — "above his fellows," like Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, or Ann, back comes Theology in great haste to "kill" and embalm the Avator, for all future generations, in coming ages, to idolize and worship.

Religion toils and works forever, to make us rational, comfortable, and happy here. She would condescend to teach us what and how to eat, to dress, and sleep; how to work, how to build well-lighted and ventilated houses and barns; and how to cultivate our land, so as not to raise disease-creating produce therefrom; how to meet the thousand and one conditions of life with common sense. But "Piety" becomes offended, and old Theology is horror-stricken; and so we languish to-day, vainly hoping for the "coming man" (or woman), the opportunity of to-morrow.

The world needs men and women whose hearts are full to overflowing with religion, who will heed her behests; those who can walk the streets of life nerved and unmoved, while the finger of ridicule is pointed at them; when malice, scorn, and misrepresentation assail them, who can forego — pass by — gold, pleasure, and ambition, untainted, while loving and seeking to help and uplift humanity; and who dare to worship at other thrones than that of dead Theology.

It was Theology, not Religion, that caused human beings to malign, persecute, burn, and crucify each other in the name of God or Christ. It has not been Religion, but Theology, that has held and practised the "doctrines of devils;" sacrificing and embittering the lives of millions of earth's inhabitants. Whereas, Religion molds the hearts of her adherents, in all races and nations, into a unity of purpose and action, breathing peace and good-will, and recognizing the equal rights of all peoples, and of both sexes. Thus, by its fruits, proving its Divine origin from the one Fountain — GOD — who is Wisdom and Love.

The Theology of a past cycle distracts the human mind, by conflicting with the inspiration and revelation of the present cycle. It drives men into antagonisms and animosities for mere difference of opinion; making them "hateful, and hating one another."

It is the sensual gratification of the animal appetites and perverted passions, so common among men and women, that causes the extreme ignorance of physical and spiritual truths that almost everywhere abounds. Therefore it is, that "light is sown only for the righteous" — those who practice self-denial.

Indeed, it is effete Theology — not Religion — that is now seeking to restore the cruelty and horrors of the past "dark ages," by putting its imaginary Trinitarian God, and the man-made Bible, into the Constitution of our common country. This insidious attack upon liberty all good citizens should unite to resist and to counteract.

Thomas Smith, Canaan, N. Y.

GENEROSITY during life is a very different thing from generosity in the hour of death; one proceeds from genuine liberty and benevolence; the other from pride or fear.

"SHAKER AND SHAKERESS."

MANY thanks and blessings on you, dear friends, for sending out into this benighted, confused, strife-mongering, lust polluted world your precious paper. Your pointed testimony against selfishness, lust, and other vices, which the churches of the world tolerate, is opening the eyes of honest truth-seekers, and strengthening and encouraging the weak and faint, who have been made so by the high professing and low prejudices of those who claim to be the Churches of Christ. Were it not for the "Shaker and Shakeress," the rising generation would grow up in ignorance of the true Christian spirit and principles, being taught as they are, by their own divines, that God is a God of war; and that, instead of being saved from sin and its consequences here, they must wallow on through filthiness till death places them in better conditions. Thousands who have been seeking the truth, and have sunk almost into despair at the practices of the fashionable churches, but know not where else to look for good, are now blessing you for the plain truths and teachings sent forth to them in your paper. For, while others are blinding and bewildering the world with creeds, theories, and mysteries, which neither they nor anybody else understand, you are making the highway of holiness so plain that a child may understand it.

You confine or apply religion to daily life. "Turn from that which is evil, and cleave to that which is good, in all your thoughts, words and acts," is the true Christian and the true Shaker doctrine; and, when people obey, they will soon see the absurdity of sinning all their lives, and then asking to be made clean and whole by the blood of one who died eighteen hundred years ago. We shall all find just as much salvation from sin and its consequences, here and hereafter, as we work for, and no more. The death of a thousand men called Jesus, or Christ, never will entitle us to salvation, here or hereafter, one whit further than we possess in ourselves the Spirit of Christ, and work it out in our daily lives. Teaching people that Christ suffered for our sins, that we may spend our lives in transgression, and then, on our death-beds, make a dodge by the devil, and land in heaven pure and perfect saints, all fitted for immortal glory and happiness, is one of the greatest sins or errors ever committed, as it gives liberty to travel through life in sin, and to enter, without preparation, a state of existence whose very beginning requires that all the faculties and powers of our souls should be trained to the highest perfection. If men had ever been taught the great truth that salvation and happiness, here and hereafter, depends on our own individual efforts in our daily lives to purify ourselves from all sin and wrong-doing, we should now have a very different state of society.

The "Shaker and Shakeress," is now teaching these blessed truths; and may the Father and Mother of all that is good, and all the holy angels, aid in impressing the importance of these truths on the world, and the Churches of the world, which a false theology has covered with almost Egyptian darkness.

I rejoice to see that you are bearing a testimony against putting God and Christ into the Constitution, which would be opening the door for the union of Church and State, which would finally lead to the rekindling of the fires of persecution, that were extinguished with the tears and blood of millions of those who were the real salt and light of the earth, and, for want of whose righteous teachings, the world has been groping in spiritual darkness ever since.

Man, without a Divine spirit to control and guide him, is the same in all ages; and, if we give graceless priests, who believe in pauper-houses, prisons, the gallows, and in war, power to lord it over the world, they will persecute those who cannot conscientiously indorse them as severely now as did their brethren in the ages that have passed. And then, what mockery, what rank blasphemy, to put the name of God, who is Love, and of Christ, "the Prince of Peace," into the Constitution of a Government whose country is filled with forts, arsenals, powder-houses, with a standing army and navy, and which is now spending thirty millions a year for war purposes in a time of peace! Would God and Christ accept the office and honor which these ignorant fanatics are endeavoring to force upon them?

Go on in your good work: the holy angels, and the hearts of all pure men and women, must be with you.

Jer. Hacker, Berlin, N. J.

GOVERNMENT.

"Where there is no government there is no God."

THERE is some inherent virtue in all the various forms of human government. An empire, or despotism, under the direction of one will, capable and good, is vastly more happy in its conditions than is a democratic State without self-control.

An aristocracy is but another name for government by the best minds. And who will say it is not better than misgovernment by a rabble. Wild tribes elect their own chieftains, and these chiefs are governed by a council of their wise old men.

True republics embody the best qualities of all human governments. When a people have become sufficiently enlightened to protect themselves from being ruled by designing knaves, they should govern themselves. Their first step may be to elect an aristocracy, composed of their most able minds, to make the laws; then to elect an officer, or officers, to execute them; these, answering to the executive head of an empire, enforce the laws made by the people through their aristocracy; but, under bonds to administer for the common good of all. For the misrule of a mob is no worse, in principle, than that of a despot; but is more showy.

A theocracy, or government by the Infinite, through the finite—the spiritual through visible channels—is evidently what the perverseness of man's nature requires.

It is becoming a question, whether, in this country, man has not, already, more liberty than he will use aright. Uncontrolled, unregulated license, will as assuredly pervert all government in the future as it ever has in the past. In his lowest condition, man needs protection against his fellow. In his intelligent state, he needs protection against his own sinful pleasures. Uncivilized, he is incapable of a true spiritual government, as it would soon degenerate into a superstition. Enlightened, he becomes voluptuous; for the means of sensuous satisfaction, have far outgrown the only power which can curb the desires, and hold them to their legitimate use—the present and future good of hims lf and his fellows.

Believing that God overrules human affairs for the final good of the race, we perceive design in bringing those wandering Arabs, or sons of Jacob, to dwell near the highly civilized Egyptians for four hundred years. Could they live for so many generations in close contact with the most enlightened people of the day, and not have the truths of civilization born in them? And what could better fit them for a theocracy, and to be led by the one man who had the noblest spiritualistic development?

It is safe to predicate, from the lessons of history, and from the result of stern facts in the present, that the race cannot—will not—unaided from above, govern itself with justice. For no material or intellectual forces can ever reach the spiritual nature, which, alone, has power to subdue those desires and passions of the earthly man, which, defying all law, is termed "that lawless."

Hence, when man can see the Infinite in the finite, he will have a government manifested in human beings, who possess the highest spiritual development of the day and time; and the governed will realize that their freedom of desire and action may be greater than their power of restraint, and so yield obedience to God, as seen in his "image."

Thus, the culmination of human government will be spiritual, which takes into the account man's highest attributes and well-being. It will be of God, through the people, and for the people, and of their own free will.

UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

VIEWS OF A PROMINENT SHAKER.

MT. LEBANON, COLUMBIA CO., N. Y., }
March 15, 1873. }

Editor Morning Express:

RESPECTED FRIEND: I send you a copy of my St. George's Hall lecture, and a pamphlet. I hope your life may be spared until you can look through them. It may be that you will be the better prepared for the interesting change, after digesting their contents. If good came "out of Nazareth," why may not light come out of Shakerdom?

If we must have a union of "Church and State" in this nation, I propose that the Shaker Church be the one to be thus united to the Civil Government. There are grave reasons why this union should be consummated. The President has already extended a fraternal hand toward the Shakers' Order, saying, "I believe that our great Master is preparing the world, in his own good time, to become one nation, speaking one language, and when armies and navies will be no longer required."
